

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PREFACE.

The editors of a legal periodical have said, they were "almost ready to lay it down as a general principle that reporters are wholly unable to write prefaces;"* so habitual is the neglect to give any information of the laws under which the reports are made. The Virginia reporters form no exception to this remark. The reports of one are the result entirely of individual enterprise, while those of another are made under authority of law and by virtue of judicial appointment: yet we are wholly uninformed by the reporters, of any difference between them. Mr. Gilmer does, it is true, mention that some of the cases in his volume were argued before his appointment as reporter; but he is altogether silent as to any legislation on the subject. Some mention of that legislation, with an enumeration of the reporters, prior and subsequent thereto, and a brief notice of the grade and authority of the courts whose decisions are reported, may not be wholly inappropriate now.

From a very early period there existed in Virginia, besides the monthly or county courts, composed of persons commissioned by the governor and council, a higher tribunal, to which appeals might be taken from the county courts. (a) This tribunal was composed of the governor and council, who held four quarter courts yearly at James City, in September, December, March and June. (b) Afterwards, December term was changed to November, (c) and June term was abolished, (d) The name quarter courts was now considered altogether unsuitable, because there were but three in the year, and they were "not equally distributed into the quarters of the year, *September and November being too near, and March too long from them, to admit of that title." It was therefore enacted that the said courts should be no longer styled the quarter courts, but should be called general courts, a name deemed "more suitable to the nature of them, as being places where all persons and causes have generally audience and receive determination." This name was given at the session of the assembly in 1661-2. (e) And thenceforward until the period of the revolution, the court thus established by the name of the general court of Virginia, and consisting of the governor or commander in chief and the council, was "the principal court of judicature for the colony and dominion of Virginia," (f) liable however, in certain cases, to an appeal from its judgment, decree or sentence to the royal power in England. (g)

Some of the cases decided by the general court from 1730 to 1740 were reported by sir John Randolph, Edward Barradall esquire, and mr. Hopkins; and others decided from 1768 to 1772 were reported by mr. Jefferson. Since the death of mr. Jefferson a small volume has been published, containing the cases reported by him, and also such of the cases reported by the three first named gentlemen as arose under our own peculiar laws. Most, perhaps all, of the other cases reported by them may still be seen in manuscript. But in the volume entitled "Jefferson's Reports" are contained all the decisions prior to the revolution which have yet appeared in print.

After the revolution, there was established a high court of chancery, a general court, and a court of appeals; all held by judges chosen by the general assembly.

The high court of chancery, when first established, consisted of three judges, (h) but the number was afterwards reduced to one. (i)

George Wythe, who had been of the v *three, became the sole chancellor. He published in 1795 a volume of his decisions, with remarks upon decrees by the court of appeals reversing some of them. In the sketches of Virginia judges prefixed by mr. Call to the fourth volume of his reports, there is a biography of mr. Wythe, accompanied by some remarks upon his volume of "chancery decisions."

The general court has continued to be the supreme criminal tribunal. A collection of cases decided by it from 1789 to 1814 was published by William Brockenbrough and Hugh Holmes, two of the judges of that court: and judge Brockenbrough afterwards published a second volume, embracing the decisions from 1815 to 1826. These two volumes are entitled "Virginia Cases."

The court of appeals has, from the time of its establishment, been the supreme civil tribunal. Since 1789 it has consisted of five judges, (k) with the exception of the period from the resignation of judge Carrington on the first of January 1807 (l) to the death of judge Lyons on the 30th of July 1809, during which there were only four judges, and the period from the death of judge Lyons until the act of the 9th of January 1811, during which there were only three judges.

The following reports of decisions of the court of appeals were published on private account.

Two volumes by Bushrod Washington, embracing the period from 1790 to 1796; of which there was a second edition in 1823.

Three volumes by Daniel Call, containing at the end of the third volume some cases decided in 1790, and in the three volumes a regular series from 1797 to 1803. A second edition of these three volumes, by Joseph Tate, was published in 1824.

For the period from 1803 to 1806, the reports were not accessible to the public until 1833, when Mr. Call published his fourth, fifth and sixth volumes. These volumes embrace the *decisions of the court of appeals under its organization from the revolution until 1789, the decisions for the period from 1803 to 1806, some of later date, and a few cases in other courts.

Four volumes by William W. Hening and William Munford contain decisions of the court of appeals from 1806 to 1809, and some cases decided during the same time by Creed Taylor esquire, who succeeded Mr. Wythe in the office of judge of the superior court of chancery for the Richmond district, created by an act passed the 23d of January 1802. (m)

And six volumes were published by William Munford, containing cases decided by the court of appeals from 1810 to 1820. The fifth of these volumes came down to April 1817. Before the sixth was published, the following communication was made by the judges of the court of appeals to the house of delegates:

"To the honourable the speaker of the house of delegates.

Richmond, December 6, 1819.

"Sir,

The reports of the decisions of the court of which we are members, for nearly three years back, are in arrear and unpublished. The very respectable gentleman who has heretofore published such reports has been prevented by various causes from performing that duty. The accounts of the decisions of that period are, in most instances, locked up in his office. While this circumstance produces to us some inconvenience in the discharge of our public duties, it may be highly detrimental to the best interests of the community. For want of a knowledge of these decisions, our fellow citizens are disabled from conforming thereto; counsel cannot advise their clients of the actual state of the law of our country; and judges render decrees and judgments which, when these decisions come to be inspected, will, in many cases, be reversed. This is a state of things which, we humbly conceive, requires some correction. It is important that the expositions *of the law by the court of the last resort should be as much promulgated as the acts themselves which have been expounded. Experience has shewn, that when left to private enterprise only, this important function will not be sufficiently attended to. Hence arises the necessity, in our opinion, to place the subject under public patronage. We are of opinion that a suitable character ought to be appointed, under the authority of the legislature, to publish these reports; and that they should be promulgated shortly after the decisions have been made. We are also of opinion that to insure the services of a proper character, and to compensate him for his constant attendance in the court, to the injury of his business in other courts, an adequate salary ought to be given him, in aid of the emoluments arising from the sale of his books. We do not doubt but that, on these terms, a gentleman might be procured who would perform the work with fidelity, perspicuity and brevity. The example of the national legislature, in having lately furnished a reporter to the supreme court of the United States, is, in our opinion, worthy of imitation.

"With great respect, we have the honour to be, sir, your obedient servants.

Spencer Roane.

Francis T. Brooke.

Wm. H. Cabell.

John Coalter."

This communication was followed by the act of February 24, 1820, which authorized the court of appeals to appoint a proper person to report all such cases decided in the court, as, in the opinion of any one judge of the court, should be worth reporting. Each volume was required to be printed on good paper, large octavo, and bound in calf, with a full and accurate index; and 1000 copies of the first edition were authorized to be printed, to wit, 400 by the reporter on his own account, and 600 for the use of the commonwealth, for which 600 copies the reporter was to receive out of the treasury eighty-three and a third cents for every hundred pages contained in each copy of the work.

viii The 600 copies were, by *this and a subsequent act, directed to be sold, and the money arising from such sale paid into the treasury. (n)

Francis W. Gilmer was the first reporter appointed by the court. He published a single volume, called "Virginia Reports," which embraces the decisions from April 1820 to June 1821.

Upon his resignation, Peyton Randolph was appointed. The first four volumes of Randolph's reports contain the decisions to July 1826.

By an act of assembly passed the 27th of February 1828, it was made the duty of the reporter to the court of appeals to collect and publish annually, by way of appendix to each volume of the reports of cases decided in said court, the decisions of the general court, comprising in the next volume to be published all the cases decided by the general court since the publication of the second volume of Virginia Cases. (o)

Upon the death of mr. Randolph, a change was made in the legislation on the subject. By the act of February 27, 1829, the reporter was required to secure the copy right of any volume thereafter to be published, for the benefit of the commonwealth. Seven hundred copies were directed to be published for the use of the commonwealth, and to be paid for in the manner before prescribed by law. (p)

The reports of Gilmer, Randolph, and some of their predecessors, had not been of so high an order as was to be desired. It was an object of some importance to raise the standard of the Virginia reports. And the judges now sought the services of one in the first rank of the profession, who was deemed by them better fitted than any other to attain the object in view. They proposed to Benjamin Watkins Leigh to ix *take the office, and he accepted the appointment. To obtain the time requisite for the discharge of its duties, he withdrew from practice in the court of chancery at Richmond, then a court of large business, and confined himself to the court of appeals, the general court, and the federal courts held in Richmond.

Mr. Leigh has published eleven volumes of reports, which contain the decisions of the court of appeals and general court from January 1829 to March 1841, and also those of the general court at June and December terms 1841. He has yet to publish a twelfth volume, containing the decisions of the court of appeals from March 1841 to March 1842, for which it is proper the general assembly should, at its next session, make such an appropriation as is required by the law under which he was appointed.

On the 24th of March 1842, an act was passed to change the mode of compensating the reporter, (q) which, by force of the general law, (r) commenced the first of April following. This act provides, 1. That a reporter shall be appointed by the court of appeals, as directed by the act of February 24, 1820, whose duty it shall be to prepare a manuscript copy of the reports, (with an index and references) containing all the causes decided by the court within the year, which in the opinion of the court ought to be published, and deliver the same annually to the secretary of the commonwealth. 2. That it shall be the duty of the secretary to contract for the printing and binding of 700 copies of said reports, in a style not inferior to the present reports; the proof sheets to be carefully examined and corrected by the reporter. 3. That the reporter shall receive as a compensation for the above mentioned services 1500 dollars per annum, to be paid quarterly.

Pursuant to this act, the court, on the 5th of April 1842, proceeded to appoint a reporter, and the vote being given viva voce in open court, judges Baldwin, Allen, Stanard, x Brooke and *the president voted for Benjamin Watkins Leigh, and so he was unanimously appointed. Mr. Leigh declining to accept the office, the court, on the 10th of May 1842, proceeded to make another appointment, and the vote being given viva voce in open court, the same judges voted for Conway Robinson, and he was therefore unanimously appointed.

On the 27th of February 1843, a further act was passed, (s) declaring, 1. That it shall be the duty of the reporter of the court of appeals to collect and prepare annually for publication, by way of appendix to each volume of the reports of the cases decided in the said court, the decisions of the general court made within the year; and it shall be the duty of the secretary of the commonwealth to contract for the printing of the same, in the like manner he is now directed to contract for the printing and binding of the decisions of the court of appeals. 2. That it shall be the duty of the secretary of the commonwealth to contract also for the printing and publishing, in pamphlet form, of 75 copies of the decisions aforesaid of the general court, and the judges of the general court shall each be entitled to a copy thereof.

Under these acts of the 24th of March 1842 and the 27th of February 1843, this volume of reports has been prepared. It contains all the causes decided by the court of appeals within the year ending the first of April 1843, which in the opinion of the court ought to be published, and the decisions of the general court within the same year. The decisions made from the first of April to the 10th of May 1842 were before the date of the reporter's appointment, and before the day from which he has received compensation; but he has inserted them because otherwise they would have remained unpublished by any one.

DECIDED IN THE Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.

April, 1842, Richmond.

(Absent ALLEN, J.)

Equity Jurisdiction—Set-Off against Judgment at Law.—A sale is made of a tract of land, and the terms set forth in articles of agreement executed under seal between the two vendors and the vendee. One of the vendors dies after bequeathing what is due to her, and appoints her legatee executor. A lien being alleged to exist upon the land, the surviving vendor and the executor enter into bond with surety to indemnify the vendee, who thereupon pays most of the purchase money. Afterwards the vendee is compelled to pay a considerable sum to satisfy the lien, and one of the principal obligors being out of the commonwealth, and the other insolvent, he retains for his indemnity the assets of the surety (of whose estate he is administrator) against other creditors of the surety, some of equal and others of inferior degree. An action of covenant being then brought on the articles of sale, in the name of the vendor who survived, for the benefit of the legatee of the other, against the vendee, a trial is had, upon which both parties treat the amount of assets of the surety's estate retained by the administrator, as a satisfaction pro tanto of the indemnifying bond, and the difference between the amount so retained and the sum paid to satisfy the lien being credited, a verdict is found and judgment rendered for what is supposed to be the balance due of the purchase money. On a bill in equity by the vendee, in his own right and as administrator of the surety, against the surviving vendor and the legatee of the other, shewing the foregoing facts, and that, since the judgment, debts against the surety, alleged to be of superior dignity to that upon the indemnifying bond, have been demanded of the complainant and claimed by suit, HOLD, 1. That though none of the other debts against the surety's estate should appear to be of higher dignity than the claim on the indemnifying bond, still the complainant, as administrator of the surety, is rightly in equity, to obtain satisfaction for the payment made out of the surety's estate on account of the suretyship; and one of the principals having removed from the commonwealth, and the other being insolvent, he may stay in his hands the amount due from himself personally on the judgment, in part satisfaction of the claim of the surety's estate: 2 That if any of the debts against the surety's estate shall appear to be of higher dignity than the claim against the surety on the indemnifying bond, and it shall become necessary to apply to the payment of those debts any part of the assets of the surety's estate, the complainant will for so much have a valid claim in his own right, and to that extent the injunction to the judgment should be perpetuated.

By articles of agreement entered into the 27th of September 1815, between John Ware and Polly Ware of the one part and Thomas Shores of the other part, it was witnessed that John Ware and Polly Ware had sold to Thomas Shores certain lands, to wit, 410 acres of high land and 59 acres of islands, at the following prices, to wit, 8 dollars per acre for the high land, and 60 dollars per acre for the islands; and then, after setting forth that the late Mrs. Susanna Wilcox, as administratrix of Edmund Wilcox deceased, had a mortgage on said lands (including certain land in the possession of Washington Ware), the amount of which could not then be ascertained, and that John Forbes as agent for Thompson Snodgrass & Co. had also a claim against the said lands, the amount of which could not then be ascertained, it was *agreed that John Ware and Polly Ware should ascertain, as soon as they could, the amount of said claims, and have the same certified under the hands of the claimants, and Shores should retain in his hands and pay to the respective claimants two thirds thereof (Washington Ware's part of the land being bound for the other third). The articles then provided for the execution of a deed, the payment by Shores to John and Polly Ware of the residue of the purchase money over and beyond the said two thirds, and the delivery of possession of the land.

Shores paid off the claim of Mrs. Wilcox, and also paid to John and Polly Ware part of the purchase money. Polly Ware, by her will, bequeathed the balance due to her on account of the said purchase, and almost all the rest of her estate, to her brother Washington Ware, and appointed her brothers Washington Ware and John Ware her executors, of whom Washington Ware alone qualified as such.

On the 16th of April 1818, a bond was entered into by John Ware, Washington Ware and William Pasteur to Thomas Shores, in the penalty of 4000 dollars, whereby, after reciting that it was uncertain whether the said John Forbes, attorney as aforesaid, had any legal or equitable claim on the land sold to Shores, or against Shores as the holder thereof, and that John Ware and Washington Ware, as executor of Polly Ware, were desirous of drawing out of the hands of Thomas Shores the balance of the money remaining due for the purchase of the land, the condition was that if John Ware, Washington Ware and William Pasteur should save harmless and indemnify Thomas Shores for all costs or other damages he might sustain in consequence of his paying to the said John and Washington the balance of the said money, in case the said John Forbes agent as aforesaid, or any other person on account of his claim as agent,

4 should recover any money, costs or damages of Shores *in consequence of his purchase, or otherwise interrupt him in the possession of the said land, or in consequence of his paying over to the said John and Washington the balance of the said money, then the said obligation was to be void.

A question arising at the time this bond was executed, whether Shores was bound for interest on the money while retained in his hands to satisfy the unascertained claims, this matter was not then adjusted, but Shores paid at that time 1200 dollars.

An action of covenant was afterwards brought against Shores, in the name of John Ware as surviving covenantee of John and Polly Ware, for the benefit of the estate of Polly Ware, in which action a verdict was found and judgment rendered for the plaintiff against Shores, on the 27th of October 1830, for 2026 dollars 50 cents damages, with interest from the 22d of October 1822 till paid, and the costs. The next day the defendant moved the court to set aside the verdict and judgment, and grant him a new trial, upon the ground of a mistake of the jury in the estimation of damages, committed in the calculation of payments made by the defendant. Whereupon the plaintiff by his counsel agreed to release 1579 dollars 22½ cents parcel of the damages assessed, as of the 22d of October 1822, and the defendant withdrew his application for a new trial.

On the 10th of May 1831, Thomas Shores, in his own right and as administrator of the estate of William Pasteur deceased, exhibited a bill of injunction, setting forth that the payment of 1200 dollars made at the time the indemnifying bond was given, and other payments made from time to time, fully satisfied the whole purchase money exclusive of interest; that a decree had been obtained in favour of John Forbes attorney in fact for Thompson Snodgrass & Co. subjecting the lands to sale to satisfy the same, and complainant had purchased the land at the price of 1925 dollars 57 cents, being

5 *the two thirds to which his proportion of the land was subject; that being compelled to rely on the indemnifying bond for this sum, and the principal obligors therein being unable to refund the same, and William Pasteur the surety in that bond having died in embarrassed circumstances, he had, with a view of obtaining a preferable claim to the assets over other creditors, become the administrator of Pasteur's estate, the assets of which appeared, by the report of the commissioners who had settled his accounts, to amount to about 1600 dollars, and the amount in his hands as administrator of Pasteur he had retained, by virtue of his claim on Pasteur as surety in the indemnifying bond, against other creditors of Pasteur, some of equal and others of inferior degree; that nevertheless a claim has been set up, and a verdict and judgment rendered against him, for an alleged balance upon the original purchase. To shew how that balance is made up, he refers to a statement by which the jury were guided at the time of their verdict. He insists that injustice has been done in charging him with interest upon the purchase money before it was due, and also in charging him interest on the money kept in his hands for the claimants, which money he was at all times ready and willing to pay, if certificates had been produced to him, under the hands of the claimants, of the amount of their claims, and had only failed to pay because of the failure to produce such certificates. And inasmuch as the complainant, as the administrator of the estate of Pasteur, has a just claim against Washington Ware, on account of the assets of Pasteur's estate retained by virtue of the indemnifying bond in which Pasteur was the surety of John and Washington Ware, and Washington Ware is, by virtue of the will of Polly Ware, entitled to the benefit of the judgment obtained against the complainant, (there existing, as the complainant charges, no debts whatever against 6 Polly Ware's estate,) the *complainant insists that if the estate of Polly Ware is entitled to recover any thing of him, it is equitable and just that his demand as administrator of Pasteur should be set off against the same, and the said complainant allowed to retain the same in his hands, to be applied towards satisfying the creditors of Pasteur's estate, instead of resorting to an action at law to recover the amount so due to Pasteur's estate, which, if he were so to proceed, would in all probability be unavailing, as Washington Ware is without any visible property sufficient to satisfy the demand, and John Ware some years since left the commonwealth as an absconding debtor, and is not now an inhabitant of the same. The complainant farther states that a credit for 203 dollars 12 cents was allowed by the jury, as the difference between what was supposed to be the amount of assets of Pasteur's estate, and the amount which the complainant had been compelled to pay under the decree in favour of John Forbes attorney in fact for Thompson Snodgrass & Co. This was upon the idea that the whole of the 1600 dollars would certainly be retained in the complainant's hands, towards satisfying his demand. But the complainant sets forth, that since the verdict and judgment rendered against him, a debt due from Pasteur by judgment has been demanded from him; that a scire facias is also pending against him as administrator of Pasteur, upon a recognizance of special bail; and that these debts he may be compelled to pay as debts of superior dignity to his own. The bill also sets forth that Pasteur was in his lifetime the administrator of several estates, the accounts of which have not been settled, and it is yet uncertain whether the complainant will not be compelled to pay considerable sums on account thereof. Washington Ware and John Ware are prayed to be made defendants, and an injunction is asked to the judgment against the complainant.

7 *The statement of the jury, a copy whereof was exhibited with the bill, contains no credit of the 1200 dollars paid at the time the indemnifying bond was given. The amount, including interest to the 22d of October 1822, was, according to the calculation of the jury, 2230 dollars 30 cents. Then the following credit was given: "22d October 1822. Cr. by amount due Thomas Shores by Pasteur's estate, occasioned by not receiving from said estate sufficient to pay the debt to Thompson Snodgrass & Co. for which said Pasteur was security, $203. 82." This sum being deducted, the statement concluded thus: "By this amount due W. Ware 22d October 1822, $2026. 50." And subjoined was the verdict of the jury for 2026 dollars 50 cents damages, with interest from the 22d of October 1822.

The answer of Washington Ware alleges, in general terms, that in the action at law every just claim which the complainant brought forward was allowed. While, however, it controverts those allegations in the bill which were made to shew that injustice had been done in charging interest, the other specific allegations are left uncontradicted, the payment of 1200 dollars at the time of the execution of the indemnifying bond is admitted, and it is stated that the claim of Forbes amounted, when settled, to nearly 3000 dollars.

With his answer, Washington Ware filed a statement of his claim against Shores, according to which the amount in his favour, with interest calculated to the 16th of April 1818, was 2110 dollars 11 cents. This was without any deduction on account of the lien of Forbes, or of the 1200 dollars.

Against the defendant John Ware, the plaintiff proceeded in the mode prescribed by law in relation to absent defendants.

The cause coming on to be heard before the Circuit court of Fluvanna (to which the case had been removed) that court decreed that the injunction be dissolved, and the bill dismissed with costs.

8 *Shores, in his own right and as administrator of Pasteur, petitioned this court for an appeal.

By the petition it was admitted that it did not distinctly appear in the record on what account the sum of 1579 dollars 22 cents was released as of the 22d of October 1822, but it was said to be fairly inferrible that it was the principal and interest of the 1200 dollars paid the 16th of April 1818, amounting to about 1524 dollars, and some other small item of omitted credit, or of error in the interest charged. It was, the petitioner contended, certainly not on account of the payment to Forbes, because the jury had already allowed on that account the supposed difference between this payment and Pasteur's funds in the petitioner's hands. And he insisted that in equity his right to use the payment to Forbes as a setoff against the judgment was perfectly clear, because in equity Washington Ware is principal debtor and principal creditor, and equity would not allow that the petitioner should retain the assets of the surety his intestate, and pay the claim of the principal debtor.

The appeal was allowed.

C. Johnson, for appellant.

Lyons and Patton, for appellees.

STANARD, J. The record shews with satisfactory certainty, that in ascertaining the balance for which the jury's verdict was rendered, Shores was not credited for the payment of 1200 dollars confessedly received by the party for whose benefit the suit at law was prosecuted, nor was he credited for more than 203 dollars of the amount of the lien of Forbes attorney in fact of Snodgrass; that on the trial of the case before the jury, both parties treated the amount of assets of Pasteur's estate, retained by Shores the administrator of Pasteur on account of his claim on the bond to indemnify him against *the said claim of Forbes, as a satisfaction pro tanto of that bond; and that the amount of the said lien of Forbes on the land purchased by Shores (being two thirds of the entire claim of Forbes) though not precisely shewn, was from 1800 to 2000 dollars. These facts are proved, 1st, by the statement of the appellee's claim on the covenant, which, excluding the credit for the payment of 1200 dollars, and the lien of Forbes, exhibits a balance of a little upwards of 2100 dollars. 2dly, By the statement shewing the manner in which the balance for which the verdict was rendered was ascertained. 3dly, By the uncontradicted allegations of the bill. 4thly, By the admission of the answer, that the entire claim of Forbes was about 3000 dollars. I am also satisfied, that in the adjustment of the credit which was allowed against the amount found by the verdict, the said sum of 203 dollars only was taken into account, as resulting from the lien of Forbes, and the residue of the lien was considered as covered by the assets retained of Pasteur's estate, so that the Wares have been charged with but the said 203 dollars on account of that lien. The judgment at law, then, placed the parties in this predicament: Shores was indebted on his own account to the Wares in the amount of the judgment at law, and the Wares were indebted to Shores as administrator of Pasteur, in the amount of the assets of Pasteur's estate, that he had by retainer applied in part satisfaction of the claim on Pasteur as the surety of the Wares in the indemnifying bond: and such is still their predicament, if the retainer by Shores of the assets of Pasteur's estate has not been disturbed by other creditors of Pasteur, having claims of higher dignity than the claim on the indemnifying bond. Were this still the predicament of the parties, Shores as the administrator of Pasteur was rightly in a court of equity, to obtain satisfaction of a claim of Pasteur's estate for a payment made on a suretyship for the defendants, and at all events the bill ought *not to be dismissed. As the bill suggests that one of the principals (John Ware) had removed from the commonwealth and the other was insolvent, the plaintiff had further title to stay in his hands the amount due from him personally on the judgment in favour of the Wares, in part satisfaction of the claim of Pasteur's estate, and which might become the claim of Shores in his own right, if the assets of Pasteur are charged by debts of higher dignity than that of Shores on the indemnifying bond. The bill further suggests that suits of the creditors of Pasteur are depending, in which the assets retained by Shores are claimed. The success of those suits, so far as they might withdraw the retained assets, would reinstate the claim of Shores in his own right to retain the purchase money for which the judgment was rendered, and to offset it against the judgment; and this arising since the rendition of the judgment, was an ample foundation for the title to relief in a court of equity. Had there been no other foundation for relief, the court below ought not to have dismissed the bill, but should at least have retained the injunction until the fate of the pending suits was ascertained, and to the extent that the assets retained might be charged by other creditors of Pasteur, have perpetuated the injunction. On the whole, my opinion is that the decree is erroneous, and ought to be reversed with costs, and the following entered as the decree of this court:

"The court is of opinion that it appears with sufficient certainty, that on the trial of the action in which the judgment enjoined in this case was rendered, no credit was given to the appellant in respect of the lien of Forbes attorney in fact of Snodgrass, except the sum of 203 dollars 82 cents, credited, in the statement by which the jury ascertained the balance for which the verdict was rendered, as the excess of that lien above the assets of Pasteur's estate retained by the appellant as the administrator of Pasteur, in virtue of his claim *on Pasteur as the surety in the indemnifying bond; and that the sum agreed as a credit against the amount of the verdict, was for the omission of the jury to credit the appellant 1200 dollars paid by him when the indemnifying bond was given, and for miscalculations of payments made by the appellant to the Wares, and did not include any allowance for the lien of Forbes. The court is further of opinion that instead of dissolving the injunction and dismissing the bill, the court below should have directed a commissioner to ascertain the amount of Forbes's lien, whether discharged by Shores or still outstanding, and the amount of the assets of Pasteur's estate that was retained by the appellant to indemnify or reimburse him for the lien of Forbes, and the amount (if any) that other creditors of Pasteur may have charged on the assets so retained; that for the amount of the assets so retained, so far as they have not been charged by creditors of Pasteur, the principals in the indemnifying bond (John Ware and Washington Ware) are responsible to the appellant as the administrator of Pasteur, and so far as they may have been charged by other creditors, are responsible to the appellant in his own right, and the appellant is entitled to set off these responsibilities (first, that which may accrue in his own right, and then that accruing to him as administrator of Pasteur) against the judgment, and have a perpetual injunction to the judgment to the extent of such setoff, and, for the excess (if any) of the said responsibilities above the judgment, to a decree against the said principals in the indemnifying bond, in the right in which such excess may be due to him; and that the said decree is erroneous. Decree therefore reversed with costs, injunction ordered to be reinstated, and cause remanded to circuit court for further proceedings to be had therein in conformity with the foregoing principles."

The other judges concurring, decree entered accordingly.

I. WHAT CONSTITUTE CLAIMS AGAINST DECEDENT'S ESTATE.

A. CLAIMS BASED ON CONTRACTS OF DECEDENT.

1. IN GENERAL.—“The death of a party to a contract does not extinguish the contract if it is capable of being fulfilled by his representatives, but as a general rule all contractual obligations continue as claims against the estate of the deceased obligor, and this is the rule irrespective of whether that contract be implied or express, or for the payment of money, or the performance of some act not personal.” 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1007.

Thus, where one contracted with a person since deceased to build a church, the fact that the administrator, shortly after the work was commenced, gave notice not to proceed therewith, and that the estate would not be responsible therefor, was no bar to a recovery for work afterwards done, when the church was completed according to the contract. And the fact that, before proceeding, the contractor secured the guaranty of the church trustees that he should be paid the contract price, and as much in excess of it as the work should cost, and that he then sublet the work to another, did not bar a recovery against the estate on the original contract. Ferguson v. Wills, 88 Va. 186, 13 S. E. Rep. 302.

2. PERSONAL CONTRACTS—PROMISES OF MARRIAGE.

—An action for breach of promise of marriage will not lie against the personal representative of the promisor, either at common law or under the statute, where no special damages are alleged and proved. In such case, the maxim, actio personalis moritur cum persona applies. Grubb v. Sult, 82 Gratt. 208, 34 Am. Rep. 765; Flint v. Gilpin, 29 W. Va. 740, 3 S. E. Rep. 33. See also, Burton v. Mill, 78 Va. 482.

3. JOINT CONTRACTS.—Upon the death of one or more joint promisors, his estate was, at common law, discharged from liability on the contract and the action survived against the survivor or survivors alone. 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1010; Atwell v. Milton, 4 H. & M. 253; Richardson v. Johnson, 2 Call 527; Harrison v. Field, 2 Wash. 136.

Where a joint bond was given before the act of 1786, and after that act went into operation, one of the obligors died, leaving the other, the obligation survived, and the executors of the deceased were exonerated. Elliott v. Lyell, 3 Call 208.

The surviving obligor in a joint note, made before the act of 1786, was alone liable in an action at law, nor could the note be set up in equity against the representatives of the deceased obligor, except on the ground of a moral obligation antecedently existing on his part to pay the money. Chandler v. Hill, 2 H. & M. 124.

Although the surviving partner of a mercantile house was alone liable at law to the creditors of the house, yet if the surviving partner proved insolvent, the estate of the deceased partner was liable in equity for the debts of the partnership. Sale v. Dishman, 3 Leigh 548. See Va. Code 1887, sec. 2885. In this case a quære was raised as to what kind of laches of the creditor, or dealings between him and the surviving partner, in respect to the debt claimed of the partnership, would suffice to exonerate the estate of the deceased partner from the debt. It seems that the mere delay of the creditor to assert and prosecute his demand against the surviving partner, will not suffice to exonerate the estate of the deceased partner. And there is no analogy between the duty of a creditor in such case to assert and prosecute his claim against the surviving partner, and the due diligence which the assignee of a bond is bound to exert against the obligor, in order to entitle him to recourse against the assignor.

A creditor of a firm obtained a judgment against the surviving partner, who died, and whose administrators exhausted the personal assets in paying other claims. The creditor then filed a bill in equity against the administrators and heirs of the surviving partner, and the representatives of the deceased partner. The bill sought a decree for the sale of lands of which the surviving partner died possessed, some of which belonged to himself and some to the firm; and when the funds from this source should be exhausted, then it sought to charge the representatives of the deceased partner. Held, that equity had jurisdiction of the case and that the representatives of the deceased partner were properly made defendants. Jackson v. King, 8 Leigh 689.

It seems that a bill in equity properly lies to subject the estate of a secret partner in trade to the payment of a debt contracted by the ostensible members of the firm. Cocke v. Upshaw, 6 Munf. 464.

One of two partners executed bonds in the name of the firm for firm debts. The other partner died solvent. Subsequently the surviving partner, died insolvent, the bonds remaining unpaid. The surety in the bonds was perfectly solvent. The creditor filed a bill against the surety and the representatives of the deceased partners to subject the estate of the solvent partner to the payment of the debts, or to have payment of them from the parties, according to their respective liabilities. Held, that equity was without jurisdiction to entertain such bill, as the creditor had an adequate remedy at law by action on the bonds against the surety. Linney v. Dare, 2 Leigh 588.

Statutory Liability.—In Virginia and West Virginia it is provided by statute that, “the representative of one bound, with another, either jointly or as a partner, by judgment, bond, note, or otherwise, for the payment of a debt, or the performance or forbearance of an act, or for any other thing, and dying in the lifetime of the latter, may be charged in the same manner, as such representative might have been charged, if those bound jointly or as partners, had been bound severally as well as jointly, otherwise than as partners.” Va. Code 1887, sec. 2855; W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 99, sec. 13, p. 767.

Under this statute, which appeared verbatim in the Code of 1849, ch. 144, sec. 13, it was held that where a decedent is largely indebted individually and also as partner, his real estate is equally liable for his partnership debts as for his individual debts. Ashby v. Porter, 26 Gratt. 455.

The proposition that the separate estate of a deceased partner is liable pari passu for both his individual and social debts is applied in Robinson v. Allen, 85 Va. 721, 8 S. E. Rep. 835; Pettyjohn v. Woodruff, 86 Va. 478, 10 S. E. Rep. 715.

Where a joint judgment is obtained against two defendants, and one dies, an action of debt on the judgment lies against the representative of the deceased defendant, the law respecting partitions, joint rights and obligations, 1 Rev. Code 359, being applicable to joint judgments. Roane v. Drummond, 6 Rand. 182. In the present statute, Va. Code 1887, sec. 2855, joint judgments are expressly mentioned.

The former statute concerning joint rights and obligations, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 98, sec. 3, p. 1359, did not contain the words "or as a partner," appearing in the present statute, Va. Code 1887, sec. 2855. While the former statute was in force, a sum of money was lent to a firm, and the firm was charged with it on the partnership books, but the partner with whom the transaction occurred executed by mistake a penal obligation, in the name of the firm, under seal, instead of giving merely a promissory note. One of the partners died, and those who survived him and the executors of the decedent conveyed all the effects of the firm in trust to pay the firm debts. The creditor who lent the money then filed a bill in equity against the surviving partners, the executors of the decedent, and the trustee. It was held that, although at law there would be no remedy on the sealed obligation, except against the partner who executed it, yet equity had jurisdiction to correct the mistake, and hold all the partners as much bound as if there were no seal, and that, regarding the debt as a simple contract debt of the firm, the estate of the deceased partner could not be charged, until the insolvency of the surviving partners and the deficiency of the trust subject were first established. Galt v. Calland, 7 Leigh 594.

The statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 98, sec. 3, p. 359, Va. Code 1887, sec. 2855, in relation to joint rights and obligations, though it gives an action against the personal representative of a deceased joint obligor, does not affect the principle that the defeat of the remedy against one joint obligor upon a ground not personal to himself, defeats it as to all the obligors. And in an action on a joint bond against the personal representative of a deceased obligor, a surviving obligor is an incompetent witness for the defendant. Brown v. Johnson, 13 Gratt. 644, and foot-note.

4. CONTRACTS OF SURETYSHIP.—Before the estate of the surety can be subjected to the payment of the indebtedness, the property of the principal should be first exhausted. But where the bill alleges that the principal has no estate, and the allegation is not denied, but is proven, it is not error to decree at once against the estate of the surety. Jones v. Degge, 84 Va. 685, 5 S. E. Rep. 799. See also, Penn v. Ingles, 82 Va. 65; Horton v. Bond, 28 Gratt. 815.

Where a bond is made joint, without fraud or mistake, equity will not charge the executor of the surety, who was discharged at law by his death, in the lifetime of the principal. Harrison v. Field, 2 Wash. 136. See Va. Code 1887, sec. 2855. See also, supra, "Joint Contracts."

The plaintiff, as creditor of the decedent, proved a debt against the estate, but forebore to prove a debt for which the decedent was surety, not wishing to press the principal. Twenty-five years after the latter debt was due, the principal having died insolvent, the plaintiff petitioned to be made a party to the original creditors' bill against the decedent, explaining why the debt had not been pressed, and stating that sufficient assets of the estate to pay the debt remained in the hands of the court. The debt was not barred by limitation, the war period and stay law being deducted. Held, that, in the absence of any contract sufficient to discharge the surety, and no notice to proceed against the principal having been given, the petitioner was entitled to the relief sought. Coleman v. Stone, 85 Va. 386, 7 S. E. Rep. 241.

Two sons, with their respective fathers as indorsers, executed a note to a bank for $1,500, to obtain money to start the sons in a partnership business, with the understanding and agreement between themselves, as an inducement thereto, that each son and respective father was to be responsible for one-half of such note, and not responsible for the other half, except to the bank. Before the note matured, the business, under the management of one of the sons, proved a failure. The other son then took charge of it and wound it up, realizing only $200 out of the social assets. This amount he applied on the note, leaving a balance of $1,300, which he paid out of private funds. The other son being hopelessly insolvent, the father of the latter acknowledged his liability therefor, and agreed to refund one-half of such balance. Dying without doing so, the paying son presented the same against his estate. Held, that it was properly audited against such estate, and that such agreement could be established by parol evidence, and was not subject to the statute of frauds. Faulkner v. Thomas, 48 W. Va. 148, 35 S. E. Rep. 915.

Where an executor as surety for the testator pays debts out of his own funds, he is entitled only to his ratable share of the assets to repay his advances; and by crediting himself with the full amount of such debts he commits an error to the prejudice of the other creditors having unpaid debts of equal dignity. McCormick v. Wright, 79 Va. 524.

Debt Paid by Co-surety—Amount for Which He May Prove.—The liabilities of the estate of a decedent, and the rights of his creditors, are fixed by his death. If at that time a creditor has the right to prove against his estate a debt for which the decedent and another are bound as sureties, and subsequently the co-surety pays the debt, he is substituted to the right of the creditor, and may prove the whole debt against the estate of the decedent, and receive dividends thereon until one-half of the debt is paid, although the estate of the decedent will not pay his debts in full. Pace v. Pace, 95 Va. 792, 30 S. E. Rep. 361, 4 Va. Law Reg. 171. See notes on this case, 4 Va. Law Reg., pp. 178, 257, 298, 302, 489.

5. COVENANTS.—An action of covenant by the vendee of a slave, upon a covenant of warranty, binding the vendor and his heirs, will lie against the executors, although they are not named in the covenant of warranty. Lee v. Cooke, 1 Wash. 306.

An action of covenant, upon a covenant for the quiet enjoyment of real estate and that the premises are clear of all incumbrances will lie against the executors, although they are not expressly bound. Harrison v. Sampson, 2 Wash. 155.

In a deed of bargain and sale of lands, the words "the said T. doth hereby covenant, for himself and his heirs, to and with the said B. that he the said T. will warrant and forever defend to the said B. his heirs and assigns, the title to the said parcels of land against all persons whatever," import a personal covenant of warranty, for breach of which, by eviction under judgment in ejectment, an action will lie against the administrator of the bargainor. Tabb v. Binford, 4 Leigh 132, 26 Am. Dec. 317.

An executor who prefers a claim against the estate of his testator for breach of a covenant to do a collateral thing has the burden of proof to establish the due execution of the covenant, the breach by the testator, and the amount he is entitled to recover by reason of such breach. Scott v. Porter, 99 Va. 553, 39 S. E. Rep. 220.

6. AGREEMENTS TO MAKE WILL.—Strictly speaking, an agreement to dispose of property by will cannot be specifically enforced, not in the lifetime of the party, because all testamentary papers are from their nature revocable; nor after his death, because it is no longer possible for him to make a will, yet courts of equity can do what is equivalent to a specific performance of such agreement by compelling those upon whom the legal title has descended to convey or deliver the property in accordance with its terms, upon the ground that it is charged with a trust in the hands of the heir at law, devisee, personal representatives, or purchaser, with notice of the agreement. Burdine v. Burdine, 98 Va. 515, 36 S. E. Rep. 992.

"It is * * * well settled, both in England and in this country, that while no action lies for services rendered in expectation of a legacy merely, without any contract, express or implied, yet that where there is a promise, founded upon valuable consideration, that provision will be made for the promisee by the promisor in his will, and the latter dies without making such provision, an action does lie, though the proof * * * must be clear and convincing." Rice v. Hartman, 84 Va. 251, 4 S. E. Rep. 621.

A court of equity will compel the conveyance of the legal title of land claimed under a parol gift, supported by a meritorious consideration, and by reason of which the donee has been induced to alter his condition and make expenditures of money in valuable improvements on the land. Burkholder v. Ludlam, 30 Gratt. 255, 32 Am. Rep. 608; Stokes v. Oliver, 76 Va. 72; Halsey v. Peters, 79 Va. 60. See also, Fishburne v. Ferguson, 85 Va. 321, 7 S. E. Rep. 361. But such parol gift must be definite in its terms, and clearly proved. Griggsby v. Osborn, 82 Va. 371. See also, 3 Min. Inst. (4th Ed.) 94.

One may contract to make a provision for another by will, but the evidence must be clear and convincing. The widow of the testator is not a competent witness to prove such contract and to establish the debt against the estate of her husband. Swann v. Housman, 90 Va. 816, 20 S. E. Rep. 830.

To warrant a court in decreeing specific performance of an agreement to devise land, the contract must be certain and must be clearly and satisfactorily proved. 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1020; Sprinkle v. Hayworth, 26 Gratt. 384; Cox v. Cox, 26 Gratt. 305.

A court of equity will require the most convincing proof to sustain a claim that deceased agreed to make a will in favor of claimant. Miller v. Miller, 2 Va. Dec. 97; Rice v. Hartman, 84 Va. 251, 4 S. E. Rep. 621; Swann v. Housman, 90 Va. 816, 20 S. E. Rep. 830.

Although an agreement to devise and bequeath land and personal property, in consideration of personal services to be rendered, is signed only by the intended testator, yet, if such services have been fully rendered, the agreement is binding on the party who has signed it, and will be enforced against him. Burdine v. Burdine, 98 Va. 515, 36 S. E. Rep. 992.

A person may by an oral contract bind himself to dispose of his estate by will in a particular way, and such contract will be specifically enforced in equity, provided the requirements of the statute of frauds are complied with. Hale v. Hale, 90 Va. 728, 19 S. E. Rep. 739. See Va. Code 1887, sec. 2840. See also, monographic note on "Specific Performance" appended to Hanna v. Wilson, 3 Gratt. 243.

Acts of part performance to take a parol contract out of the statute of frauds, must be of such unequivocal nature as of themselves to be evidence of the existence of an agreement; as, for example, where, under a parol agreement to sell land, the purchaser is put in possession and makes improvements. Hale v. Hale, 90 Va. 728, 19 S. E. Rep. 739. See monographic note on "Specific Performance" appended to Hanna v. Wilson, 3 Gratt. 243.

An oral agreement between two sisters to make mutual wills cannot be specifically enforced, after the death of one of them, on the ground of part performance, where there has been no further performance than the making and preserving of the wills, and the will of the decedent has been revoked by her marriage after its execution. Hale v. Hale, 90 Va. 728, 19 S. E. Rep. 739.

A promise to leave a support at the death of the promisor in consideration of services during the balance of her life to be performed by the promisee is not within the statute, Va. Code 1887, sec. 2840, clause 7, prohibiting an action upon a promise not to be performed within a year, unless in writing. Thomas v. Armstrong, 86 Va. 323, 10 S. E. Rep. 6.

An executor filed his bill to have his testator's will construed, and submitted a writing executed by the latter, to wit: "$1,000. This article is to signify that if Elliott Smith survive me, I bequeath him one thousand dollars of my property, free from any lien or incumbrance. To the above bequest I herewith set my hand and seal this first day of June, 1888. (Signed) Henry E. Smith. [Seal.]" Afterwards the testator made a will, dated December 2, 1889, disposing of his entire estate, and containing no reference to said writing or to Elliott Smith, which was duly probated. Held, said writing was not a contract, but was a will, and was revoked by the subsequent testament. Swann v. Housman, 90 Va. 816, 20 S. E. Rep. 830.

A contract by which the decedent promised to "assist" the complainant "now," and, after his death, to leave him and his family a sufficient amount to justify them in returning from a distant state to live with him, is fulfilled by the decedent's supporting them for eight years, and leaving them at his death a small property; and evidence of these promises and facts is not sufficient to entitle the complainant to a further recovery from the estate of the decedent. Rice v. Hartman, 84 Va. 251, 4 S. E. Rep. 621.

It was understood and agreed between a husband and wife, who had no children, that the survivor should have all his property for life and at his or her death it should be equally divided between his and her heirs and next of kin. The husband made his will by which he gave all his property real and personal to his wife absolutely. He died during her lifetime, and she died the following day without having made a will. Held, that equity would not enforce the agreement at the suit of the heirs of the husband against the heirs and next of kin of the wife. Sprinkle v. Hayworth, 26 Gratt. 884.

Where a father agreed to devise land to his son in consideration that the son live with him upon the land and take care of him, and instead, the son, after taking care of him for some time, left the land and entered the army, where he was killed, it was held that specific performance would not be decreed. Cox v. Cox, 26 Gratt. 805.

A court of equity will enforce a verbal promise made by a father to a son, in consideration of love and affection, to give him land, and make him a deed therefor, if the son, induced by such promise has taken possession of the land and expended on it labor and money in improvements. But if, when such gift was made, the father required the son, in a given time, to put specified improvements on the land, such requirements would be regarded as a condition precedent to the right of the son to demand a deed; and the son, before he could acquire such deed, would have to prove that he put on the land, in the time specified, the specified improvements. Frame v. Frame, 82 W. Va. 468, 9 S. E. Rep. 901.

On the 16th of April 1870, John Kerr was taken suddenly and violently ill and at his request George Kurtz and James Kreemer, who were engaged in business with him left their work and nursed him, he saying to them: "Boys leave your work and come and nurse me, and I will pay you well for it in my will;" which promise he often repeated to them during his illness, and after his recovery declared, "Money cannot pay the boys for nursing me." He made his will and bequeathed to them $1,000 each, but subsequently became angry with them and revoked the bequest. After the death of John Kerr, George Kurtz and James Kreemer brought separate actions against the executors of John Kerr for the amount promised them for their services. It was held, that since the contract as laid in the declaration was clearly proved, the only question was as to the amount of compensation, and that in estimating this the jury were not restricted to the prices usually paid nurses for their attendance upon the sick. And an instruction to the effect that it was a matter properly for the consideration of the jury, whether the bequest was made to the plaintiff in consideration of his services and in fulfillment of defendant's promise, and whether it expressed the value or estimate which the testator himself put upon the plaintiff's service to him, was not erroneous. Kerr v. Kurtz, 1 Va. Dec. 116.

7. DEBT ACKNOWLEDGED IN CODICIL.—A testator by a codicil to his will declares "I herein mention a debt of $600 I owe the Presbyterian church of Charlottesville, Virginia, and I wish it duly paid, without interest, out of my estate, to that church after my sister's death." The codicil is dated November 7, 1884. The sister died in 1896, and a suit was brought by one member of the church suing on behalf of himself and four hundred other members in 1898. There was no proof of the existence of such a debt except the statement of the codicil, and no evidence was offered against it. Held, though a church cannot take as legatee under a will, this is not a legacy, but a debt, and the codicil alone is sufficient proof of its existence. Perkins v. Seigfried, 97 Va. 444, 84 S. E. Rep. 64.

8. SERVICES RENDERED DECEDENT.—Whenever compensation is claimed for services rendered near relatives, as a father, brother, or grandfather, and the like, the law will not imply a promise of payment, and no recovery can be had unless an express contract or its equivalent is shown. A moral obligation to pay is not sufficient, but an express promise must be proved, or facts from which such promise can be reasonably inferred must be established by evidence so clear, direct and explicit, as to leave no doubt as to the undertaking and intention of the parties. This is especially so when the party sought to be charged is dead. It must be shown that the deceased intended to and did assume a legal obligation to the plaintiff for such services of such a character that it could be legally enforced against him. Generally, the services of a child, grandchild, or other near relative, are presumed to have been rendered in obedience to the promptings of affection, and not with a view to compensation. Such presumption, however, may be rebutted by positive and direct evidence to the contrary. Jackson v. Jackson, 96 Va. 165, 31 S. E. Rep. 78.

A charge made by a son-in-law for nursing his father-in-law during his last illness, where there was no contract for compensation, ought not to be allowed. Williams v. Stonestreet, 3 Rand. 559.

A daughter held the bond of her father, and prior to her death she requested him to keep her children for the debt. This he did until his death, which occurred a number of years after the death of the daughter. The bond was found among his private papers. It was held that the father should be allowed a fair compensation for maintaining the children of his daughter. Hughes v. Patterson, 91 Va. 664, 22 S. E. Rep. 485.

A mother's estate will be allowed from the father's estate for her services in boarding their children during her lifetime, although she made no charge therefor. Cary v. Macon, 4 Call 605.

Where a son, who is also the administrator of his father's estate, sues such estate for wages claimed for services rendered before his father's death, he cannot recover unless he proves an express contract, or the facts and circumstances sustained by a preponderance of testimony clearly establish an expectation or intention on the part of the father to compensate him for such services. Cann v. Cann, 40 W. Va. 138, 20 S. E. Rep. 910.

An estate was devised to a widow for life or during widowhood, and then to her children. All of the children lived with the widow on the farm, and the eldest son managed the estate until her death, a period of fifteen years. While thus engaged, he persuaded the widow to buy, out of the funds of the estate, an adjoining tract of land and took the deed to himself. At the death of the widow, the son and another administered on her estate. Held, that though the son was entitled to a reasonable compensation for his service as manager, chargeable against the widow's estate, the statute of limitations barred all recovery for such compensation, except for the five years preceding the death of the widow. Chancellor v. Ashby, 2 Pat. & H. 26.

Where medical services rendered to a woman's children are recognized by her as constituting a liability against her, her executor may, after her death, pay such bills out of her estate. Baker v. Baker, 87 Va. 180, 12 S. E. Rep. 346.

Where an executor has a claim against the estate of testator, depending on a quantum meruit only, he may exhibit a bill in equity against his co-executors and legatees, to have such claim established and fixed at a certain sum. In such case, he ought to state the claim with reasonable certainty, by setting forth his own estimate of his services; but, should he fail to do so, his bill ought not to be dismissed, but leave to amend it should be granted on motion. Baker v. Baker, 3 Munf. 222.

Collateral Agreement Partly Performed—Compensation.—Where a debtor has agreed to do a collateral thing in satisfaction of his bond to his creditor, and dies after having partially performed the agreement, the bond should not be treated as paid, but the debtor should have credit thereon for the money paid, or the value of the services rendered in pursuance of the agreement. Hughes v. Patterson, 91 Va. 664, 22 S. E. Rep. 485.

9. FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION—RECOVERY BACK OF MONEY PAID.—A husband and wife, in consideration of $1,000, sold all their interest in any property of which the wife's father might die possessed. Upon the death of the wife's father, the purchaser entered into possession of the wife's share; but, upon the husband's death, the wife filed a bill for the partition of her father's estate, claiming the property of the purchaser on the ground that the deed was a nullity as to her, and obtained a decree in her favor. Held, that the purchaser might bring assumpsit against the husband's estate to recover the $1,000, as the consideration for its payment had failed. Garber v. Armentrout, 32 Gratt. 235.

B. TORTS OF DECEDENT.—"At common law an action was abated by the death of either party, and could not be revived for or against the personal representative. If the cause of action survived, it was necessary to bring a new suit. This, however, has long since been altered by statute, and now, if the cause of action survives, the action may be revived. * * * It has sometimes been said that at common law all causes of action ex contractu survive; whereas all torts die with the person. But neither of these propositions is strictly accurate. The general rule is that rights of the former class do not survive, but the rule is not universal. Thus, for instance, a breach of promise to marry, or a breach of the implied contract of a medical practitioner, or of an attorney, to exercise skill in his profession, and other injuries of a personal nature, although arising ex contractu, that might be mentioned, constitute exceptions to the rule, unless, indeed, some special damage to the personal estate can be stated on the record. * * * Nor do all actions in tort, at common law, die with the person. The true test is, not so much the form of the action, as the nature of the cause of action. Where the latter is a tort unconnected with contract, and which affects the person only, and not the estate, such as assault, libel, slander, and the like, there the rule actio personalis, etc., applies. But where * * * the action is founded on a contract, it is virtually ex contractu, although nominally in tort, and there it survives." Lee v. Hill, 87 Va. 497, 12 S. E. Rep. 1062.

An action for breach of promise of marriage will not lie against the personal representative of the promisor, either at common law or under the statute, where no special damages are alleged and proved. In such case, the maxim actio personalis moritur cum persona applies. Grubb v. Sult, 32 Gratt. 202, 26 Am. Rep. 765; Flint v. Gilpin, 29 W. Va. 740, 3 S. E. Rep. 33. See also, Burton v. Mill, 78 Va. 482.

Trespass for the mesne profits of land, recovered in ejectment against the decedent, lies against his executor. Lee v. Cooke, Gilmer 331.

Detinue against an executor for property destroyed or converted by his testator, or in the possession of the co-executor, cannot be sustained. Allen v. Harlan, 6 Leigh 42, 29 Am. Dec. 205.

But detinue for a chattel lies against an executor as such, provided the chattel actually came into the executor's possession. Catlett v. Russell, 6 Leigh 344; Allen v. Harlan, 6 Leigh 42, 29 Am. Dec. 205; Greenlee v. Bailey, 9 Leigh 526.

And detinue for property in the possession of an executor although it was first taken and detained by the testator, is maintainable, and the judgment and process should be against the executor, and not against the estate. Allen v. Harlan, 6 Leigh 42, 29 Am. Dec. 205.

For a full discussion of the subject of detinue against an executor, see monographic note on "Detinue and Replevin" appended to Hunt v. Martin, 8 Gratt. 578.

Trover may be sustained against a personal representative as such, although the goods never came into his hands. Ferrill v. Brewis, 26 Gratt. 765. See Va. Code 1887, sec. 2655.

In Boyles v. Overby, 11 Gratt. 202, it was held that an action on the case for fraud in selling to the plaintiff an unsound slave, which he was induced to purchase by means of a false and fraudulent warranty of soundness, or by means of a fraudulent concealment of the unsoundness of the slave, could not be maintained against the personal representative of the vendor. This case, however, was disapproved in Lee v. Hill, 87 Va. 501, 12 S. E. Rep. 1062, and the true rule was said to be that, where the cause of action is a tort, unconnected with contract and affecting the person only, and not the estate, the action dies with the person; but, where the action is founded on contract it is virtually ex contractu, though nominally in tort, and in such case, the action survives.

C. CLAIMS BARRED BY LIMITATIONS AND LACHES.—On the subject of claims barred by limitations and laches, see generally, monographic note on "Limitations of Actions." See also, monographic note on "Laches" appended to Peers v. Barnett, 12 Gratt. 410.

Claimant was testatrix's physician, and while in a partnership, terminated in 1880, and while alone from 1880 to 1888, he rendered services for which no bills were ever presented. For claimant's services from 1888 to 1895, when he removed to another city, annual bills were rendered and paid, with the exception of 1894. Testatrix wrote claimant in 1895, when he moved, that it was a shame that the move had been made necessary by her failure to pay what she owed him, and if he would let her have her bill she would pay what she owed him in a short time. It was held, that the letter did not remove the bar of the statute of limitations as to the partnership and individual accounts up to 1888, since it did not refer to such accounts, but only to the unpaid bill of 1894. And the testatrix, who was still indebted to the claimant for services for 1894 and for some subsequent calls, did not remove the bar of the statute as to the old accounts by the provision in her will, made in 1897, giving to claimant, as a mark of esteem and appreciation, $100 in addition to his fees against her for his services as a physician, since she had reference only to the recent bills, and not to the old ones. Coles v. Martin, 99 Va. 222, 37 S. E. Rep. 907.

An estate was devised to a widow for life or during widowhood, and then to her children. All of the children lived with the widow on the farm, and the eldest son managed the estate until her death, a period of fifteen years. While thus engaged, he persuaded the widow to buy, out of the funds of the estate, an adjoining tract of land, and took the deed to himself. At the death of the widow, the son and another administered on her estate. Held, that though the son was entitled to a reasonable compensation for his services as manager, chargeable against the widow's estate, the statute of limitations barred all recovery for such compensation, except for the five years preceding the death of the widow. Chancellor v. Ashby, 2 Pat. & H. 26.

A court of equity will, as a rule, refuse its aid to enforce stale demands, but where the claims are not barred by the statute of limitations, the amount is certain, the transaction is not obscure, and it is not likely that injustice will be done owing to the loss of evidence or the lapse of time, and the claimant has not been guilty of such laches as should deprive him of his rights, the court will grant relief. Houck v. Dunham, 92 Va. 211, 23 S. E. Rep. 288.

In 1859, G.'s executor settled his accounts, showing a balance due the estate by him. The executor died in 1860, and an administrator d. b. n. c. t. a. of G.'s estate was appointed. In 1875, in a creditors' suit against the executor's estate, such claim was reported favorably, as a just debt owing by the executor's estate; and thereafter the same report was repeatedly made, and confirmed by the court. Held, there was no laches in asserting said claim. Green v. Griffin, 1 Va. Dec. 858.

In 1856, an executor filed a bill for a judicial settlement of his accounts as executor of his father's estate. Thereafter, and before the report of the commissioner to whom the account had been referred was returned, the executor's brother, who had filed a claim on a bond against the estate, died, and the executor became administrator of his estate. The commissioner's report was made in 1860, but exceptions thereto were never passed on, and it remained unconfirmed. No further action was taken until 1897, when the executor and nearly all of the original parties to the suit were dead, when a supplemental bill was filed, reciting the existence of the bond, alleging that it remained unpaid, and seeking its satisfaction out of land held under the executor's will, but failing to allege any excuse for the delay, and the evidence tended to show that the bond had not been paid, though the executor declared in his lifetime that it had been satisfied. Held, that, in the absence of an allegation of fraud or breach of trust, plaintiff was not entitled to relief because of laches. Covington v. Griffin, 98 Va. 124, 34 S. E. Rep. 974.

Where, in a suit for the settlement of an estate, it appears that the original plaintiff, the administrator against whom the suit was brought, and the chief cestui que trust are all dead; that the claims as to the first year's transactions arose thirty years ago; that another claim involves the settlement of accounts, running through five years, between parties who have since died; that another involves transactions covering a period of nine years, commencing more than thirty years ago, and that no books, accounts or vouchers can be produced to substantiate them,—the claims will be rejected, as barred by limitations and laches. Garland v. Garland, 2 Va. Dec. 351.

Where, on the settlement of an administrator's accounts, a balance found in his hands is ordered to be divided proportionally among creditors, a creditor cannot, twenty-one years thereafter, assert his claim in a lien creditors' suit against such administrator, instituted by other creditors of the estate.

The lapse of twenty-one years after an order directing an administrator to distribute the assets of the estate among creditors raises a presumption of payment. White v. Offield, 90 Va. 336, 18 S. E. Rep. 436.

Administration of the estate of a deceased person was granted upon the supposition that he had died without a will. Afterwards a will was discovered and proved, and administration with the will annexed was granted, the former administration being revoked. Held, that the statute of limitations began to run against the estate from the time of the qualification of the administrator with the will annexed, and not from the time of the former grant of administration. Manns v. Flinn, 10 Leigh 98.

Where a suit in equity is brought by a creditor against the personal representative of a decedent, and also against the heirs at law of the intestate, for the purpose of having the personal assets applied to the discharge of the debt, as far as they will go, and to have the real estate of the intestate sold to pay the residue, and the court takes into its own hands the administration of the assets by referring the cause to a commissioner to take an account of the debts of the intestate, the statute of limitations ceases to run against the creditors, not formal parties to the bill, the bill not being in form a creditors' bill from the date of such decree, in such a case. Woodyard v. Polsley, 14 W. Va. 211.

The statute of limitations does not run against a debt acknowledged in a codicil, and there directed by testatrix to be paid by her executor on the death of her sister, till the sister's death. Perkins v. Seigfried, 97 Va. 444, 34 S. E. Rep. 64.

A clause in a will directing all just debts to be paid will not save a debt which is barred by the statute of limitations. Braxton v. Wood, 4 Gratt. 25; Tazewell v. Whittle, 18 Gratt. 329; Baylor v. Dejarnette, 18 Gratt. 152.

A devise of real estate for the payment of debts will not affect the operation of the statute of limitations upon such debts, whether they are barred at the time of the testator's death or not, unless the contrary intention on the part of the testator plainly appears. Johnston v. Wilson, 29 Gratt. 384. In expressing the opinion of the court in this case, STAPLES, J., says: "In some of the earlier cases (see Lewis v. Bacon, 3 H. & M. 89; Chandler v. Hill, 2 H. & M. 124; Brown v. Griffiths, 6 Munf. 450), it was held that a devise for the payment of debts had the effect of reviving debts already barred by limitations; but this doctrine has been long since exploded, and it is now held that such a devise does not take a debt out of the operation of the statute. Burcke v. Jones, 2 Ves. & Beam. 275; 7 John. Ch. R. 298; Tazewell v. Whittle, 18 Gratt. 329; Baylor v. Dejarnette, 18 Gratt. 152; 1 Rob. Prac. 346." See Va. Code 1887, sec. 2924.

If the creditor relies upon a charge in a will to prevent the operation of the statute, it is for him to show that the testator died before his debt was barred. Tazewell v. Whittle, 18 Gratt. 329.

Where a testator directs his executors to sell a certain farm, and out of the proceeds to pay, first, the debts of one of his sons on which another of his sons is surety, the executors cannot pay any such debt which before payment becomes barred by the statute of limitations, when the statute is relied on by the debtors. Dunn v. Renick, 33 W. Va. 476, 10 S. E. Rep. 810.

Duty of Executor or Administrator to Plead Statute.—The statute providing that an executor or administrator shall have no credit for a claim which he pays knowing the facts whereby recovery could be prevented, does not require him to plead the statute of limitations to a claim apparently barred, where he knows facts making the statute inapplicable. Radford v. Fowlkes, 85 Va. 820, 8 S. E. Rep. 817.

How Statute of Limitations May Be Set Up.—An administrator may interpose the bar of the statute of limitations by a plea or answer, or by exceptions to the report of the commissioner. Leith v. Carter, 83 Va. 889, 5 S. E. Rep. 584; Smith v. Pattie, 81 Va. 654. On this subject, see generally, monographic note on "Limitations of Actions."

"The same strictness of pleading is not required in equity as at law. It is not common to plead the statute specially or formally in equity; but only to rely upon it in general terms in the answer. The only reason for requiring the defence to be made by plea or answer is that the plaintiff may have an opportunity, if he can, to take the case out of the operation of the statute. Tazewell v. Whittle, 13 Gratt. 329." Coles v. Martin, 99 Va. 223, 37 S. E. Rep. 907.

The defence of the statute of limitations to a claim asserted before a commissioner in chancery may be made by an exception to the commissioner's report. The mere fact that, subsequently, the claimant asserts his claim by a petition filed in the cause, upon which no process issues, does not render it necessary to make the issue of the bar of the statute again. Coles v. Martin, 99 Va. 223, 37 S. E. Rep. 907.

But the statute of limitations cannot be availed of in a court of equity by demurrer to the bill, for the demurrer does not apprise the plaintiff of the intention of the defendant to rely on the bar of the statute, and affords him no opportunity to reply any facts that might take the claim asserted in the bill out of the operation of the statute. Hubble v. Poff, 98 Va. 646, 37 S. E. Rep. 277. See Coles v. Martin, 99 Va. 223, 37 S. E. Rep. 907.

The statute of limitations may be relied on before the commissioner, even where it has not been pleaded before the court prior to the order of reference. Woodyard v. Polsley, 14 W. Va. 211.

If the statute of limitations has not been specially pleaded in the cause, and has not been relied on before the commissioner, and the commissioner failed to recognize the statute, or disregard it, and no exception was endorsed upon the report for that reason, the appellate court will consider the statute of limitations out of the case, although the report, upon its face shows, that some of the claims allowed by the commissioner were barred by the statute. Woodyard v. Polsley, 14 W. Va. 211.

Estoppel of Heir to Plead Statute of Limitations.—An heir cannot oppose a credit allowed an executrix for debts paid on the ground that at the time of payment they were barred by the statute of limitations, where he had agreed, in consideration of concessions made him by the other heirs and administratrix, not to object to payment by her of any just claims though they might be barred by the statute. Radford v. Fowlkes, 85 Va. 820, 8 S. E. Rep. 817.

Power of Executor or Administrator to Waive Bar.—A debt which is barred by the statute of limitations at the death of the debtor, cannot be revived by the promise of the personal representative to pay it. Seig v. Acord, 21 Gratt. 365; Brown v. Rice, 26 Gratt. 407; Brown v. Rice, 76 Va. 629; Smith v. Pattie, 81 Va. 654; Switzer v. Noffsinger, 82 Va. 518; Va. Code 1887, sec. 2923.

On the trial of an issue on the assumpsit of the testator within five years, repeated promises by the executor cannot be given in evidence to prevent the operation of the statute of limitations. Fisher v. Duncan, 1 H. & M. 563, 3 Am. Dec. 605.

An administrator cannot, by the acknowledgment in pleading of a debt against his decedent which is barred by the statute of limitations, or in any other way, remove the bar of that statute. Stiles v. Laurel Fork Oil & Coal Co., 47 W. Va. 838, 85 S. E. Rep. 986; W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 104, sec. 9, p. 777.

But a personal representative "may, as in Bishop v. Harrison, 2 Leigh 537, where the debt is known to be just and is about to be barred, after the death of the testator or intestate, make a promise to pay, which will prevent the operation of the statute." Smith v. Pattie, 81 Va. 654.

Although it is generally true, that an executor or administrator cannot create a new cause of action against the estate, yet he may make a valid promise to pay a debt not barred by the statute of limitations, out of the assets of the estate, upon which a suit may be maintained. Braxton v. Harrison, 11 Gratt. 30.

Same—Requisites of New Promise to Remove Bar.—A new promise to remove the bar of the statute of limitations must be determinate and unequivocal; and to imply a promise of payment from a subsequent acknowledgment, such acknowledgment, must be an unqualified admission of a subsisting debt which the party is liable for and willing to pay. Coles v. Martin, 99 Va. 223, 37 S. E. Rep. 907; Switzer v. Noffsinger, 82 Va. 518. See Bell v. Crawford, 8 Gratt. 110, and foot-note. See also, Tazewell v. Whittle, 13 Gratt. 329, and foot-note; monographic note on "Limitations of Actions."

An acknowledgment in writing, to operate as a new promise to remove the bar of the statute of limitations, must be a clear and definite acknowledgment of a precise sum, plainly importing a willingness and liability to pay, not in any wise conditional, or by way of compromise or attempt at settlement. Stiles v. Laurel Fork Oil & Coal Co., 47 W. Va. 838, 85 S. E. Rep. 986.

The fact that the creditor has furnished the executor, at his request, with a statement of his debt, to which the executor makes no objection, will not remove the bar of the statute. Tazewell v. Whittle, 13 Gratt. 329.

D. FUNERAL EXPENSES.—It seems that an action will not lie against a personal representative as such for the funeral expenses of his testator or intestate. Fitzhugh v. Fitzhugh, 11 Gratt. 300, 62 Am. Dec. 658; Daingerfield v. Smith, 83 Va. 91, 1 S. E. Rep. 599.

E. EXPENSES OF ADMINISTRATION.—As to what constitute expenses of administration, and as to the right of an executor or administrator to be allowed credit for such expenses, see monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

Reasonable fees of counsel may be paid by an executor or administrator out of the assets, as part of the expense of administration, and, if not paid by him, are a lawful charge on the assets. Crim v. England, 46 W. Va. 480, 83 S. E. Rep. 810.

Counsel fees and expenses incurred in taking depositions in support of a claim are not proper charges against the estate of a decedent. Garland v. Garland, 2 Va. Dec. 351.

F. IMPROVEMENTS.—Where a decedent allowed his son to plant an orchard and put other costly improvements on a farm as though it belonged to the son, it was inequitable, on settling decedent's estate, to charge the son with full rental value of the farm, and allow him to set off merely the cost of the trees and the planting thereof, without regard to their value when in full bearing, and the care and attention bestowed on them for years. Lightner v. Speck, 2 Va. Dec. 557.

Upon a bill by a single creditor against the administrator and heirs of a decedent for the sale of the decedent's real estate to pay debts, an account was ordered, and a portion of the land was sold. One of the heirs purchased the interest of the other heirs remaining unsold, and made valuable improvements thereon. It was afterwards found necessary to sell all the land to pay the debts. Held, that the heir was not entitled to an allowance for the improvements under Va. Code 1878, ch. 132. Hurn v. Keller, 79 Va. 415.

In a suit to settle a decedent's estate, one of the decedent's sons filed a cross bill setting up a claim to a farm under a parol agreement with the decedent, who had permitted him to take possession and make valuable improvements. The claim was not sustained, and cross complaint was charged with rent of the farm, and allowed a certain sum for improvements, the evidence as to the value thereof being unsatisfactory and conflicting. Held, that the court should have dismissed the cross complaint without attempting to adjust the accounts between cross complainant and deceased, thereby leaving them where they had, by their manner of dealing, placed themselves. Lightner v. Speck, 2 Va. Dec. 557.

G. LOANS OR ADVANCES TO ESTATE.—In some cases where money has been paid for a deceased person, an action for such money will lie against the personal representative as such; as where money has been paid by a joint surety. Fitzhugh v. Fitzhugh, 11 Gratt. 300, 62 Am. Dec. 653. See supra, "Contracts of Suretyship."

Where a bill was brought against an administratrix to enforce an agreement to give the complainant certain of the real estate of her intestate, in consideration that he would effect a compromise of certain claims against the estate, it was held that he stood on the same footing as a vendee, and might properly be allowed as damages for the nonperformance of the agreement, in addition to his advances and interest, the commission of 10 per cent. for extra trouble in collecting the debts which the law would have allowed her. Shepherd v. Hammond, 3 W. Va. 484.

It is error to overrule a demurrer to a petition in equity, by a commissioner to sell real estate, against unpreferred creditors, to recover back payments made by him to them voluntarily, in good faith, and with full knowledge of outstanding preferred claims, to pay which said money is sought to be recovered. Findlay v. Trigg, 83 Va. 539, 3 S. E. Rep. 142.

An administrator made a verbal promise to an agent employed to collect a debt from the estate, that if the agent would pay the amount to his principal, the administrator would repay him with interest. The agent accordingly paid the principal the debt, and the administrator afterwards refunded to the agent the sum paid with interest. Held, that the payment by the agent was a payment by the administrator for which he was entitled to credit at the date thereof, whatever might be the time the amount was repaid to the agent. Morrow v. Peyton, 8 Leigh 54.

Payments by Executor Out of Individual Funds.—As to the right of an executor or administrator to credit in the settlement of his accounts for payments made by him on the debts of the decedents, see generally, monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

An executor having exhausted the personal estate in payment of debts, and being largely in advance to the estate for payment of debts which bind the heirs, is entitled to stand in the place of creditors whose debts he has paid, and charge the real estate. And the real estate in the hands of the devisees is liable in proportion to its value at the death of the testator. Gaw v. Huffman, 12 Gratt. 628.

Ex parte accounts of executors or administrators are not evidence at all of over-payments by them, or that the claims stated in such accounts were debts justly due by the deceased, and chargeable upon his real assets. If an executor or administrator, after exhausting the assets which properly come into his hands, pays debts of the decedent out of his own estate, he can only claim to be substituted to the rights of the creditor, and must prove his demand by the same kind of evidence that would be demanded of the original creditor. Leavell v. Smith, 99 Va. 374, 38 S. E. Rep. 262, 7 Va. Law Reg. 191.

The payment of the debts of his decedent, which were created before the war, by an administrator, out of his own funds collected from debts due him prior to the war, in Greenbrier county, in the years 1862 and 1863, at the instance and request of the widow and heirs, and with a view to save the real estate from being sold during the war (the personalty being exhausted), in confederate treasury notes, is a valid payment or advancement, for which the administrator is entitled to be reimbursed out of the real estate descended. Surber v. Kent, 5 W. Va. 96.

Where an executor as surety for the testator pays debts out of his own funds, he is entitled only to his ratable share of the assets to repay his advances; and by crediting himself with the full amount of such debts he commits an error to the prejudice of the other creditors having unpaid debts of equal dignity. McCormick v. Wright, 79 Va. 524. See supra, "Contracts of Suretyship."

Where an executor as surety for a distributee pays a judgment against the distributee, he is entitled to set off in equity the amount so paid, against the distributive share of the distributee, and the distributee is not a competent witness to testify concerning the judgment, the executor being dead. Boyd v. Townes, 79 Va. 118.

Upon a bill filed by an administrator to recover advances by him to pay specialty debts against the intestate, the account of the administrator, settled ex parte before auditors, and reported and recorded, is not evidence against the heirs. Street v. Street, 11 Leigh 498.

An executor has no power to borrow money and charge the estate of his testator with it, unless such power is conferred by the will. Legatees cannot be charged with money so borrowed without their consent and approval, and a subsequent recognition thereof and promise to pay is without consideration and ineffectual. Robertson v. Breckinridge, 98 Va. 569, 37 S. E. Rep. 8.

H. SUPPORT FURNISHED DECEDENT'S FAMILY.—In assumpsit against an executor in his individual character for the price of goods sold and delivered to him for the use of his testator's widow and legatees, upon evidence being given of such sale and delivery of a promise by the defendant to pay for goods out of his testator's estate and of assets sufficient for that purpose, the plaintiff may recover although the promise was not in writing. Collins v. Row, 10 Leigh 114.

I. TAXES.—"Taxes upon real estate due at the time of the death of the owner of the land constitute a claim against his estate, and are payable from his personal estate, instead of being merely a lien on the land. Taxes, however, accruing after the death of the owner do not constitute a debt against his estate, but are to be paid by the devisee, heir or purchaser of the land." 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1032. See Breckinridge v. Breckinridge, 98 Va. 561, 31 S. E. Rep. 892.

It is provided in Virginia by statute, Va. Code 1849, § 57, p. 189, Va. Code 1887, § 474, that the land of a decedent shall be charged to the estate until it can be properly charged to the heir or devisee, and that while so charged the taxes are payable out of the personal estate. Under this statute it was held that, where an administrator was a party to a suit for the partition of the intestate's land, and the land was not charged for taxation on the land book until after the decree confirming its partition, the administrator should be allowed credit for payment of the taxes which accrued before the decree confirming the partition, but not for those which accrued after the decree. Dillard v. Dillard, 77 Va. 820.

A testator devised his estate, real and personal, to his wife for life; but requested her, at her discretion, to make suitable advancements to his children as they became of age or married. He directed that, at the death of his wife, so much of his estate as remained in her hands should be equally divided among his children, taking into consideration advancements made. She kept the property together and managed it for the benefit of herself and children for a number of years, and then the property was divided among the children, on the basis of a partition reported to the court some years before, but never acted on. While the whole was in the possession of the widow, taxes accrued on the property, which were paid by the executor. No objection was made at the time to the payment of the taxes. This suit was brought thirty years afterwards. Held, that under the facts of this case, it was not error to credit the executor by the taxes so paid, and that it will be presumed that what was done was the result of a family arrangement. Breckinridge v. Breckinridge, 98 Va. 561, 31 S. E. Rep. 892.

If the heirs permit real estate to be returned delinquent for the nonpayment of taxes, and the executors pay the taxes to prevent the loss of the land, they will be entitled, as against the residuary legatees, to credit for the taxes so paid, whether or not the executors, having a naked power to sell, were under a duty to pay such taxes. Dunn v. Benick, 33 W. Va. 476, 10 S. E. Rep. 810.

Where a written contract for land has been made, and the vendee dies, and the vendor of the land is compelled to pay taxes incurred after the death of the vendee to prevent the sheriff from selling it for delinquent taxes, the heirs and not the administrator of the vendee are bound to refund to the vendor the taxes so paid. Creigh v. Boggs, 19 W. Va. 240.

The state has no lien, under Va. Code 1873, ch. 126, sec. 25, on a decedent's estate for taxes collected by him as a tax collector of the state and not accounted for, but only for taxes assessed upon him during his lifetime. Spilman v. Payne, 84 Va. 435, 4 S. E. Rep. 749.

J. AUTHORITY OF PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVE TO BIND ESTATE.—An order drawn upon the executor of an estate by a legatee, when not a valid charge against the estate, does not become such by its acceptance by the executor; he having no authority to bind the estate by executing any evidence of indebtedness. Staples v. Staples, 85 Va. 76, 7 S. E. Rep. 199.

A note, executed by an executor for the amount of the principal and accrued interest of a debt due by the estate, was allowed to run two years, when the interest then due was added to the amount of the note, and the whole embraced in a judgment, which was confessed by the executor. Held, that the executor having no authority by virtue of his office to bind the estate to the payment of compound interest, the estate should be charged only with the principal sum originally due, with simple interest at the legal rate. Staples v. Staples, 85 Va. 76, 7 S. E. Rep. 199.

Where a personal representative confesses judgment on condition that if the demand be improper it shall be corrected, the estate is entitled to credit on the judgment to the extent that the demand is improper. Staples v. Staples, 85 Va. 76, 7 S. E. Rep. 199.

It is the duty of an administrator to protect the estate of his decedent by interposing every legal defence, and he cannot by an agreement in pais, where infants are concerned and are made parties, either obtain commissions as administrator, to which he is not entitled by statute, or provide for the allowance of claims against said estate without proof of their correctness and validity. Crotty v. Eagle, 85 W. Va. 143, 13 S. E. Rep. 59.

II. ORDER OF PAYMENT OF DEBTS.

A. CLASSIFICATION OF DEBTS.

1. IN GENERAL.

At Common Law.—"At common law the personal representative was required to pay the claims against the estate of the decedent in the following order: (1) The necessary funeral expenses, the extent of which was fixed by the condition and rank of the decedent; (2) the necessary expenses of the administration; (3) debts of record due to the crown; (4) debts of record due to subjects, which included judgments, decrees, statutes, recognizances; (5) debts by specialty, founded upon valuable consideration, and debts for rent; (6) simple contract debts based upon valuable consideration; (7) voluntary bonds or covenants; (8) other voluntary debts." 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1034.

In Moon v. Pasteur, 4 Leigh 85, it was held that a debt due by recognizance of special bail, is of higher dignity than a debt due by specialty, and should have preference accordingly in the administration of the assets of a decedent. But under the statute, debts of record, of specialty, and by simple contract, are all brought into one class. Va. Code 1887, § 2660; W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 85, § 25, p. 733.

By Statute.—It is provided in Virginia by statute that "where the assets of the decedent in the hands of his personal representative after the payment of funeral expenses and charges of administration are not sufficient for the satisfaction of all demands against him they shall be applied. First To claims of physicians not exceeding fifty dollars, for services rendered during the last illness of the decedent, and accounts of druggists not exceeding the same amount for articles furnished during the same period. Second. To debts due the United States and this state. Third. To taxes and levies assessed upon the decedent previous to his death. Fourth. To debts due as trustee for persons under disabilities, as receiver or commissioner under decree of a court of this state, as personal representative, guardian, or committee, where the qualification was in this state, in which class of debts shall be included a debt for money received by husband acting as such fiduciary in right of his wife. Fifth. To all other demands except those in the next class; and Sixth. To voluntary obligations." Va. Code 1887, § 2660, as amended by Acts 1895-6, p. 289.

The W. Va. statute provides that, "where the assets of the decedent in the hands of his personal representative, after the payment of funeral expenses and charges of administration, are not sufficient for the satisfaction of all demands against him, they shall be applied—First. To debts due the United States; secondly. Taxes and levies assessed upon the decedent previous to his death; thirdly. Debts due as personal representative, guardian or committee, where the qualification was in this state, in which debts shall be included a debt for money received by a husband acting as such fiduciary in right of his wife; fourthly. All other demands ratably, except those in the next class; fifthly. Voluntary obligations." W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 85, sec. 25, p. 733.

These statutes direct that debts shall be paid in the order of their classification, and those of any one class are to be paid ratably when there is not enough to pay them in full. But a personal representative who, after twelve months from his qualification, pays a debt of his decedent, shall not thereby be personally liable for any demand against the decedent of equal or superior dignity, whether of record or not, unless before the payment he had notice of the demand. Va. Code 1887, sec. 2661; W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 85, sec. 25, p. 733. These provisions, however, do not affect any lien acquired in the decedent's lifetime. Va. Code 1887, sec. 2662. See Trevillian v. Guerrant, 31 Gratt. 525.

Under section 25, ch. 85, and section 3, ch. 86 of the Code of West Virginia, it is error for the court to take a debt proved as a general debt against an estate, under the fourth clause of said section 25, out of said class, and postpone it to the payment of the other debts of the same dignity and class. The payment of all such debts must be pro rata. Gardner v. Gardner, 47 W. Va. 368, 34 S. E. Rep. 792.

A trustee under a will for the benefit of infant children died in 1865, indebted to the trust, and his executor paid the other trustee in the will a portion of the debt. Upon settlement of the estate of the deceased trustee in 1877, it appeared that he was largely indebted for more than his assets. It was held that, under the statute (Va. Code 1860, ch. 131, sec. 25), in force at the time of the trustee's death, his debt as trustee was not embraced in the third class of creditors provided for in that act; but must be placed in the fourth class, with the general creditors; and that his executor was not entitled to a credit in his administration account for the amount of the trust debt he had paid. In this case it was also held that the Act of July 1870, Va. Code 1873, ch. 126, sec. 25, which amended the former law by inserting in the third class "debts of trustee for persons under disabilities," was only prospective in its operation, and did not authorize the placing of the decedent's debt as trustee in the third class, though the estate was not distributed until this last act went into operation. Price v. Harrison, 31 Gratt. 114.

2. PARTICULAR CLASSES OF DEBTS.

a. Funeral Expenses.—In Virginia and West Virginia, the funeral expenses and the costs of administration are placed in the same class. These debts are given preference over all other classes of obligations. Va. Code 1887, sec. 2660; W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 85, sec. 25, p. 733. See supra, "What Constitutes Claims against Decedent's Estate."

b. Expenses of Administration.—Executors and administrators ought to be allowed in their accounts all reasonable charges and disbursements for the benefit of the estate they represent and a reasonable recompense for their personal trouble, in preference to the claim of any creditor of the estate. Nimmo v. Com., 4 H. & M. 57, 4 Am. Dec. 488.

In Virginia and West Virginia the expenses of administration are now ranked by statute with the funeral expenses, and are given preference over all other demands against the estate. Va. Code 1887, sec. 2260; W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 85, sec. 25, p. 733.

As to what constitute expenses of administration, see monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

c. Expenses of Last Illness.—In Virginia by statute, the expenses of the last illness rank next after the funeral expenses, and costs of administration. Va. Code 1887, sec. 2660.

d. Judgments.—A judgment lien, obtained in the lifetime of a decedent and which attached during his life to real estate, of which he died seized and possessed, has priority over the funeral expenses of said decedent so far as regards the disposition of the proceeds of the real estate upon which the lien has attached. The court feels warranted in holding that even at common law a lien upon personal property, obtained in the lifetime of a decedent, has superiority over a claim for the payment of funeral expenses out of that property; and this is true although by the death of the decedent such personal property comes into the hands of the personal representative. The latter takes the property cum onere, and has no greater rights therein than his decedent. Chapters 119 and 120 of the Code of 1887 are codified enactments of the common law for administering the assets, real and personal, of deceased persons, with such innovations and amendments as the legislature has thought wise to engraft upon the law of the commonwealth. Construing these chapters in this light, it is clear that the liens obtained in the lifetime of a decedent, whether upon his real or personal property, are paramount to all other claims whatsoever, attaching thereon after his death. Wood v. Wood, 5 Va. Law Reg. 395.

A judgment obtained during the life of an intestate is a lien upon his lands in the hands of his heirs for the payment thereof, and was held to be entitled to priority of payment out of the proceeds of the sale thereof over a simple contract creditor, who acquired no equal or superior lien for his debt upon the realty during the life of the debtor. Laidley v. Kline, 8 W. Va. 218.

A judgment recovered by a creditor against an administrator is not a lien on the realty of the intestate. Woodyard v. Polsley, 14 W. Va. 211; Laidley v. Kline, 8 W. Va. 218.

An executor must at his peril take notice of a judgment against his testator, in whatever court it may have been rendered; and if he exhausts the assets by paying debts of inferior dignity, he must satisfy such judgment de bonis propriis. Nimmo v. Com., 4 H. & M. 57, 4 Am. Dec. 488; Mayo v. Bentley, 4 Call 528. Under the present statute, debts of record, of specialty, and by simple contract, are all brought into one class. Va. Code 1887, sec. 2660; W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 85, sec. 25, p. 733.

In Mayo v. Bentley, 4 Call 528, it was held that an administrator who had no notice of a specialty debt might pay or confess judgment to a simple contract creditor. Under the present statute, these debts are brought into the same class. Va. Code 1887, sec. 2660; W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 85, sec. 25, p. 733.

A commissioner appointed to ascertain the debts of a decedent, and their order of priority, has no authority to go behind a judgment rendered against the decedent in his lifetime; and since Acts Va. 1885-86, ch. 171, §§ 1, 2, provide for setting up the fact of a confederate transaction only as a defence to a suit while pending, so as to reduce the judgment to be rendered, the action of the commissioner in scaling the judgment as a confederate transaction will not affect the judgment creditor, who was not a party to and had no notice of the proceedings. Marshall v. Cheatham, 88 Va. 31, 13 S. E. Rep. 308.

c. Specialty Debts.—A mere recital, in a deed of trust, that the cestuis que trustent are liable as indorsers for the maker of the deed, and that he is willing to indemnify them from all loss in consequence of their becoming indorsers, by conveying property for that purpose, was held not to entitle the indorsers to rank as specialty creditors in the administration of the personal assets of the maker. Powell v. White, 11 Leigh 309. Under the present statute, debts of record, of specialty, and by simple contract, are all brought into one class. Va. Code 1887, sec. 2660; W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 85, sec. 25, p. 733.

f. Fiduciary Debts.—Moneys collected by deputies of a deceased insolvent sheriff on the tax bills due to the state placed in their hands, and which they acknowledged and paid over, as the state's money, to the personal administrator of such deceased sheriff, to be paid through him into the treasury of the state, were properly paid over, by the administrator to the state, to the exclusion of the other creditors of the decedent, in accordance with the doctrine of "ear-marking." Spilman v. Payne, 84 Va. 435, 4 S. E. Rep. 749.

An English executor collected the assets of his testator's estate in England, and brought them with him to Virginia, where he died, having never qualified in Virginia. Held, that the debt due his testator's estate was entitled, in the administration of his own estate, to priority over all his other debts. Tunstall v. Pollard, 11 Leigh 1.

Where the husband of an executrix administered the estate as executor in his wife's right, wasted the assets, and died, leaving the executrix still surviving him, it was held that the waste committed by the husband during the coverture did not constitute a debt due from him to the testator's estate, which was entitled to preference in the administration of his own estate over his own proper debts, under the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, sec. 60. Henrico Justices v. Turner, 6 Leigh 116. See, however, Va. Code 1887, sec. 2660; W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 85, sec. 25, p. 733.

The statute, Va. Code 1880, ch. 131, sec. 25, preferring debts due as "personal representative, guardian, or committee," did not include a debt due as trustee of infant cestuis que trustent. Price v. Harrison, 31 Gratt. 114. See, however, Va. Code 1887, sec. 2660.

There is no priority given by the statute to a debt due as administrator over a lien created by judgment in the lifetime of the judgment debtor, who is also the administrator. Alderson v. Henderson, 5 W. Va. 183.

A guardian had a settlement with his ward upon the ward's coming of age, and, being found indebted on his account as guardian in the sum of $3,000, he executed to the ward four bonds, each for $750, payable in one, two, three and four years, with interest. The guardian paid the interest during his life, and a part of the principal, and was up to the war able to pay the whole. Held, that the giving and taking of these bonds was not a novation of the debt, but the debt due from the guardian to the ward continued to be a fiduciary debt and entitled to rank as such in the administration of the guardian's estate. Smith v. Blackwell, 31 Gratt. 291, and foot-note. See also, Hamlin v. Atkinson, 6 Rand. 574; Yerby v. Lynch, 3 Gratt. 460, and note, p. 565.

The statute of 1705, ch. 33, sec. 13, giving preference to debts due from deceased executors to their testator's estates, in the administration of the estates of such executors, was not repealed by the statute of 1748, ch. 4, sec. 13, notwithstanding the general repealing clause therein contained, or by the statute of 1785, ch. 61, sec. 50, or by the revised statute of 1792; the statutes subsequent to that of 1705 containing nothing inconsistent with it and being only cumulative. Tunstall v. Pollard, 11 Leigh 1.

A statute giving preference to debts due by a decedent as executor applies not only to debts of decedents who were appointed executors by the state giving such preference, but also to debts due by a foreign executor. Tunstall v. Pollard, 11 Leigh 1.

The statute preferring fiduciary debts is only prospective in its operation, and does not affect the distribution of the estate of a decedent who died before the passage of the act. Price v. Harrison, 31 Gratt. 114.

In a suit for the administration of a decedent's estate, the commissioner classified the debt of J. among the general creditors of the decedent, and a decree was entered confirming the report and distributing a fund in court pro rata among the creditors. There were several other decrees for accounts of further debts of the decedent, and still a fund in court to be distributed, when J. made himself a defendant in the suit and filed his petition insisting that his was a fiduciary debt. Held, that the decree confirming the report was an interlocutory decree, and J. was not concluded from setting up his claim as a fiduciary creditor of the estate. Smith v. Blackwell, 31 Gratt. 291.

g. Taxes.—The preference in favor of the state is only given to taxes assessed against the decedent in his lifetime. The state has no priority, under the statute, against a decedent's estate for taxes collected by the decedent, as a collector of taxes, and not accounted for. Spilman v. Payne, 84 Va. 435, 4 S. E. Rep. 749.

The lien of the commonwealth as purchaser at a sale for delinquent taxes accruing on realty after the death of the owner is superior to the rights of creditors of the owner whose claims arose prior to his death, and were reduced to judgment after that event, and before the taxes were assessed. Commonwealth v. Ashlin, 95 Va. 145, 28 S. E. Rep. 177.

h. Partnership Debts.—Where a party who is a member of an insolvent partnership is indebted on his individual account to different parties, and dies, the social assets are applicable first to the social debts, and, if insufficient, the social creditors come in as general creditors pari passu with separate creditors of the same class upon the separate estate of the deceased partner. Freeport Stone Co. v. Carey, 42 W. Va. 276, 26 S. E. Rep. 183; Pettyjohn v. Woodruff, 86 Va. 478, 10 S. E. Rep. 715. See also, Robinson v. Allen, 85 Va. 721, 8 S. E. Rep. 835; Ashby v. Porter, 26 Gratt. 455; Morris v. Morris, 4 Gratt. 293.

In Pettyjohn v. Woodruff, 86 Va. 478, 10 S. E. Rep. 715, FAUNTLEROY, J., thus states the rule in Virginia for the application of the social and separate assets as between the social and separate creditors: "Whatever may have been the rule in other states, independently of statute law, the law of Virginia is, that the legal effect of the partnership is, to set apart or dedicate the social assets as a fund for the payment of the social debts, for the mutual protection of the partners inter se (subject to the right of the partners, while all alive, by consent, to vary that dedication, as in Shackelford v. Shackelford, 32 Gratt. 481), and for any unpaid balance due them the social creditors come in as general creditors, pari passu, with the separate creditors of the same class, upon the separate estate of the deceased partner. This principle has the sanction of the deliberate and unanimous decision of this court in Ashby v. Porter, 26 Gratt. 465, and an implicit legislative adoption of section 2855, Code of 1887, taken, word for word, from section 18, chapter 144, Code of 1849, with the construction which it had received by this court, and that construction has been followed and reaffirmed by this court in the case of Robinson v. Allen, 85 Va. 721, 8 S. E. Rep. 835."

In Robinson v. Allen, 85 Va. 721, 8 S. E. Rep. 835, it was held that, where the assets of the estate of a deceased partner are not sufficient to pay all the debts of the estate in full, the statute, Va. Code 1887, sec. 2885, which makes the representative of a deceased partner liable for the firm debts to the same extent that he would have been if the debts had been contracted by the partners severally as well as jointly, does not affect the order in which such assets should be applied to the payment of debts under Va. Code 1887, § 2660. See Ashby v. Porter, 26 Gratt. 455.

In Morris v. Morris, 4 Gratt. 293, the court did not pass upon the question (since decided in the cases above set out) as to whether a joint or partnership creditor is entitled to share in the separate estate of his debtor with the separate creditors of such debtor, but it was held that where a debtor partner by his will subjects his real estate to the payment of his debts, the partnership creditor is entitled to share with the separate creditors in such fund. In this case it was also held that where two partners give their joint and several bond to a creditor of the firm for a partnership debt, the creditor is entitled to share with the separate creditors in the separate estate of the deceased partner.

A partnership creditor, who has acquired a lien upon the individual assets of the deceased partner is entitled to priority over individual creditors to the extent of his lien. Straus v. Kerngood, 21 Gratt. 584.

Two co-partners entered into an agreement by which one of them was to take the entire assets of the firm, and pay off the firm debts, discharging the other from all liability, and to hold the surplus as his own. Upon the death of the purchasing partner, it was held that the outgoing partner could compel the part of the decedent's estate which belonged to the firm to be first applied to the payment of the firm debts. Shackelford v. Shackelford, 32 Gratt. 481.

B. CONFLICT OF LAWS.—A decedent, domiciled at Norfolk, Va., there contracted a debt by bond to a certain party. He was also indebted to the Union Bank of Georgetown, D. C., on simple contract. He died intestate in Bedford, Pa., leaving personal estate in the county of Washington, D. C., of which administration was there granted. By the law of Virginia, bond debts were given priority over simple contract debts; but by the law of Maryland, which was in force in the district, no priority was given to bond debts. It was held that the effects of the intestate were to be distributed among his creditors according to the law of Maryland, and not according to the law of Virginia. Smith v. Union Bank, 5 Pet. (U. S.) 518.

C. PREFERENCE BY EXECUTOR OR ADMINISTRATOR.—It is the duty of an executor or administrator to pay the debts of his decedent according to the order of their priority. If he pays an inferior debt with notice of a superior debt, he will be liable to the superior creditor as for a devastavit; but except as to judgments and decrees, as to which the personal representative was bound to take notice, the payment of an inferior debt before notice of a superior debt is good. 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1055; Mayo v. Bentley, 4 Call 528. It is provided by statute that a personal representative, who, after twelve months from his qualification, pays a debt of his decedent, shall not thereby be personally liable for any debt or demand against the decedent of equal or superior dignity, whether it be of record or not, unless before such payment he shall have notice of such debt or demand. Va. Code 1887, sec. 2661; W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 85, sec. 26, p. 733.

But it is not a devastavit for the executor to pay debts of inferior dignity, if he retains sufficient assets to pay those of higher rank. Braxton v. Claiborne, 4 Call 308.

An administrator, who has no notice of a specialty debt, may pay or confess judgment to a simple contract creditor. Mayo v. Bentley, 4 Call 528. Under the present statute, debts of record, of specialty, and by simple contract, are all brought into one class. Va. Code 1887, sec. 2660; W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 85, sec. 25, p. 733.

Where there were two bonds, one payable at the death of the intestate, and the other not, it was formerly held that the administrator might delay the creditor in the first with dilatory pleas until the second became payable, and then confess judgment upon the latter pending the prior suit upon the first, and plead it in bar of the first action. For among creditors of equal dignity, the administrator was allowed to prefer either; and the second bond, was debitum in presenti, though payable at a future day. Mayo v. Bentley, 4 Call 528. But under the present statute, the executor has no right to prefer creditors of equal degree, and the assets must be ratably distributed among them. Va. Code 1887, §§ 2660, 2661.

D. RETAINER.—The right of retainer is given only to the executor or administrator regularly appointed and qualified. An executor de son tort cannot retain. Shields v. Anderson, 3 Leigh 729.

Where the claim of an appellee creditor of a decedent was determined by the appellate court to be a debt by simple contract only, the administrator had a right, as against such creditor, to retain the amount of his own simple contract demand against the testator. Shearman v. Christian, 9 Leigh 571. See Va. Code 1887, § 2661, providing that creditors are to be paid in the order of their classification, those of a class to be paid ratably when not enough to pay them in full.

An administrator is not entitled to retain for his debt due by simple contract, as against bonds with collateral conditions creating contingent liabilities, which may never occur before the breach of such condition, although he has no notice of such contingent liability for eight years after his qualification as administrator, and the breach of the condition is not ascertained for eleven years after his qualification. Cookus v. Peyton, 1 Gratt. 481. See Va. Code 1887, §§ 2660, 2661.

The vendors of land gave the vendee a bond of indemnity, with surety, against an outstanding lien on the land, and thereupon the vendee paid a part of the purchase price. The vendee was obliged to pay a large sum to discharge the lien, and, upon the death of the surety, was appointed administrator of his estate. One of the principal obligors in the indemnifying bond left the state, the other became insolvent, and the vendors recovered judgment against the vendee for the balance of the purchase money. Held, that, as against the debts of the surety of equal and inferior dignity to that of the indemnifying bond, the vendee might retain the assets as satisfaction pro tanto of his claim on the indemnifying bond, and, as administrator of the surety, might retain in his hands the amount due from him personally on the judgment of the vendors, in part satisfaction of the claim in favor of the surety's estate against the vendors, his principals in the bond of indemnity. Shores v. Wares, 1 Rob. 1. See Va. Code 1887, §§ 2660, 2661.

Where a surviving partner is the administrator of a deceased partner, he is entitled to retain out of the separate estate in hands, against separate claims of no higher dignity, on account of all debts for which he is entitled to share the separate estate with the separate creditors. Morris v. Morris, 4 Gratt. 293. See Va. Code 1887, §§ 2660, 2661. See also, supra, "Partnership Debts."

Sureties in a bond, who pay it off after the death of the principal, are entitled to rank as specialty creditors of the principal, and if they are administrators of his estate, may retain whatever they pay on account of such suretyship, out of the assets that come to their hands as administrators, against other specialty creditors. Powell v. White, 11 Leigh 309. See Va. Code 1887, §§ 2660, 2661.

Where the same person is the personal representative both of the creditors and the debtor, he may retain out of the effects of which he is possessed as the representative of the debtor to satisfy the debts due to him as the representative of the creditor. Green v. Thompson, 84 Va. 376, 5 S. E. Rep. 507. See Caskie v. Harrison, 76 Va. 85; Harvey v. Steptoe, 17 Gratt. 289; Morrow v. Peyton, 8 Leigh 54.

An administrator d. b. d., who was also administrator of the estate of the former administrator, settled the accounts of the latter, by which settlement it appeared that there was due his estate a large sum of money for advances made to the heirs. He then transferred or assigned to himself, as administrator, a bond of the first intestate's estate, in payment of the amount thus ascertained to be due.

Held, that, as he represented both the debtor and creditor estates, he could apply the funds of the former in payment of a debt due the latter, and could therefore assign to himself a chose in action of the debtor estate for the same purpose, and account to the debtor estate as so much cash administered. Green v. Thompson, 84 Va. 376, 5 S. E. Rep. 507.

III. MODE AND SUFFICIENCY OF PAYMENT.

On the subject of payment by an executor or administrator, see generally, the title, "Accounting and Settlement—Credits," in monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

If there is a valid demand binding assets of a decedent, it is not discharged merely by reason of the fact that the executor gives a note therefor signed by him, with the addition to his name of the words, "Executor of —, Deceased." Crim v. England, 46 W. Va. 480, 33 S. E. Rep. 310.

Where an administrator, out of confederate money collected by him in the course of his administration, pays off specie debts of his decedent, he is to be credited in the settlement of his account with the debts so paid at their nominal amount. Moss v. Moorman, 24 Gratt. 97.

In 1863, an administrator, acting under an order of court authorizing him to loan money belonging to the estate to any undisputed creditors thereof, made a loan of confederate money to one of the creditors. Held, that the loan should not be scaled, but should be applied, as of its date, as a payment of a debt due the borrower. Robertson v. Trigg, 32 Gratt. 76.

A personal representative may pay a debt due by the default of his decedent, as treasurer of a public fund, before an action on the decedent's official bond is barred by the statute of limitations, without waiting to be sued for such debt, and may credit himself with its payment in the settlement of his account. Van Winkle v. Blackford, 33 W. Va. 573, 11 S. E. Rep. 26.

Where a personal representative confesses judgment on condition that if the demand be improper it shall be corrected, the estate is entitled to a credit on the judgment to the extent that the demand is improper. Staples v. Staples, 85 Va. 76, 7 S. E. Rep. 199.

Where a person leases land from an executor, he cannot purchase judgments against the testator and set them against the rent, unless the executor acknowledges a sufficiency of assets to pay all the debts of the estate. But the tenant may maintain a bill in such case for the discovery of assets by the executor. White v. Bannister, 1 Wash. 166.

IV. PROCEEDINGS TO ENFORCE PAYMENT.

See generally, on this subject, monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

Nature and Form of Proceeding.—A fiduciary cannot be compelled by summary process of rule, to show cause why he shall not be fined and imprisoned, to pay a decree against him as such, especially where his accounts have not been settled in the suit, and it has not been shown that he has assets in his hands. Cheatham v. Cheatham, 81 Va. 395.

Where a creditor, instead of proceeding at common law to recover his claim against a decedent's estate, obtains an order for its payment on a summary rule to show cause, this is a departure from the established modes of procedure, and the order so obtained has not the force of a judgment, but is void on its face. Thurman v. Morgan, 79 Va. 367.

A court of law cannot compel an executor summoned as a garnishee to pay a legacy left to the debtor, the remedy in such case being in equity. Whitehead v. Coleman, 81 Gratt. 784.

Creditors' Suits.—For a full discussion of the subject of bills filed by creditors of decedents, see monographic note on "Creditors' Bills" appended to Suckley v. Rotchford, 12 Gratt. 60.

The rights of general creditors of a decedent are subject to all equities attaching to the decedent's estate at the time of his death. General creditors take the estate in the plight in which they find it, and their rights cannot be enlarged or improved beyond their debtor's, to the prejudice of a creditor who has taken a lien which he has not recorded, or which cannot be recorded. The creditors who seek to assail the lien must come with a lien by judgment, or otherwise, giving them a right to charge the property specifically. Dulaney v. Willis, 95 Va. 606, 29 S. E. Rep. 324; McCandlish v. Keen, 13 Gratt. 615.

After a decree for a general account of debts in a creditors' suit, other creditors may come in and prove their claims before the commissioner to whom the cause is referred. This should be done by the creditor or some one authorized by him, and not by the administrator of the debtor whose duty it is to represent the estate. The better practice is to require the creditor to file an affidavit that the debt remains due, but the affidavit is not evidence to prove the debt. Conrad v. Fuller, 98 Va. 16, 84 S. E. Rep. 893.

Persons Who May Institute Proceedings.—The personal representative of a deceased partner, as a general rule, is the only person who has the right to sue the surviving partner for an account of the partnership affairs; but, under special circumstances, a distributee, legatee, or creditor of the decedent may file a bill against the personal representative of the decedent and the surviving partner. Conrad v. Fuller, 98 Va. 16, 84 S. E. Rep. 893.

Parties Defendant.—Where an executor has died after partially administering the estate of his decedent, and a suit is brought to recover a claim against said estate simply, no defendant is necessary, except the personal representative. McGlaughlin v. McGlaughlin, 48 W. Va. 226, 27 S. E. Rep. 378.

The representatives of two deceased persons cannot be joined in the same action, although the undertaking of the testators might have been joint and several. Grymes v. Pendleton, 4 Call 130.

In a suit by creditors to subject the real estate of a decedent to the payment of his debts, where it appears that the decedent devised his real estate to his wife for life, with remainder in fee in equal parts to his two children, but, if either died without issue, remainder over to his sister, with power to the wife to sell and reinvest proceeds, if deemed advisable, the sister is not a necessary party. New v. Bass, 92 Va. 383, 23 S. E. Rep. 747.

Persons primarily bound on negotiable paper are necessary parties to a suit in equity to subject the estate of an endorser, as they may have defences unknown to the endorser, and, being first liable, equity will not, except under special circumstances, subject the estate of an endorser until that of the principal has been exhausted. Tidball v. Shenandoah National Bank, 98 Va. 768, 37 S. E. Rep. 318, 6 Va. Law Reg. 638.

The widow and adult children of an intestate divided his lands and chattels among themselves, leaving the administrator only certain choses in action wherewith to pay debts. An account of administration, as nearly accurate as lapse of time and meagre evidence allowed, showed the administrator to be in advance to the estate with nothing wherewith to pay a judgment obtained against him by a creditor of the decedent, who sued in chancery the administrator, his sureties, and the widow, heirs and distributees, to collect out of the decedent's unalliened lands, or otherwise, the bond debt represented by said judgment. Held, that the suit might be maintained against the heirs, etc., to collect the debt out of the unalliened lands, upon evidence other than the judgment, and that equity would allow resort at once to said lands, instead of going upon the sureties of the administrator. Watts v. Taylor, 80 Va. 627.

Pleading.—A bill by an executor for the sale of his testator's land to pay debts should show the names of the widow, heirs, devisees, and all known creditors; otherwise, a sale thereunder passes no title. Underwood v. Underwood, 22 W. Va. 308.

A bill in equity, filed by the widow of a deceased party against the administrator of the estate of her deceased husband, charging a failure on the part of said administrator to collect and account for the assets of his intestate, and to pay over to her the portion of the personalty of her deceased husband to which she is entitled as his widow, which does not show when said administrator qualified and gave bond for the performance of his duties, or that a year had elapsed from the time of such qualification of such administrator, is demurrable, and cannot be sustained. Harris v. Orr, 42 W. Va. 745, 26 S. E. Rep. 455.

Notice of dishonor is a necessary charge in a bill to subject a decedent's estate to a liability as endorser of negotiable paper. Tidball v. Shenandoah National Bank, 98 Va. 768, 37 S. E. Rep. 318, 6 Va. Law Reg. 638.

Where an executor has a claim against the estate of his testator depending on a quantum meruit only, he may exhibit a bill in equity against his co-executors and legatees to have such claim established and fixed at a certain sum. In such case he ought to state the claim with reasonable certainty, by setting forth his own estimate of his services; but should he fail to do so, his bill ought not to be dismissed, but leave to amend (it should be granted on motion. Baker v. Baker, 8 Munf. 222.

Where the executor of an executor is sued for a debt due by the first executor to the estate of his testator, the pleadings must state distinctly that the claim is against the second executor as representing his testator in his executorial character, in order to entitle the plaintiff to rank as a creditor of the first dignity under the act of assembly. Shearman v. Christian, 6 Rand. 49.

If on a bill filed by creditors to subject the estate, real and personal, of a decedent, to the payment of his debts, a copy of decedent's will is filed, by which he devised and bequeathed certain property to his wife for life, and nominated her as executrix, the wife is made a party defendant as executrix and "as widow," this is sufficient to bind her personally by any proper decree made in the cause. New v. Bass, 92 Va. 383, 23 S. E. Rep. 747.

The answers of executors to a petition asserting a claim against the decedent's estate, consisting of a judgment confirmed by an interlocutory decree, though interposed more than four years after the confirmation of the judgment, are properly treated as a petition for rehearing, no statutory bar existing to a petition for a rehearing of an interlocutory decree. Staples v. Staples, 85 Va. 76, 7 S. E. Rep. 199.

On appeal from a decree charging an administrator and his sureties with a debt, an objection that the debt was barred by the statute of limitations at the time of the qualification of the administrator will not be considered where the record fails to show that it was thus barred, but the evidence tends strongly to show that the debt was either collected or assumed by the administrator. Harman v. McMullin, 85 Va. 187, 7 S. E. Rep. 849.

Evidence.—An executor or administrator occupies a position antagonistic to the estate he represents with reference to independent claims preferred by him against the estate, and his ex parte settlements though duly confirmed, are not even prima facie evidence in his favor of the correctness of such claim. The burden of proof is on him to establish his demand by proper proof just as if no settlement had ever been made. Scott v. Porter, 99 Va. 553, 39 S. E. Rep. 320.

An executor who prefers a claim against the estate of his testator for breach of a covenant to do a collateral thing has the burden of proof to establish the due execution of the covenant, the breach by the testator, and the amount he is entitled to recover by reason of such breach. Scott v. Porter, 99 Va. 553, 39 S. E. Rep. 320.

A bond, note or account may, on its face, appear to be the personal debt of an executor, and yet, in truth and in fact, be the debt of the estate. The presumption is that the face of the paper discloses the true debtor, and the burden of proof is on him who controverts the fact; but if the debt has been paid by an executor, and he can establish the fact that it is not his personal debt, though it so appears on the face of the paper, but is, in truth and in fact, a debt of the estate, he should be allowed credit for it. Breckinridge v. Breckinridge, 98 Va. 561, 31 S. E. Rep. 892.

There being no privity between the personal representative and the party to whom the real estate has descended or been devised, a judgment against such personal representative is not even prima facie evidence against the heir or devisee. Laidley v. Kline, 8 W. Va. 218.

A judgment against personal representatives in a suit to which the heirs were not parties, does not affect the heirs for want of privity, and is not evidence against them in a suit to subject the decedent's real estate; and Va. Code 1873, ch. 127, sec. 3, does not alter the rule. Brewis v. Lawson, 76 Va. 86; Watts v. Taylor, 80 Va. 627. Yet, a suit against personal representatives jointly with heirs, etc., by a creditor of the decedent, to collect out of real estate or otherwise, a bond debt whereon judgment existed against the personal representatives, is maintainable by evidence other than the judgment, though the judgment be set forth in the bill, the heirs, etc., having as full opportunity to defend against the debt as though no judgment existed. Watts v. Taylor, 80 Va. 627.

Where a claim against an estate based on a judgment obtained against such estate is presented for settlement, and there is no evidence to show that such claim has ever been paid, except the unsupported assertion of persons contesting it, a rejection thereof by a commissioner to whom it has been referred is error, and the action of the court in sustaining an exception to the commissioner's report, and entering judgment against the estate for the amount due, was proper. Armentrout v. Shafer, 89 Va. 568, 16 S. E. Rep. 728.

In a suit to settle the estate of a decedent, the appellant filed a claim against the estate, alleging that the decedent, in 1858, had been appointed a commissioner to collect the purchase money bonds under a decree of sale, and to deposit them in bank, and that the appellant was entitled to the fund arising from the collection of the bonds. The claim was based upon an alleged admission made by the decedent in 1877, that he had collected the bonds. This statement was made in a suit wherein the decedent had stated, as counsel, that he had collected the bonds, and had deposited them as directed, and that his report thereof had been confirmed by the court. The appellant's petition did not deny the deposit and confirmation by the court, but merely denied that the money was deposited or accounted for by the decedent in his lifetime. Held, that, since the claim was based on the decedent's admission, his entire statement must be taken together; and as it appeared from his whole statement that a decree was made confirming his report, in which he alleged that he had deposited the money as directed, it must be taken as established, and cannot be collaterally attacked. Perkins v. Lane, 82 Va. 59.

In an action on a joint bond against the personal representative of a deceased obligor, a surviving obligor is an incompetent witness for the defendant. Brown v. Johnson, 18 Gratt. 644.

Compromises by Creditors.—Where there is a joint decree against the executors of two persons, and a creditor receives a moiety of the debt from the representatives of one of them, and covenants not to levy the residue of the decree upon the estate of that one, the representatives of the other are not thereby discharged. Garnett v. Brooke, 6 Call 308.

Judgment or Decree.—It is error to decree against an executor, absolutely, that he shall pay money at fixed future periods, out of funds which shall subsequently come into his hands. Hite v. Hite, 2 Rand. 409.

It is error to decree that an administrator de bonis non shall pay a debt of his testator out of the assets in his hands, upon an admission in his answer that there are debts due the estate uncollected more than sufficient to pay all the debts. Kent v. Cloyd, 30 Gratt. 555.

Where an order accepted by the personal representative, is rejected in a creditors' suit, as a valid claim against the decedent's estate, there can be no personal decree for the amount thereof against such representative, because it is asserted in the bill as a debt due by the estate, and the decree must be consistent with the case made by the pleadings. Staples v. Staples, 85 Va. 76, 7 S. E. Rep. 199.

Where it appears that the estate of one of the deceased obligors in a bond has been fully administered in a suit for partition to which the complainant was not a party, that the assets were sufficient to pay all claims, and that the personal representative took no refunding bond, a personal decree against him is proper. Beverly v. Rhodes, 86 Va. 415, 10 S. E. Rep. 572.

Where, in the case of a deficiency of personal assets, a creditor of the decedent files a bill for the purpose of subjecting land devised by him to the payment of his debt, it is error for the court to decree a sale before ordering an account and settling the priorities of the liens thereon, though the parties agree that a certain statement filed in the cause shall be taken as a true exhibit of the indebtedness of the estate to the plaintiff. Daingerfield v. Smith, 88 Va. 91, 1 S. E. Rep. 599.

On a bill by a creditor against the devisees or heirs at law of a decedent, the court should first make a decree for renting the land, and, if the rent should prove insufficient to satisfy the debts, a report should be made to the court for further proceedings to be had before a decree can be made ordering a sale. An alternative decree for the sale of land, if the rent offered be insufficient, is erroneous. Daingerfield v. Smith, 88 Va. 81, 1 S. E. Rep. 599.

A conditional decree, directing an executor to pay certain debts due by his testator's estate, or due from him in his fiduciary capacity when he shall have collected certain others specified claims or debts coming to his testator's estate, constitutes no lien upon the real estate of such executor. Gay v. Skeen, 36 W. Va. 582, 15 S. E. Rep. 64.

A commissioner appointed to ascertain the debts of a decedent, and their order of priority, cannot go behind a judgment rendered against the decedent in his lifetime; and since Acts 1865-66, ch. 171, §§ 1, 2, provide for setting up the fact of a confederate transaction only as a defense to a suit while pending, so as to reduce the judgment to be rendered, the action of the commissioner in scaling the judgment as a confederate transaction will not affect a judgment creditor who was not a party to the proceedings, and had no notice thereof. Marshall v. Cheatham, 88 Va. 81, 13 S. E. Rep. 308.

In a suit to settle the accounts of an executor and ascertain the debts against his decedent's estate, a decree for an account of debts stops the running of the statute of limitations as to all debts against the decedent. Covington v. Griffin, 98 Va. 124, 34 S. E. Rep. 974.

V. PROPERTY LIABLE FOR PAYMENT OF DEBTS.

A. IN GENERAL.—At common law the lands of a decedent were liable only to debts of record and of specialty binding the heirs expressly, but by statute the distinction between such debts and simple contract debts has been done away with, and now the real as well as the personal estate of a decedent is liable for the liquidation of all his debts. Fraiser v. Littleton, 100 Va. —, 7 Va. Law Reg. 620. For a full discussion of the liability of a decedent's property to the payment of his debts, see monographic note on "Marshaling Assets" appended to Carrington v. Didier, 8 Gratt. 260. See also, monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

If the estate of the decedent is solvent, and even where it is insolvent, until they are sequestrated by the court at the instance of creditors, the rents and profits of the realty are not liable for the debts of the decedent. Washington v. Castleman, 81 W. Va. 835, 8 S. E. Rep. 605.

In a suit to settle a decedent's estate, it was error to adjudge the administrator entitled to recover rents accruing after the intestate's death for a farm occupied by one of the parties, such rents belonging to one of the heirs, who asserted no claim thereto. Lightner v. Speck, 3 Va. Dec. 557.

Where the real estate of a testator is necessary for the payment of his debts, a court of equity may direct an account of the rents and profits from his death, for the purpose of ascertaining the profits accrued from that period and by whom received, in order to enable the court to decide what persons, if any, are accountable therefor. McCandlish v. Edloe, 3 Gratt. 330.

Where a life estate in lands, given to a widow in lieu of dower is of less value than her dower would have been, it is not chargeable with any of the debts of her deceased husband. Gaw v. Huffman, 12 Gratt. 628. See monographic note on "Dower" appended to Davis v. Davis, 25 Gratt. 587.

B. PROPERTY PRIMARILY LIABLE.—The personal estate of the decedent is the natural and primary fund for the payment of his debts, and must be first exhausted before the real estate can be subjected; nor will it be exonerated by a charge on the real estate, unless there be express words or a plain intent in the will to make such exoneration. See monographic note on "Marshaling Assets" appended to Carrington v. Didier, 8 Gratt. 260.

C. MARSHALING ASSETS.—The order in which the estate of a testator will be applied to the payment of his debts is as follows: The first to be so applied is the personal estate at large not exempted by the terms of the will or by necessary implication. Next to it, real estate or an interest therein expressly set apart by the will for payment of debts. Next, real estate descended to the heirs. After it, property, real or personal, expressly charged with payment of debts, and then, subject to such charge, specifically devised or bequeathed. If these prove inadequate, then general pecuniary legacies, and after them, specific legacies, both classes ratably; and, in the last resort, real estate devised by the will. Frasier v. Littleton, 100 Va. —, 7 Va. Law Reg. 620. See monographic note on "Marshaling Assets" appended to Carrington v. Didier, 8 Gratt. 260.

VI. LIABILITY OF HEIR, DEVISEE, DISTRIBUTE AND LEGATEE.

The common-law rule (see 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law [2d Ed.] 1098) exempting heirs, devisees, distributees and legatees from liability for the debts of the decedent, with the exception of debts of record and the specialty debts in which the heirs are named, has been done away with by the statute making the real estate of the decedent assets for the payment of his debts in the same order as personal estate. See Va. Code 1887, §§ 2665-2669; W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 86, §§ 3-7, pp. 734-735; Alexander v. Byrd, 85 Va. 699, 8 S. E. Rep. 577. See also, Piper v. Douglas, 3 Gratt. 371, and foot-note. For a full discussion of the liability of devisees and legatees for the debts of their decedents, see monographic notes on "Legacies and Devises" and "Wills."

VII. PERSONAL LIABILITY OF REPRESENTATIVE.

As to the personal liability of executors and administrators with respect to debts, see generally, monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

An executor or administrator is not liable for the payment of invalid claims if they were such as any judicious man, managing his own affairs, might have settled. Kee v. Kee, 2 Gratt. 117.

Where the executors have been assured by the testator that he owed no debts and they know of none, they will not be liable for the value of personal property, which he, in his lifetime, had put into the possession of his children. Lewis v. Overby, 31 Gratt. 601.

Where an administrator sells a chattel of which his intestate died possessed, but which in fact belonged to another, and applies the proceeds to the payment of his intestate's debts in due course of administration, without any notice of the right or claim of the true owner, he is personally liable to the true owner in an action of trover for the value of the chattel. Newsum v. Newsum, 1 Leigh 86.

Disregarding Priorities in Payment of Debts.—It is the duty of a personal representative to pay the debts of the decedent in the order of their priority, as prescribed by law; and if he pays an inferior debt, leaving a debt of a preferred class unpaid, such payment constitutes a devastavit in case of a deficiency of assets, so as to render him personally liable at law and in equity to the preferred creditor who is injured thereby, unless the payment was made without notice of the superior debt. 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 912; McCormick v. Wright, 79 Va. 524; Nimmo v. Com., 4 H. & M. 57, 4 Am. Dec. 488; Mayo v. Bentley, 4 Call 528.

At common law, an executor or administrator was obliged, at his peril, to take notice of a judgment against his testator, and, if he exhausted the assets by paying debts of inferior dignity, was bound to satisfy such judgment out of his own estate. Nimmo v. Com., 4 H. & M. 57, 4 Am. Dec. 488; Mayo v. Bentley, 4 Call 528. But a personal representative who had no notice of a specialty debt could pay or confess judgment to a simple contract creditor. Mayo v. Bentley, 4 Call 528. Under the statute, however, debts of record, of specialty, and by simple contract are all brought into one class and are to be paid ratably. Va. Code 1887, § 2660; W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 85, § 25, p. 733.

An administrator cannot pay, within 12 months after his qualification, one debt in full, or in excess of its ratable share of assets, over another of the same class, either with or without notice of such other debt; and, if he does, he is personally liable to the omitted debt for its share of money applied in such payment. If such payment be made after 12 months, he is not liable, unless he had notice of the other debt. McCoy v. Jack, 47 W. Va. 201, 34 S. E. Rep. 991.

Where it appears from the face of an executor's settlement that he has paid in full some debts and left unpaid, in part or wholly, other debts of equal dignity, such settlement stands impeached per se. McCormick v. Wright, 79 Va. 524.

In 1856 an infant qualified as one of the administrators of a decedent. He paid out for just debts all the assets that came to his hands, but did not apportion them ratably. In 1858 he turned over everything in his hands to his co-administrator and left the state. In 1877 a bill was filed charging him with devastavit. He pleaded infancy and the bar of the statute of limitations. Held, that, being an infant and innocent of fraud or tort, he was not liable for the alleged devastavit, and the lapse of the period of limitation would bar the claim against him if he was otherwise liable. Sanm v. Coffelt, 79 Va. 510.

Where an administrator, out of the intestate's assets, voluntarily pays debts of an inferior class in preference to debts of a higher class, and there is a deficiency of assets, he is not entitled to have the creditors so paid refund. The case has no analogy to the case of an executor paying legacies before paying the debts, where the executor is entitled to be substituted to the creditor's right to have the legatees refund. Findlay v. Trigg, 83 Va. 539, 3 S. E. Rep. 142.

Where, in a suit against an administrator and his sureties for a devastavit in paying debts of an inferior class in preference to debts of a higher class, the record shows there is a deficiency of assets, and that the funds in his hands embrace money that came to him as commissioner of sales of lands, as well as money that came to his hands as administrator, without showing the respective amounts of each, there can be no decree until there has been an account of the amount of each, respectively, as the sureties are not accountable for the money that came to his hands as such commissioner. Findlay v. Trigg, 83 Va. 539, 3 S. E. Rep. 142.

Where an executor assuery for the testator pays debts out of his own funds, he is entitled only to his ratable share of the assets to repay his advances and by crediting himself with the full amount of the debts, he commits an error to the prejudice of the other creditors having unpaid debts of equal dignity. McCormick v. Wright, 79 Va. 524.

An administrator, with money of his decedent, paid, on a note made by his decedent, an amount in excess of the sum applicable out of the assets to that debt, under the mistaken belief that he was surety in such note, and that the estate would pay a somewhat larger per cent. of its liabilities than it did. Held, that the administrator could not maintain an action of assumpsit against a surety in the note to compel him to refund the amount so paid in excess of the ratable share of the assets applicable to such debt. Proudfoot v. Clevenger, 83 W. Va. 267, 10 S. E. Rep. 394.

Paying debts of inferior dignity is not a devastavit, if the executor retains sufficient assets to pay those of higher rank. Braxton v. Claiborne, 4 Call 308.

Payment of Claims Founded on Illegal Consideration.—An executor should not be allowed credit for paying a debt of his testator which appears on its face to have been for money lost at gaming. Carter v. Cutting, 5 Munf. 223. See monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

An executor should be denied credit in his accounts for usurious debts of the testator paid or retained by him, with knowledge of their usurious character. Smith v. Britton, 2 Pat. & H. 124.

Payment of Claims Barred by Statute.—The statute providing that an administrator shall have no credit for a claim which he pays, knowing the facts whereby recovery could be prevented, does not require the administrator to plead the statute of limitations to a claim apparently barred, where he knows facts rendering the statute inapplicable. Radford v. Fowlkes, 85 Va. 820, 8 S. E. Rep. 817.

See supra, "What Constitutes Claims against Decedent's Estate—Claims Barred by Limitation." See also, monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

Where a personal representative, after he has been removed, voluntarily pays a debt due by the default of his decedent as the treasurer of a public fund, after an action on the deceased treasurer's official bond is barred by the statute of limitations, he cannot recover the sum so paid from the estate of the decedent either at law or in equity. Van Winkle v. Blackford, 33 W. Va. 573, 11 S. E. Rep. 26.

Payment of Legacies and Distributive Shares.—Where an executor or administrator, without taking a refunding bond, pays legacies or distributive shares, leaving debts unpaid, and a deficiency of assets results, he is guilty of maladministration, and is liable as for a devastavit. Lewis v. Mason, 84 Va. 731, 10 S. E. Rep. 529; Morrison v. Lavell, 81 Va. 519; Edmunds v. Scott, 78 Va. 720; Lewis v. Overby, 81 Gratt. 601; Cookus v. Peyton, 1 Gratt. 431. See monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6. See also, monographic note on "Marshaling Assets" appended to Carrington v. Didler, 8 Gratt. 260.

The fact that the assets turned over to the legatee would have been lost if retained by the executor does not affect his liability to creditors. Thus an executor was held liable for slaves turned over to legatees although they were subsequently emancipated by the federal government. Morrison v. Lavell, 81 Va. 519.

An administratrix c. t. a., who permits the trustee under the will to take possession of the personal property belonging to the estate before the payment of its debts, is guilty of a devastavit, and, to the extent of such property, becomes personally chargeable with the debts of the estate. Lewis v. Mason, 84 Va. 731, 10 S. E. Rep. 528.

Liability Arising Out of Contract.—Where an executor or administrator in executing an obligation appends to his signature words descriptive of his representative character, such fact will not prevent personal liability from attaching where the nature of the debt is such as to charge him personally. Snead v. Coleman, 7 Gratt. 300, 56 Am. Dec. 112.

An executor, trustee, or any other person acting in autre droit, who covenants in his own name, and yet adds to his signature the word, "executor," "agent," "trustee," etc., is personally liable, the addition being regarded as a mere description of the person, unless he was recognized as contracting in his representative capacity. Carr v. Branch, 85 Va. 597, 8 S. E. Rep. 476.

In order for the promise of an executor or administrator to render him personally liable it must be supported by a sufficient consideration as in the case of other contracts. 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 915; Taliaferro v. Robb, 2 Call 258; Snead v. Coleman, 7 Gratt. 300, 56 Am. Dec. 112.

The fact that an executor wrote to a creditor of his testator that he would pay his claim as soon as he was able to dispose of his crops does not bind the executor personally, in the absence of proof of assets or forbearance to sue or some other consideration. Taliaferro v. Robb, 2 Call 258. As to the necessity of consideration to support a promise to pay money, see monographic note on "Consideration" appended to Jones v. Obenchain, 10 Gratt. 259.

A note given by an executor or administrator for a debt of the decedent is prima facie evidence of the existence of assets so as to render the note personally binding on him, without proof of the actual existence of assets. But such presumption may be rebutted, and when the absence of assets is shown by the executor or administrator the note imposes no personal liability on him. Snead v. Coleman, 7 Gratt. 300, 56 Am. Dec. 112.

Sale of Land—Specific Performance—Denied to Vendor—Contract Rescinded—Account Taken between

*One had been counsel for the appellant in the court below, and the other had been retained as his counsel in this court.

Vendor and Vendee—Case at Bar.—On the 10th of October 1818, a sale was made of a tract of 870 acres of land in Augusta county, at $40 per acre, to be paid as follows, viz. $600 in hand (which was paid accordingly), $1200 on the 28th of December 1818 with interest from the day of sale, $1200, on the 28th of March 1819 with like interest, $750, on the 28th of March 1820, and the residue in sums of $750, payable at specified times. By the articles of agreement, the vendee was to give bonds and satisfactory security for his payments, and the vendor bound himself to make the vendee a good and sufficient deed in fee simple, with general warranty, at the first Augusta court after the payment in 1819. The vendee paid the instalment which fell due on the 28th of December 1818, and the instalment which fell due in 1819 was paid, part before, and the residue on, the 9th of December in that year, so that the vendor became bound to make a deed for the land as early as the first Augusta court after the 9th of December 1819. No deed was made. The vendee notwithstanding paid the instalment which fell due on the 28th of March 1820. About the 10th of April of that year, the vendor died insolvent, and the vendee, soon after his death, made known his determination to make no farther payments until he should get a title. On the 10th of September 1821, a suit in equity was brought by the administrators of the vendor against the vendee and the heirs of the vendor, to compel a specific execution of the contract; and no title having ever been obtained by the vendor, the complainants made defendants those in whom that title was outstanding. A considerable fall having taken place in the value of property, the vendee, by his answer sworn to in May 1825, resisted the prayer of the bill, on the ground that, under the circumstances of the case, equity required a rescission, and not an execution of the contract. At this time the default of the vendor's heirs still continued, and it continued three years afterwards; that is to say, it continued for more than eight years from the time when the vendor had bound himself to make the title. During this time the land had fallen in value more than 50 per cent. and the vendee had never surrendered *possession.

13 HELD, 1. That the long continued default of the vendor and his heirs, and the change of circumstances during its continuance, constitute a valid objection to a specific performance of the contract. 2. That the vendee should, on the one hand, release all his rights under the contract, deliver up the land, and account for its rents and profits during the time he held it; and, on the other hand, have the purchase money paid by him returned, with interest from the times when the payments were made, and also have the value of any permanent improvements which he may have put upon the land set off against the rents and profits, provided they do not exceed the amount of the said rents and profits. 3. That if, on stating an account between the parties on these princi-plea, a balance should appear to be due from the vendee, he should be decreed to pay it; if in his favour, it should be decreed to him, and if there be no sufficient personal estate of the vendor to pay the same, the land should be subjected to its payment. 4. That each party should pay his own costs, except as to taking the accounts, the costs of which should be equally divided between the parties.

This was an appeal from a decree of the superior court of chancery formerly holden in the town of Staunton. The facts of the case, so far as they are material to the questions decided by the court of appeals, were stated by CABELL, P., at the time of delivering his opinion, to be as follows:

On the 10th day of October in the year 1818, Ralph A. Lofftus and Daniel Bryan entered into articles of agreement under their hands and seals, by which Lofftus sold to Bryan a tract of land containing 370 acres more or less, lying on Middle river in Augusta county, at 40 dollars per acre, to be paid as follows, viz. 600 dollars in hand, (which was paid accordingly); 1200 dollars on the 28th of December then next ensuing, with interest from the date of the contract; 1200 dollars on the 28th of March 1819, with interest as aforesaid; 750 dollars on the 28th of March 1820; 750 dollars in nine months thereafter; and the residue in equal annual instalments of 750 dollars from the date of the payment last mentioned, until the whole purchase money should be paid; for which payments Bryan was to give bonds and satisfactory security: and Lofftus bound himself to make Bryan a good and sufficient deed in fee simple with general warranty for the land, at the first Augusta court after the payment in 1819. Bryan received possession immediately. He paid the instalment which fell due on the 28th of December 1818. On the 25th of March 1819, he paid 1200 dollars towards the instalment which was to become due on the 28th of that month; and he paid the residue thereof on the 9th of December 1819. Lofftus therefore became bound to make a deed for the land, at least as early as the first Augusta court after the 9th of December 1819. No deed was made. Bryan notwithstanding paid to Lofftus the instalment which fell due on the 28th of March 1820. Lofftus died insolvent about the 10th of April of that year, without having made any conveyance of the land, leaving as his heirs six adult brothers and sisters, and two infant children of a deceased brother. Shortly after the death of Lofftus, Bryan made known his determination to make no farther payments until he should get a title to the land. On the 23d of June 1821, fourteen months after the death of Lofftus, a deed was prepared, purporting to be a deed from the six adult heirs of Lofftus, conveying the land to Bryan. This deed was acknowledged before justices of the peace, by some of the heirs in the year 1821, by one of them in the year 1822, and by another in the year 1823; but it was not acknowledged by Nathan Lofftus, another of the heirs, until the 20th of August 1828; nor was it ever acknowledged by John Lofftus, another of the heirs, or proved as to him, nor is his name signed to the deed. The infant heirs, of course, were not parties to it. It does not appear that this deed was ever delivered or offered to Bryan; nor was it delivered to the clerk of Augusta to be recorded, until the 25th of August 1828, the very day on which the decree in this cause was pronounced. A deed from John Lofftus and wife to Bryan appears to have been executed on the 23d of August 1828.

Ralph A. Lofftus had purchased the land in controversy from Henderson and Robertson, who had previously conveyed the same to certain trustees to secure a debt due to Donaghe. The legal title to the land was in those trustees; and although Lofftus, in virtue of his contract with Henderson and Robertson, might be regarded in a court of equity as assignee of the equity of redemption in the land, still he had received no conveyance for that, any more than for the legal title. He therefore was never, at any time of his life, in a condition to comply with his obligation to Bryan, to make him "a good and sufficient deed" for the land; and it is apparent from the bill, and from the decree itself, that his heirs were not, even at the date of the decree, in a situation to comply with that stipulation in the contract of their ancestor.

This suit was brought, on the 10th of September 1821, by the administrators of Lofftus against Bryan and the heirs of Lofftus, to compel a specific execution of the contract between Lofftus and Bryan. But as it was apparent that the administrators and heirs of Lofftus combined were not in a situation to do that which was indispensably necessary to compel a performance on the part of Bryan, Henderson and Robertson and the trustees and executor of Donaghe were made parties, in order to supply the defect, and to enable that to be done which Lofftus had bound himself to do as far back, at least, as the early part of the year 1820.

Bryan in his answer, sworn to in May 1825, and probably filed soon after, resisted the prayer of the bill, on the ground that, under the circumstances of the case, equity required a rescission, and not an execution of the contract.

The default of the heirs of Lofftus continued at least three years longer, admitting (which was a point in controversy) that a good title could have been made at the time of the decree. Between the time when Bryan ought to have received a conveyance, and the time when he filed his answer, there was a considerable fall in the value of the land, and at the time of the decree it had fallen in value more than 50 per cent. Bryan still retained possession.

Such deeds being executed as in the opinion of the chancellor were proper, he made a decree compelling Bryan to an execution of the contract.

On his petition, an appeal was allowed.

The cause was elaborately argued in this court, by Grattan and Leigh, for the appellant, and C. Johnson, for the appellees.

CABELL, P. Every application for the specific execution of a contract is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, and the result of the application will always depend upon the particular circumstances of the case; for he who asks equity must do equity; and the prayer will always be denied, when to grant it would be inequitable towards those against whom the prayer is made. I would refer to the opinion of chief justice Marshall in Garnet &c. v. Macon & al. reported in 6 Call 308, and in 2 Brock. Rep. 185, for an able review of the cases, and a satisfactory exposition of the law upon this subject. In that case, the specific execution was refused under circumstances much weaker than those which exist in this case. The contract of sale in that case, as in this, was made in the year 1818. In that case, the vendor had the full legal and equitable title to the land, and the only objection on the part of the vendee was, that the land

17 one Campbell, and for which one of *the former owners of the land was surety. The suit was brought in December 1818, and was heard in the year 1825. The chief justice was very doubtful whether the debt to Campbell was in fact a charge upon the land; yet as that claim was a cloud lowering over the title, which could not be dissipated but by the decree of a court of equity, and as, before such a decree was attainable, the value of the land had greatly changed, that circumstances created, in his opinion, a strong objection to a specific performance; and on that ground, and that only, he dismissed the bill. In our case, the objection is much stronger. It is not a mere cloud lowering over the title, that is complained of, but the total absence of any sort of title in Lofftus or his heirs, for more than eight years from the time when he had bound himself to make the title; during which time the land had fallen in value more than 50 per cent.

It is said that Bryan ought to have made known, at an earlier period, his desire to rescind the contract. The fact is, that he seems to have been willing to proceed with the contract, up to the time of Lofftus's death; for he paid an additional instalment after the time when he ought to have received a conveyance, notwithstanding he must have seen that his contract was a disadvantageous one; for it is well known that there was a considerable fall in the value of property between October 1818 and March 1820. It was, however, not so distinctly marked as it was afterwards. It was not for the heirs of Lofftus, who had always been in default, and who were never in a situation to comply with the contract of their ancestor, to object to the conduct of Bryan in not demanding a rescission of the contract. Although Bryan might, at an earlier period, have objected to going on with the contract, it was not too late for him to do so in 1825; the default of Lofftus's heirs still continuing. That default continued three years longer, even if it were admitted that with the 18 aid of the court *they were then able to make a good title. And that default, even if we could overlook what had occurred before, would be sufficient to bar their claim to specific execution.

It is said that Bryan, to entitle himself to a rescission of the contract, ought to have surrendered possession of the land. If that be true in general, I cannot think it was so in this case. He had paid nearly 4000 dollars of the purchase money, for the recovery of which he had no hope, Lofftus having died insolvent. I think he was therefore right in retaining the possession.

The view which I have thus taken of this case, renders it unnecessary to pronounce any opinion as to the sufficiency of the deeds made by the heirs of Lofftus, or to decide the question whether an unwilling vendee can be compelled, in any case, to accept a deed from the heirs of a vendor, who had contracted that he himself would make a deed with general warranty, but had failed to make it according to the contract, and then died, being still in default at the time of his death. For, conceding to the appellees all that they have contended for as to the sufficiency of those deeds; nay, admitting that Lofftus himself had been alive at the date of the decree, and had then been in a situation to make precisely such a deed as he had contracted to make, I should still be of opinion that his long continued default, and the change of circumstances which had occurred during its continuance, would be a sufficient objection to a specific performance of the contract.

I am therefore of opinion that the court of chancery erred in compelling Bryan to an execution of the contract. He should, however, be compelled to deliver up the land to the heirs of Lofftus, to account for its rents and profits during the time he held it, and to release all his rights under the contract with Lofftus and the deeds in the record contained; but he is entitled to a return of the 19 purchase money paid by him, with interest from *the time he paid it, and also to have the value of any permanent improvements which he may have put upon the land set off against the rents and profits, provided they do not exceed the amount of the said rents and profits. These matters should be referred to a commissioner, with directions to state an account between the parties on these principles. If, on the return of the report, it should appear that a balance is due from Bryan, he should be decreed to pay it; if in his favour, it should be decreed to him, and if there be no sufficient personal estate of Lofftus to pay the same, the land should be subjected to its payment: each party to pay his own costs, except as to taking the accounts, the costs of which should be equally divided between the parties.

Both decrees are therefore to be reversed with costs, and the cause remanded, to be proceeded in to a final decree, according to the principles now declared.

The other judges concurring, a decree was entered in the following terms:

"The court is of opinion that the chancery court erred in compelling the appellant to an execution of the contract with Lofftus, in the proceedings contained. He however should be compelled to deliver up the land to the heirs of Lofftus and to account for its rents and profits during the time he held it, and to release all his rights under the contract with Lofftus and the deeds in the record contained; but he is entitled to a return of the purchase money paid by him, with interest from the time he paid it, and also to have the value of any permanent improvements which he may have put upon the land set off against the rents and profits, provided they do not exceed the amount of the said rents and profits. These matters should be referred to a commissioner, with directions to state an account, between the parties on these principles. If, on the return of the report, it should appear that a balance is due from the appellant, *he should be decreed to pay it; if in his favour, it should be decreed to him, and if there be no sufficient personal estate of Lofftus to pay the same, the land should be subjected to its payment: each party to pay his own costs, except as to taking the accounts, the costs of which should be equally divided between the parties. Therefore, decree reversed with costs, and cause remanded to circuit court of Augusta, to be finally proceeded in pursuant to the principles of the foregoing opinion and decree."

Decrees—Interlocutory.†—Question whether a decree was final or interlocutory. Per BALDWIN, J. Where the further action of the court in the cause is necessary to give completely the relief contemplated by the court, there the decree upon which the question arises is to be regarded not as final, but interlocutory.

Same—Decree for Sale—Case Disapproved.†—The opinion of the Supreme court of the United States in Ray v. Law, 8 Cranch 179, that a decree for a sale under a mortgage is a final decree, disapproved.

Same—Interlocutory—Review on Appeal§—Case at Bar.

—In a suit by one partner against his copartner, for a settlement of the partnership accounts, and for a moiety of a tract of land purchased by the defendant in his own name, and paid for out of the partnership funds, a decree having been made declaring the land partnership property, and directing a settlement of the accounts, and the cause afterwards coming on to be further heard upon the report of the commissioner, the court decrees that the plaintiff pay to the defendant a sum of money appearing due by the report, and that the defendant thereupon convey to the plaintiff a moiety of the land; but if the plaintiff shall not, within six months from the date of the decree, pay the said money, that the marshal sell the moiety of the land, and out of the proceeds

21 *of sale, after defraying the expenses, pay to the defendant the money so decreed, and the residue, if any, to the plaintiff. And the court further decrees that the outstanding debts due to the firm be equally divided between the parties, and that the costs of the suit be equally borne by them. HOLD, this decree is interlocutory, and it may be reviewed upon an appeal, although there has been such lapse of time between the rendition of the decree and the appeal, as would preclude its being reviewed if the decree were final.

†Same—Same—Costs.—The principal case is cited in Noel v. Noel, 86 Va. 109, 114, 9 S. E. Rep. 584, to the point that every decree that leaves anything to be done by the court is interlocutory as between the parties remaining in court, even though it disposes of the costs.

§Same—Distinction between Action of Court "In" the Cause and "Beyond" the Cause.—In Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 458, it is said: "There is a distinction between the action of the court in the cause, which the court has no right to take, unless all the parties are before it, and the action of the court beyond the cause. If any of the parties to the suit have died, the cause must be revived, before the court can take any action in the cause. By action of the court beyond the cause I mean those measures which are necessary for the execution of a decree, which has been pronounced, and which are properly to be regarded as adopted not in but beyond the cause as founded on the decree itself without respect to the relief, to which the party was primarily entitled upon the merits of the case. This kind of action beyond the cause may be had either before a final decree, as in this case, or after a final decree. This distinction is pointed out by JUDGE BALDWIN in the case of Cocke v. Gilpin, 1 Rob. 28, and has been recognized as a correct distinction by this court heretofore."

The principal case is cited on this point in Series v. Cromer, 88 Va. 429, 13 S. E. Rep. 859; Noel v. Noel, 86 Va. 112, 9 S. E. Rep. 584; Yates v. Wilson, 86 Va.

Appellate Jurisdiction—What May Be Reviewed by Appellate Court.—The land having been sold under the said interlocutory decree, and purchased by the defendant at a sacrifice; and then, after process of scire facias at the instance of the defendant to revive in the name of the plaintiff's administrator and heirs, and after taking an account of the administration, a final decree being rendered against the administrator personally, for so much of the money decreed to the defendant as was not satisfied by the sale of the land; and upon an appeal by the administrator, the court being of opinion that the interlocutory decree was for too large an amount, and therefore erroneous: Held, 1. That the sale of the land under the interlocutory decree, which had never been confirmed, ought to be set aside on the appeal by the administrator, although the heirs (who were infants) had not joined in the appeal. 2. That the revival of the suit as to the administrator, if regularly made, could only authorize a decree against him de bonis testatoris, and not a decree against him personally; for, if sought to be charged on the ground that he had wasted or failed to account for, or had in his hands, assets of the testator, he ought to have an Judicial Sales—When Absolute.—It is well settled that a sale by a commissioner under a decree in a court of equity is not an absolute sale, until it is confirmed by the court, and until this has been done, the purchaser has no fixed interest in the subject of the sale. Childs v. Hurd, 25 W. Va. 533, citing Hartley v. Hoffe, 12 W. Va. 401; Cocke v. Gilpin, 1 Rob. 39; Crews v. Pendleton, 1 Leigh 297; Heywood v. Covington, 4 Leigh 373; Taylor v. Marchant & Co., 28 Gratt. 177, and monographic note on "Judicial Sales" appended to Walker v. Page, 21 Gratt. 689.

Same—Summoning Purchaser—Hearing Evidence.—In Estill v. McClintic, 11 W. Va. 424, the court said: "The purchasers at such sales, or their representatives, should be summoned to answer these petitions; all the evidence bearing on the justice or propriety of the sales should be heard, including evidence as to the value of said lands when sold, and what improvements on them had been made by the purchasers, and what taxes paid by them, as also what rents and profits had been received from them; and the court should then, with all the facts and parties before it, do justice by setting aside the sales on such terms as are right, or by refusing to set them aside. This was the course pursued in Londons v. Echols, 17 Gratt. 15; Hughes v. Johnston, 12 Gratt. 479. See also, as indicating that this is the proper course to be pursued: Pierce v. Trigg, 10 Leigh 406; Parker v. McCoy, 10 Gratt. 504; and also the cases: Bank of the United States v. Ritchie, 8 Pet. 128; Coger v. Coger, 2 Dana 370; McKee v. Hammon, 9 Dana 520; Parker v. Anderson, 5 Mon. 445. In Huston v. Cantril, 11 Leigh 186; Cocke v. Gilpin, 1 Rob. 26; and Buchanan v. Clark, 10 Gratt. 164, no supplemental proceedings were taken, because the purchasers were in those cases already parties in the causes."

opportunity of being heard on that subject, in answer to a bill with proper averments. 3. That upon the filing of such a bill, a sale of the land ought to be suspended, until the result of a settlement of the administration accounts should shew whether that property could not be relieved by the application of the personal assets to any balance in favour of the defendant.

James Cocke, in April 1816, filed a bill in the superior court of chancery formerly holden in Richmond, against Alban Gilpin and John F. Cocke, setting forth, that in 1805 he entered into partnership with defendants, under the firm of Gilpin, Cocke & company; that Gilpin was the acting partner; that the business of the partnership has been discontinued; but that, while the partnership existed, Gilpin, with a part of the capital stock *or funds of the partnership, purchased about 1100 acres of land lying near Russelville in the county of Logan and state of Kentucky, and fraudulently took a deed for the land in his own name. The bill prayed an account of the capital stock and profits of the partnership, and a decree compelling Gilpin to convey to the plaintiff his share of the land, or, on a sale thereof, to account to the plaintiff for his share of the proceeds.

Gilpin answered, admitting the copartnership, referring for the terms thereof to certain articles filed with his answer, and stating that the partnership was carried on from the 4th of April 1805 until about the 2d of September 1807. The land, he stated, he had purchased on his individual account, and he claimed it as his own.

It was charged in the bill, and admitted in the answer of John F. Cocke, that he contributed none of the capital of the firm, and was entitled to no part of the profits. He disclaimed all interest in the land.

The accounts were referred to a commissioner, and Gilpin was ordered to produce before the commissioner the books and papers of the firm.

On the 11th of January 1819, commissioner Amos Ladd made a report, stating, that he was not then able to make such a report as would enable the court to make a final decree, but that, at the suggestion of the parties, he had made such a statement as would enable the court to decide upon the rights of the parties to the land.

The cause coming on to be heard upon this report the 23d of June 1819, the chancellor was satisfied that the tract of land, though purchased by and conveyed to Gilpin in his own name, was paid for out of the funds of the copartnership. Gilpin was therefore held a trustee of the land for the benefit of the partnership, and it was declared that the said land, and the profits which had accrued therefrom, should be brought into the general account of the partnership property, for the common benefit of both partners 23 as tenants in common, in *like manner as if the land had been purchased in the name of the firm. The report was thereupon recommitted to the commissioner.

The commissioner made another report the 28th of January 1820. This report was recommitted the 4th of February 1822, and another report made the 4th of March 1823.

The plaintiff excepted, because there was no account of the outstanding debits and credits of the partnership.

The cause came on to be further heard on the 26th of March 1825, when a supplemental report was made, and a decree entered according thereto. This decree was in the following terms:

"This cause came on this day to be further heard on the papers formerly read, and the report of commissioner Amos Ladd, made in pursuance of the decretal order of the 4th day of February 1822, with an exception thereto by the plaintiff, and was argued by counsel: on consideration whereof, and of the supplemental report of the 26th day of March 1825 now filed, the court, overruling the said exception and approving and confirming the said supplemental report, doth adjudge, order and decree that the plaintiff pay to the defendant Gilpin the sum of 5701 dollars 39 cents, with legal interest on 3361 dollars 70 cents, part thereof, from the 31st day of December 1822 until paid, and that the defendant Gilpin thereupon convey to the plaintiff Cocke one equal moiety of the Kentucky lands in the proceedings mentioned, by deed of bargain and sale with special warranty; but if the plaintiff shall not, within six months from the date hereof, pay to the defendant Gilpin the said sum of money and interest, the marshal of this court, after having advertised the time and place of sale for six weeks in some one of the newspapers published in the city of Richmond, do expose to sale at public auction to the highest bidder, for cash, one equal 24 but *undivided moiety of the said Kentucky land, and out of the proceeds of sale, after defraying the expenses attending the same, do pay to the defendant Gilpin the sum of money with the interest aforesaid, and the residue, if any, pay to the plaintiff. And the court doth further adjudge, order and decree that the outstanding debts due to the late concern of Gilpin, Cocke & co. be equally divided between the plaintiff and the defendant Alban Gilpin. And it being very probable that the apparent balance due from the said concern of Gilpin, Cocke & co. is not a real balance, the court doth adjudge, order and decree that the costs of this suit be equally borne by the parties.

After this, process of revivor was issued at the instance of the defendant, against Armistead A. Green administrator with the will annexed of James Cocke, and also against Cocke's widow and heirs. The process was returned with an affidavit of service as to the widow and each of the heirs. The heirs being infants, the marshal was assigned guardian for them, to shew cause why the suit should not be revived. The record contained no return or affidavit of service on Green; but there was an entry that the scire facias awarded in the cause being returned executed on the defendants therein named, and no cause being shewn to the contrary,

The marshal of the court reported, on the 1st of June 1826, that after having advertised the time and place of sale as directed by the decree, he exposed to sale at the front door of the Eagle hotel in the city of Richmond, at public auction to the highest bidder, for cash, one equal but undivided moiety of 1133 $\frac{1}{3}$ acres of land in Logan county, Kentucky, when Alban Gilpin, being the highest bidder, became the purchaser thereof at 12 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents per acre; to wit, for 566 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres, equal to 70 dollars 81 cents. This was a very small 25 proportion of the price paid for the land when Gilpin bought it. *On the 19th of January 1827, the court ordered Green to render an account of his administration of Cocke's estate, and an account of all the assets of the estate, and of the debts due from the estate.

Under this order, commissioner Baker made a report on the 13th of October 1827, which was recommitted on the 9th of January 1828, and another report made the 9th of June 1828. Afterwards the following decree was entered on the 25th of March 1829:

"This cause came on this day to be further and finally heard on the papers formerly read, and the report of commissioner Baker of the 9th of June 1828, made in pursuance of the order of the 9th of January in the same year, and to which there was no exception, and was argued by counsel: on consideration whereof, as it appears by the last mentioned report, and the report of the same commissioner on the 13th of October 1827, to which there was also no exception, that legal assets have come to the hands of Armistead A. Green administrator as aforesaid, more than sufficient to pay the sum of 5641 dollars 16 cents, with legal interest on 3061 dollars 71 cents, part thereof, from the 31st day of December 1822 until paid, that being the sum due to the defendant Gilpin after crediting the net proceeds of the sale of the land mentioned in the marshal's report of sale of the 1st of June 1826, and the defendant's costs in this suit; the court doth therefore adjudge, order and decree that the plaintiff Armistead A. Green do, out of the estate of the testator in his hands to be administered, if so much thereof he hath, but if not, then out of his own estate, pay to the defendant Alban Gilpin the said sum of 5641 dollars 16 cents, with interest after the rate of six per centum per annum from the 31st day of December 1822 until paid, and his costs by him about his defence in this behalf expended."

A writ of fieri facias having issued upon this decree, Green gave a forthcoming 26 bond with sureties, which was *forfeited, and then there was a decree awarding execution thereupon.

Green, as administrator with the will annexed of Cocke, presented a petition praying an appeal from the various decrees before mentioned, and the appeal was allowed.

The cause was argued by Rhodes and C. Johnson for the appellant, and by Robert G. Scott and Patton for the appellee. The argument was chiefly upon the question whether the decree of the 26th of March 1825 was final or interlocutory; but it also embraced the merits of the controversy. That the argument was elaborate, may be inferred from the elaborate opinions of the judges.

BALDWIN, J. It is necessary in the first place to consider whether the decree of March 1825 was final or interlocutory; for if final, we cannot enquire into its merits, more than three years having elapsed from the time of its rendition prior to the appeal, by which, under the law then existing, the right of appeal was barred: and it follows, in that view of the case, that the proceedings subsequent to that decree (which treated it as interlocutory), including the decree of March 1829 and the decree on the forthcoming bond, were erroneous and must be reversed. On the other hand, if the decree of 1825 was interlocutory, we must examine its merits, as also those of the subsequent proceedings.

A decree is final, when it either refuses or grants the redress sought by the party complaining. The plaintiff being the party who ordinarily seeks relief, the refusal of the court to allow it is usually accomplished by dismissing the bill. That of course terminates the cause, and sends the parties out of court. On the other hand, the case is also terminated by the granting of the whole relief contemplated by the court. In regard to that result, there can be no summary 27 form by which it is to be *accomplished; and we must look to the nature of the relief granted, in order to ascertain whether it is the final action of the court. Hence the difficulty which sometimes occurs in ascertaining whether a decree is final or interlocutory. An interlocutory decree may be merely preparatory to a decision upon the merits, by directing an enquiry necessary to the elucidation thereof, as for example the ordering of an issue; or it may go further, and deciding the principles as then presented by the record, institute proceedings for the purpose of enabling the court thereafter to apply those principles to the details of the subject, as for example directing an account; or it may approach still more nearly to the nature of a final decree, by granting relief in part, and suspending the action of the court as to the residue for further investigation, or by directing measures for entire relief to a certain extent, with a view to perfecting them thereafter, upon the supposition of contingencies or emergencies which cannot be well provided for by anticipation; which last case may be illustrated by an order for the sale of property, without direction as to the application of the proceeds. And so, by various gradations, the interlocutory decree may be made to approximate the final determination, until the line of discrimination becomes too faint to be readily perceived. Thus it becomes necessary to resort to some criterion by which the distinction between the two kinds of decree may be preserved: and I regard it as comparatively of but little importance what that criterion is, provided it be uniform, and capable of a certain application; for so soon as it becomes established, the courts of original cognizance, and the parties to the controversy, by conforming to the rule, will avoid the greatest inconvenience which can occur,—that of uncertainty whether further judicial action is to be had in the inferior or the appellate tribunal. For my own part, I am aware of

28 further action *of the court in the cause is necessary to give completely the relief contemplated by the court, there the decree upon which the question arises is to be regarded not as final, but interlocutory. I say the further action of the court in the cause, to distinguish it from that action of the court which is common to both final and interlocutory decrees, to wit, those measures which are necessary for the execution of a decree that has been pronounced, and which are properly to be regarded as adopted, not in, but beyond the cause, and as founded on the decree itself or mandate of the court, without respect to the relief to which the party was previously entitled upon the merits of his case. Any other criterion than this seems to me liable to the objection of ambiguity or uncertainty.

To apply this criterion to the present case: The court treated the defendant Gilpin as standing in the attitude of plaintiff, and decreed to him against his adversary Cocke the balance found in his favour, and that in the event of nonpayment, Cocke's moiety of the Kentucky land should be sold for satisfaction thereof. Now, the relief in part contemplated by the court clearly was, that Cocke's interest in the land should be sold without unnecessary sacrifice, which was the obvious interest of both parties, as it could not be foreseen that Gilpin was to become the purchaser. But how could this object be accomplished, unless by the adoption of means to give to the purchaser at the sale the title which had been acquired by the parties? It could not have been contemplated by the court that the land should be sacrificed, by withholding the title from the purchaser, and giving the bidders to understand, not only that the officer authorized to sell was without authority to convey, but that the court had disrobed itself of the power to cause a conveyance to be thereafter made. Such was the inevitable result of regarding the decree for sale as the final action of the court; for it gave no authority to 29 the *marshal to convey to the purchaser the title vested in the parties, and there being no title in the marshal, a deed from him would have been a mere nullity. Whereas, upon the supposition that the decree was interlocutory, the omission to direct a conveyance by the marshal was wholly unimportant, as the purchaser would buy under the confident expectation that the court would, at the accustomed period, exercise its unquestionable power of conferring upon him a title to the property. Thus it will be seen that the further action of the court in the cause was necessary to give completely the relief which it contemplated: and we cannot suppose that the court intended to withhold the title from the purchaser, without subjecting it to the imputation of designing a sacrifice of the property.

The structure of the decree, it is true, in some of its parts, would seem to indicate at first view that the court supposed it to be final. Thus the balance due to Gilpin is directed to be paid to him by the marshal out of the proceeds of the sale, and the residue, if any, to be paid to the plaintiff; there is no direction to the marshal to report his proceedings to the court; and the costs of the suit are disposed of, by awarding them to be equally borne by the parties. But none of these circumstances, in my opinion, gave finality to the decree. Whatever may be thought of the expediency of disposing of the proceeds before a confirmation of the sale, it is certain that it would not deprive the court of its power to set aside the sale for irregularity or fraud; though it might occasion obstacles to replacing the parties in their previous condition. So the omission to require the officer to report his proceedings is a mere informality, as an order of that kind must be regarded as merely directory, if it be the accustomed duty of such a commissioner to inform the court of what he has done under its authority, as I think there can be no doubt it is. And as to the disposal of the costs, that is a matter (as concerns this question) altogether equivocal; for the court 30 has undoubtedly *the power to dispose of the costs which have accrued, from time to time, at any stage of the cause, or not to dispose of them at all, according to its discretion. These circumstances, therefore, can only tend to raise a probability that the court may have supposed the effect of its decree would be final instead of interlocutory; and even in that point of view can have no weight, if the substantial purpose and scope of the decree was, as I think I have shewn, of an interlocutory character. Such a supposition of the court would be a speculative inference from the provisions of the decree, unnecessary in the discharge of its duty, and in no wise obligatory upon its future conduct; in truth, an abstract opinion merely, which it was at liberty to disregard, and has in fact (if ever entertained) disregarded, in its subsequent action upon the subject.

It is obvious that the whole apparent difficulty upon this question has arisen from the omission in the decree, of a direction to the marshal to report his proceedings to the court. If that had been done, I presume no one would have questioned the interlocutory character of the decree. And yet nothing is clearer to my mind than that such a direction in a decree would not make it interlocutory, if it gave final relief by its provisions; and so, on the other hand, that the omission of such a direction would not make a decree final, if by its provisions the relief was interlocutory. Such an omission is not an error of judgment in the court, requiring the correction of an appellate tribunal, but is rather in the nature of a clerical misprision, which the court may at any time thereafter correct, and which in fact it does correct by its subsequent treatment of the decree as interlocutory.

I can perceive no inconvenience whatever from my interpretation of the decree in question. It certainly cannot operate so as to defeat the justice of this case; but on the contrary must have the effect of promoting 31 it, if the decree be erroneous upon its merits. To *that desirable object, it is true, I would not sacrifice principles important and salutary in the general administration of justice; but the attainment of it can furnish no argument against the exercise of the appellate jurisdiction of this tribunal. The uniform establishment of the criterion to which I have resorted, can, in my estimation, be productive of none but beneficial results. The effect of discarding it would often times be to fix upon the inferior court an error by implication, and to occasion uncertainty as to the proper forum for obtaining redress. On the other hand, what harm can be done by extending to the court of original cognizance the indulgent belief, that it did not wilfully turn aside from the safe and beaten path of equitable administration, for the purpose of delegating an arbitrary and unrestrained judicial authority to a merely ministerial officer? Where can be the mischief or inconvenience, whenever the judicial action of the court itself in the cause has not been perfected, of permitting it to control the ministration of its servants, and even to turn back and correct its own errors of omission and commission, instead of driving the parties into an appellate forum? I admit the wisdom and obligation of the legislative policy which inhibits the re-examination of an adjudicated cause after the lapse of the prescribed period. But the policy and duty of preventing such re-examination in the appellate tribunal, before the final adjudication of the inferior jurisdiction, are equally apparent, save only in those cases, founded on peculiar reasons, which have been made exceptions by legislative enactment. Nor do I perceive the expediency of attempting to guard against injurious delays in the judicial action of the primary forum, after the merits of the cause have been there settled, by the necessity of encountering equal if not greater, and, it may be, repeated delays in the supervising tribunal.

32 *On this subject, but little light is to be obtained from the practice and decisions of the english chancery. There they have no practical distinction between interlocutory and final decrees, as regards the right of appeal. That right is not, as with us, regulated by statute, and from the time of its first introduction has existed as well in relation to interlocutory as to final decrees. It is somewhat remarkable that a misapprehension of that matter should have prevailed so extensively amongst us, as the english books of practice are quite explicit in regard to it: see 1 Harr. Ch. 454, 457, 2 Smith's Ch. Pract. 40. Seaton's Forms 3,—from which it is clear that an appeal lies to the house of lords from any interlocutory order. The right of appeal, according to the english practice, does not depend upon the stage at which the cause has arrived, but upon an arbitrary regulation, equally applicable to interlocutory and final decrees, to wit, the enrolment of the decree or order. The enrolment is at the instance of a party, by a docquet prepared from proceedings, papers and pleadings in the cause, which is examined and signed by the six clerk, and left with the secretary of decrees for the signature of the lord chancellor, by which it is completed. 2 Smith's Ch. Pract. 4. Prior to enrolment, an order or decree, however final in its character, may be corrected or varied, on a petition for rehearing before the same judge, or of appeal to the lord chancellor, which is regarded as a rehearing and governed by the same rules. After enrolment there can be no rehearing of a decree or order, whatever may be its character; and the only appeal is to the house of lords. The enrolment may be made as soon as it can be prepared, but six months are allowed for it, and after that an order may be obtained from the lord chancellor, nunc pro tunc. It is not prevented by the death of a party, or abatement 33 of the suit. If a party wishes to prevent a decree or order from being reheard before the judge who pronounced it, or an appeal to the lord chancellor, he must enrol it; the effect of which is to make the decree or order of the vice-chancellor or the master of the rolls, that of the lord chancellor, and to deprive the latter of the power of rehearing, whether the decree or order be originally his own, or that of one of the other judges. But the enrolment may be prevented by a petition of rehearing, or appeal to the lord chancellor, or a caveat filed for the purpose of enabling a party so to proceed within a given time. On this subject see 2 Smith's Ch. Pract. 2, 3, 4, 14, 18, 27, 39, 426. 1 Harr. Ch. 439, 442, 481. The effect of an enrolment is the same in regard to a bill of review, whatever may be the character of the decree; so that if a party resorts to the same tribunal after enrolment, he must do it by bill of review, though the decree be merely interlocutory. 2 Madd. Ch. 454, 464. 2 Smith's Ch. Pract. 48, 49, 64. Thus it will be seen that though the enrolment does not depend upon the nature of the decree, yet it has the effect of giving it a decree of finality; and hence it is also resorted to by a party to give additional security to his title, to enable him to plead the decree against another suit for the same purpose, and to obtain the benefit of the limitation to an appeal by the standing order of the house of lords, which is computed from the enrolment, and not from the date of the decree. 2 Smith's Ch. Pract. 2, 3.

The practice of enrolment is unknown in Virginia, as are many other matters of practice in the multifarious and expensive system of the english chancery, requiring numerous officers, and calculated to promote accuracy and precision, and relieve the court from laborious details, by condensing and simplifying the questions submitted to its consideration. As we do not resort to the practice of enrolment, our course has been to look to the character of the decree, in reference to 34 rehearings, *appeals, and bills of review. With us the right of appeal, from the foundation of the government, has been regulated by statute, and for a number of years was made to depend altogether upon the finality of the decree, in relation to appeals to the supreme court of appeals. Thus the acts of October 1778 and May 1779, establishing the court of appeals (9 Hen. stat. at large 523, 4, 10 Id. 90,) and the revised act of 1792, (13 Id. 406,) by their plain terms require the decree or decision of the court below to be final. The manifest meaning, ex vi termini, was that the cause should be terminated before its removal to the appellate jurisdiction; and the obvious policy was to prevent the delay and expense of unnecessary and reiterated appeals. Appeals were not allowed from interlocutory decrees to the court of appeals until January 1798, when, by an act of that date, a limited right of appeal from interlocutory decrees was introduced, which has been since continued under various modifications. 2 Rob. Prac. 421-5. But the right of appeal from final decrees still stands upon its original footing. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 66, § 50, 51, p. 206. Suppl. to Rev. Code, p. 146, 7.

The result of our legislative policy on this subject has been, that as a general rule, the jurisdiction of the supreme appellate tribunal does not begin until that of the inferior court has terminated; that an appeal properly allowed brings into discussion before the appellate court all the previous proceedings in the cause; and that pending an appeal, the further cognizance and proceedings, of the court below are suspended in relation to any question involved in the cause, so far as its merits are concerned. In these respects we have departed from the rules of the english chancery. There, a decision of the chancellor which settles a principle, or gives relief to any extent, may be brought at once before the house of lords, if the decree or order 35 has been enrolled: there the discussion in the appellate forum is *confined to the decree or order appealed from, and cannot be extended to any previous proceeding, however much the justice of the case may require it, without a formal extension of the appeal, (2 Smith's Ch. Pract. 41. Bouchier v. Dillon, 5 Bligh 714): and there the appeal does not suspend proceedings upon the decree, without a special order, which is rarely granted. 2 Smith's Ch. Pract. 68, 69. Willan v. Willan, 16 Ves. 216, Walburn v. Ingilby, 1 Mylne & Keene 61, 6 Cond. Eng. Ch. Rep. 498.

It will be seen from an examination of the numerous decisions of this court on the subject of the finality of decrees, in reference to appeals, bills of review &c. that they have all been founded upon the idea, that a decree is not final unless the cause itself has been thereby terminated in the court below. Thus, though a decree decides upon the question of title, or otherwise settles the principles of the cause, Young v. Skipwith, 2 Wash. 300. Grymes v. Pendleton, 1 Call 54. M'Call v. Peachy, 1 Call 55. Bowyer &c. v. Lewis, 1 Hen & Munf. 553,—though it dismisses the plaintiff's bill as to one of two separate subjects of controversy, and as to the other also determines the rights of the parties, Templeman v. Steptoe, 1 Munf. 339,—though a decree nisi directs that the tract of land in the bill mentioned be surveyed and part thereof allotted to the plaintiff, and that the defendant shall execute to him a conveyance for such part, and pay the costs of the suit, Aldridge &c. v. Giles &c., 3 Hen. & Munf. 136,—though the decree directs the defendant to pay to the plaintiff hires to be ascertained by commissioners, and to deliver up the property, to be sold by the commissioners, and the proceeds applied to payment of the plaintiff's claim and the costs of suit, and the residue, if any, to be paid to the defendant, Mackey v. Bell, 2 Munf. 523,—though, at the suit of creditors against executors and devisees, it empowers the executors to sell 36 such of the lands held by the devisees, as, *after application of the testator's goods and credits, shall be necessary for the payment of his debts, Goodwin v. Miller, 2 Munf. 42,—though it awards to the plaintiff his principal money, interest and costs, if it directs, in the event of an unproductive execution, that certain trust property shall be delivered by the defendant to the marshal to be sold, and the proceeds, after deducting a sum to be deposited for another, to be applied to the satisfaction of the plaintiff, Hill's ex'or v. Fox's adm'r, 10 Leigh 587,—though, in a mortgage suit, it forecloses the mortgage and directs the sale of the property, Fairfax v. Muse's ex'ors, 2 Hen. & Munf. 558. Ellzey v. Lane's ex'x, Id. 592. Allen v. Belches, Id. 595,—yet in all these cases the decree is only interlocutory, if something yet remains to be done in the cause, and so the parties are not put out of court.

On the other hand, there is no case decided by this court, in which the decree has been held to be final where the judicial action of the court in the cause has not been exhausted. I do not mean that it is necessary the court by its decree should respond to all the questions in controversy, or to the whole relief prayed in the bill, its silence being often equally emphatic; but that this court has never held, where a given relief was contemplated, that the decree was final, if something remained to be done in the cause to render it effectual. The case of Harvey & wife v. Branson, 1 Leigh 108, has been strongly urged upon us by the appellee's counsel; but the principles of that case, in my opinion, are altogether different from those properly applicable to this. That case, and the case of Borden v. Bowyer &c. connected and determined with it, involved the distribution and appropriation of a fund arising out of the sales of detached fragments of what was originally an immense estate of unsettled lands, but the greater portion of which had been disposed of before 37 the existence of the controversy. The suits were pending many years, *and the fund had accumulated under the management of an agent (appointed by the court and acting as commissioner and curator) from the proceeds of sales made by him from time to time, and accessions to it were to accrue indefinitely thereafter from like sales that he was to continue to make as opportunities should offer. The commissioner had ample powers to sell and convey by private contracts according to his discretion, and to loan out and secure the proceeds from time to time. Under these circumstances (which I derive not merely from the reported statement, but from my own recollection, having been counsel in the cause in the chancery court) the court undertook to dispose of the whole subject by a decree conformable to its views of the rights of the parties, and embracing not merely the moneys on hand, but also the increment thereafter from the future sales. That decree was substantially the ultimate judicial disposition of a continuing trust; and a final decree could not be made in the cause in any other mode than that adopted by the court. It gave the whole relief contemplated by the court, and no further action of the court in the cause was requisite. It distributed and appropriated not only the fund on hand, but all that was thereafter to accrue under the continued agency of the commissioner. If the commissioner performed his prescribed duties in good faith, the parties could sustain no prejudice from any want of authority on his part; and if he acted unfaithfully, he would be liable to the control of the court, in like manner as any other ministerial officer engaged in the execution of its decrees. It is true there were reservations in the decree, of leave to the parties, at any time thereafter, to apply to the court to supersede the commissioner, or to appoint any other commissioner or commissioners to act with or to succeed him, or to have the unsold lands divided amongst the parties according to their prescribed proportions. But those res-

38 ervations for the more complete and beneficial *execution of the decree, so far as they could be considered as transcending the incidental powers of the court, did not render the decree the less final, but were powers withdrawn from the cause and engrafted upon the decree, from which thenceforth they derived their whole force and efficacy. The case, it seems to me, is widely different from the one before us, which is rather that of the constitution of a new fund than the disposal of one then existing, and more like a decree for the sale of mortgaged premises without provision for conferring upon the purchaser at the sale directed the title to the property.

The other cases of decrees held by this court to be final require but little notice. Those of Sheppard's ex'or v. Starke & wife, 3 Munf. 29, and Thorntons v. Fitzhugh, 4 Leigh 209, turned upon reservations in the decree of a future resort to the court, which were decided not to affect their finality. That of Royall's adm'rs v. Johnson, &c., 1 Rand. 421, presented the question whether a decree was final as to one defendant though interlocutory as to the rest; and it was, under the circumstances, decided in the affirmative. A similar question had arisen in the case of Alexander's heirs v. Coleman & wife, 6 Munf. 328, in which the result of the opinions of a divided court was that the decree, under the circumstances, was interlocutory. These cases, though cited in the argument, have no bearing upon the present, except so far as the reasoning of the judges may be supposed to throw light upon the general subject.

It seems to me that the effect of treating such a decree as the one in question as final, is to impair the controlling power of the court of original cognizance over the execution of its own decree; for it is obvious that it would be nugatory for that court to set aside a sale under the decree, however great the sacrifice, because of an objection arising out of a defect in the decree itself, without at the 39 same time correcting the decree, *which cannot be done upon the supposition of its finality; though in such a case we have a right to suppose that the property was sacrificed, because the purchaser was not expected to obtain a conveyance of the title, or that injustice is done him by withholding the title after he has paid the value of the property. It cannot be doubted that a decree or order of the court at some stage of the cause is necessary to enable the purchaser to obtain the title; and if that decree or order be made subsequently to the sale, it is the final decree or order in the cause, and consequently the decree for sale interlocutory. It would derogate much from the power and dignity of that court, to treat the purchaser as having acquired a right to the property, and at the same time turn him round to a new suit for the purpose of obtaining a conveyance. In truth, however, the purchaser acquires no right until a confirmation of the sale by the court; and until the order confirming the report, he is only inchoately and not absolutely a purchaser, having till then no fixed interest in the subject. That such is the english doctrine is well settled: Sugd. on Vend. 50, 51, 52, 57. Ex parte Minor, 11 Ves. 559. Twigg v. Fifield, 13 Id. 517. Anson v. Towgood, 1 Jac. & Walk. 619. The same doctrine has been recognized by this court in several cases. Crews v. Pendleton, &c. 1 Leigh 297. Heywood v. Covington's heirs, 4 Id. 373. Taylor v. Cooper, 10 Id. 317, from the first of which it will be seen that before the confirmation of the report and conveyance of the title, the purchaser must resort to that tribunal in which the proceedings were had, for the adjustment and enforcement of his claims.

It has been suggested by one of the appellee's counsel, that in relation to mortgages this court has departed from the english doctrine, according to which he supposes the decree for foreclosure to be final, and that the english rule was followed by the supreme 40 court of the United States, in the case of Ray v. Law, 3 Cranch 179. *But upon consulting the authorities, it will be found that the english doctrine is directly the contrary; and it will be seen from the report of Ray v. Law, that it was decided without argument, and, it would seem, without much consideration. The english rule is, that the final order to a decree of foreclosure is absolutely necessary to its perfection; so much so, that without its being obtained, a decree of foreclosure is not a good plea to a bill to redeem. 5 Bac. Abr. 733. Coote on Mortg. 527. Senhouse v. Earl, 2 Ves. 450. The length to which the rule has been carried appears from the case of Thompson v. Grant, 4 Madd. Ch. Rep. 438. There a question arose as to the effect of a decree of foreclosure in another cause. The decree had directed the master to take an account of principal, interest and costs, and that upon the defendant's payment thereof within six months after the making of the report, at such time and place as the master should appoint, the plaintiff should convey and reassign the mortgaged premises; but that in default of such payment by the time aforesaid, the defendant should thenceforth stand absolutely debarred and foreclosed of and from all right, title, interest and equity of redemption of and to the said mortgaged premises. The master reported the amount due to the plaintiff for principal, interest and costs, and appointed a day for payment thereof by the defendant to the plaintiff. Afterwards, on affidavit of nonpayment, a final order was made that the defendant should stand absolutely debarred and foreclosed of and from all right, title, interest and equity of redemption in and to the mortgaged premises. But the mortgagee, between the decree of foreclosure and the final order, made his will, by which he devised all lands which should be vested in him by mortgage at the time of his death, as part of his personal estate. He did not die until after the final order, and the question was whether the mortgaged premises passed by the devise; and it was held that they 41 *did not, the effect of the final order being to convert the mortgage chattel interest into a fee simple estate. Thus, notwithstanding the decree of foreclosure, the mortgage still remained a mortgage, and would have passed as such under the devise but for the intervention of the final order, which changed the character of the estate and took it out of the operative words of the devise, the foreclosure being completed by the final order, and the decree previously merely interlocutory and prospective. And upon this ground the cause was decided against the devisees, though there were other terms in the devise which would have embraced the estate, if after acquired lands could have passed by will.

If it should be supposed that purchasers under such a decree as the one we are considering would be liable to mischief by treating it as interlocutory instead of final, I would remark that the mischief, in my apprehension, lies the other way; for though the lapse of five years protects the decree, if final, from being reversed by appeal or bill of review, yet within that period it is infallibly liable to such reversal, because fatally erroneous from its very finality; and if so reversed, the purchaser's claim must, for the same reason, necessarily fall: whereas if the decree be interlocutory, the purchaser has nothing to do but to obtain a confirmation of the report and a conveyance of the title, in which aspect there is no error nor irregularity in the proceeding, and he is then protected against all other irregularities in the cause, if the proper parties having title to the subject be before the court; the rule being, that a purchaser has a right to presume that the court has taken the steps necessary to investigate the rights of the parties, and on that investigation has properly decreed a sale. 2 Smith's Ch. Pract. 198. Bennet v. Harrell, 2 Sch. & Lef. 566. In fine, I cannot perceive the priority of construing a decree to be final, and thereby *rendering it erroneous, when the regarding it as interlocutory relieves it from the imputed error.

The foregoing views lead me to the conclusion that the decree of March 1825 was interlocutory.

Upon the merits, that decree is clearly erroneous. [The judge here pointed out the errors, but the correction of them involved no such general principle as would make a particular report thereof necessary, or indeed proper. After stating the nature and extent of each of the errors so pointed out, he proceeded as follows:]

For these errors the decree of 1825, and the final decree of 1829 of which it forms the basis, ought, in my opinion, to be reversed, and the sale made under the former of Cocke's moiety of the Kentucky land (which has never been confirmed) set aside, the property having been subjected for an improper amount, and purchased in by the appellee at a sacrifice. I cannot agree with appellee's counsel, that the infant heirs of Cocke not having appealed, the appellant has no right to complain of the improper sale of the land, on the ground that he has no interest in that matter. He has, as I conceive, an interest in it as the representative of his testator's personal estate, which being liable to make up, for satisfaction of the decree, any inadequacy of the proceeds of the sale, must be prejudiced by a sacrifice of the land. Another fatal error in the proceedings subsequent to the interlocutory decree is, that the appellant is personally subjected to the payment of the balance found against his testator, upon an account of his administration not warranted by the pleadings in the cause. The effect of a revival of the suit as to him, if it had been regularly made (though there seems to have been no order of revival against, nor process of revival executed upon him), would have been only to authorize a decree against him de bonis testatoris, for the balance ascertained against his testator, and not a decree *against him personally on the ground that he had wasted or failed to account for, or had in his hands, assets of his testator, without giving him an opportunity of being heard on that subject, in answer to a bill with proper averments; and upon the filing of such a bill, a sale of the land ought to be suspended, until the result of a settlement of the administration accounts should shew whether that property could not be relieved by the application of the personal assets to any balance in favour of the defendant.

My opinion therefore is, that the decrees of 1825 and 1829, and all proceedings under them, should be reversed and annulled, and the cause remanded in order to be proceeded in according to the principles above indicated.

ALLEN, J., concurred.

BROOKE, J. There certainly is an important difference between an interlocutory and a final decree; it needs no ghost to tell us that: but what that difference is, is the question. I think a decree which settles all matters in controversy in the pleadings, and gives the costs, is a final decree. Any thing else which is necessary to execute the decree does not change its character: it may be necessary to come back to the court for its order, to perfect the execution of the decree, but that does not affect its finality. The case of Harvey & wife v. Branson, 1 Leigh 108, was a case in which a commissioner was appointed by the court to sell the unsold lands &c. and leave was reserved to the parties, at any time whatever, to apply to the court to supersede the appointment of the commissioner to make sale of the lands, or to appoint any other commissioner or commissioners to act with or succeed him, or to have the unsold lands divided among the parties: manifestly leaving much more to be done by the court in the execution of the *decree, than in the case before us.

In all cases, whether the decree be interlocutory or final, the parties have always a right to the aid of the court to carry its decree into effect, whether liberty to apply to the court be reserved or not, unless where the decree is regularly fulfilled in all its provisions. In the case cited I said, that I concurred in the opinion that the decree was final and conclusive as to all cases (for there were three) as well upon the former decisions of this court on like questions, as upon principle; that I considered the case of Shepherd v. Starke as in point; that the court there must have regarded the decree as final, else it could not have entertained the bill of review as regular and proper. As to the reservations in the decree, those and all similar reservations, in my view, were simply in execution of the decree. That case I think much stronger in the interlocutory features of it than the case before us; unless indeed, as seems to be supposed, errors in a decree make it interlocutory. If so, there are few decrees which come before this court, that are not interlocutory, though treated as final.

The great injury to the public in considering such decrees as the one before us to be interlocutory, consists in almost forbidding persons to purchase property under them, and in lessening the value of such property. The legislature has wisely limited appeals from final decrees to a shorter period than writs of error and supersedeas in the perhaps in a single case, which will be hereafter noticed. Even in England, a decree for the sale of land is not regarded as final until the confirmation of the sale by the court; as is abundantly *shewn by the authorities which my brother Baldwin has referred to, and which I need not repeat. I am therefore of opinion that this part of the decree also (as to the sale of the land) is interlocutory.

Another part of the decree directs that the outstanding debts of the firm shall be divided between the parties to the concern. Can it be believed that the court intended this part of the decree to be final? The evidences of the debts, it is to be presumed, were in the hands of Gilpin; since he had been entrusted with their settlement and collection. Did the court mean to give to him, one of the parties interested, the same unlimited power as to the division of the debts, as has been claimed for the marshal in relation to the sale of the land? This can hardly be pretended. And if he was not to divide them, who was? Nobody is mentioned in the decree. This part of the decree, then, can only be regarded as an expression of opinion on the part of the court, as to what ought to be done with the outstanding debts; as a declaration or settlement of one of the principles of the case; leaving for adjudication, in some future stage of the cause, the manner in which that principle should be carried out.

It is apparent then, from every part of this decree, that the convenience and interest of the parties, and the very justice of the case, required the future action of the same court which pronounced it. Why should we deprive that court of the power of this necessary action, by pronouncing the decree final and not interlocutory? It is said that that court intended, by the decree which it pronounced, to make an end of the cause, and to put the parties out of court. If that was the intention of the court, we might be compelled to regard the decree as final. But where is the evidence of such intention? I think I may say confidently that no such intention is expressed. What are the circumstances from which it may be inferred? I am unable to perceive any *thing in the decree which can serve as a ground for such inference, except the circumstances that costs are decreed, and that the court has failed to direct the marshal to report his proceedings. Now, as to the decreeing of costs, although that circumstance may be taken into consideration in aid of other matters, in determining the character of a decree, yet it is manifest that it is entitled to but little weight, and is very far from being conclusive. In the case of Hill's ex'or v. Fox's adm'r, the decree was held to be interlocutory, although the costs were decreed. So also in Mackey v. Bell, 2 Munf. 523, and probably in many others.

As to the failure to direct the marshal to report: Although the order to report would be conclusive evidence of an intention in the court to take future action in the case, yet it does not follow that the omission to make such an order is evidence of intention not to proceed farther in the cause. The omission may have proceeded from mere inadvertence on the part of the court; or from the reflection that the marshal would be bound to report, although the decree contained no positive order. Look at the inconvenience which might result to the parties. The marshal may abuse the authority committed to him, and may make a sale which justice to all parties would imperiously require to be set aside. Yet if the decree be final, that measure of justice could only be effected by an appeal to this court, or by a new suit brought for the purpose. I cannot impute such gross error to the court below, on mere inference.

I have a word only as to Harvey & wife v. Branson. I have no doubt of the correctness of the decision; but it has no application to this case. In addition to the particular circumstances mentioned by judge Baldwin, the express reservation of liberty to the parties to apply to the court to supersede the commissioner, &c. proves that the court intended to put an end to that cause, and to put the parties out of court, by pronouncing a final *decree; for, as judge Carr said, "if the case was still pending and the parties in court, what need could there be of leave to the parties to apply to the court?" This circumstance, to say nothing of other matters, distinguishes that case from this; and this circumstance will justify the remark of judge Carr, that the power to sell included the power to convey. The remark is true as applied to that case; but I am not prepared to assent to it as a general proposition. The court has the power to make that a final decree, which might otherwise be merely interlocutory.

Upon the whole, I am clearly of opinion that the decree of the 26th of March 1825 was only interlocutory. And this opens the door to an examination of the alleged improprieties of that decree. As to them, I concur in the opinion delivered by JUDGE BALDWIN.

Henry v. Bradford.

May, 1842, Richmond.

Case Approved.—The decision in Maria and others v. Surbaugh, 2 Rand. 228, adhered to.

Emancipation of Slaves—Increase.*—A testator by his will directs that his negro girl Adah "shall only serve ten years, and then have her freedom." During the ten years Adah has a daughter named Ebby. A son of Ebby sues for his freedom. Held, he is a slave.

In a suit for freedom in the county court of Accomac, by Henry son of Ebby against John Brown Bradford, the jury returned a special verdict, which found the following facts:

That by the will of Brown Bradford, admitted to record in the court of Accomac county the 27th of January 1795, the testator devised and bequeathed as follows:

Emancipation of Slaves—Increase.—On this subject, see quotation from Wood v. Humphreys, 12 Gratt. 334, where the principal case is cited, in foot-note to Osborne v. Taylor, 12 Gratt. 117.

54 *"I lend the use of my plantation and all the rest of my property unto my dear wife Peggy Bradford during her widowhood, to school and bring up my children on; but my will is that my negro girl Adah shall only serve ten years, and then have her freedom: likewise my negro boy Abraham shall serve twelve years, and then have his freedom." That the negro girl Adah, in the said will named, was a slave of the said Brown Bradford, and survived her said master. That the testator died the 5th of December 1794; and after his death, and before the expiration of ten years from his death, to wit, on the 15th of March 1798, the said Adah had a child named Ebby, born on the day last mentioned. That the said Ebby was the mother of the plaintiff, who was born on the 15th day of May 1815. That the plaintiff was born in the possession of the defendant, and that he has ever since been in his possession and held by him as his slave, and is still so held.

The county court, being of opinion that the law upon the special verdict was for the defendant, gave judgment in his favour.

Henry petitioned the circuit court of Accomac for a supersedeas, which was denied; and then he presented a petition to a judge of this court for a supersedeas to the judgment of the circuit court, which was allowed.

The cause was argued by Lyons for the plaintiff, and John F. May for the defendant. The plaintiff contended, that according to the principle of Isaac v. West's ex'or, 6 Rand. 652, the civil condition of Adah was, immediately on the death of the testator, changed from that of slavery to freedom, although she was to serve ten years; that Ebby, though born when her mother was bound to service, was born free, and consequently that the plaintiff was born free. The defendant contended, that according to the principle of Maria and others v. Surbaugh, 2 Rand. 228, Adah continued a slave 55 *until she had served the ten years, at the expiration of which time she became a free woman; that her children born during the ten years were born slaves; that Ebby therefore was born a slave, and the plaintiff also.

CABELL, P. The court is unanimously of opinion that this case is ruled by that of Maria and others v. Surbaugh, and that there is no error in the order of the circuit court. It is therefore considered that the same be affirmed.

Ashby v. Smith and Wife.

May, 1842. Richmond.

(Absent ALLEN, J.)

Wills—Unexecuted Trust to Purchase and Divide Lands—Rights of Cestui Que Trust*—Case at Bar.—
An inhabitant of Frederick county, Virginia, who died in 1806, desired by his will, 1. that the tract of land on which he lived should be sold by his executors, at such time and upon such terms as they in their judgment might think would be most conducive to the advantage of his heirs; 2. that the money arising from the sale should be applied to the purchasing other lands upon the most advantageous terms, either in the state of Kentucky, or some other part of the western country that his executors might think would be most to the general interest of his heirs; and 3. that the lands so purchased should be divided amongst his five daughters and two sons, in the following manner: each of his daughters to have 400 acres, and the residue to be equally divided between the two sons; all of which divisions he desired should bear an equal proportion to each other in respect to the quality of land. The testator appointed his wife executrix, and one of the sons executor. The son qualified as executor a few months after the testator's death, and the widow died about two years afterwards. The husband of one of the daughters purchased the right of another daughter, and the three other daughters sold their rights to the son who was executor. In 1816,

56 a *bill was filed in the name of the husband and wife, to compel the executor to execute the trust by selling the land and distributing the proceeds. In 1827, a supplemental bill was filed, setting forth that in 1817 a sale was made, but the executor had taken no further step towards the execution of the trust; and praying that the plaintiffs might have a decree for their proportion of the proceeds of sale. The executor answered, that he had always been ready to purchase land in the western country for the complainants. HELD. 1. That as the trustee has improperly delayed the execution of the trust, until a great change has taken place in the situation of the western country and the circumstances of the parties, the beneficiaries ought not now to be compelled to take lands in the western country, but should be allowed to take their just proportion of the money arising from the sale of the Frederick lands; and that the principle of equality in the division of the said money is in this case just and proper. 2. That the female complainant's portion of the money arising from the sale of the lands should be so secured and protected, as to prevent its being subjected to the control or debts of the husband to a greater extent than if it were land,

Rep. 896. it is said: "At common law, if the wife be seised of an estate of inheritance in land, the husband, upon the marriage, becomes seised of the freehold jure uxoris, and he takes the rents and profits during their joint lives, or for his own life, as tenant by the curtesy, in case he survives the wife, having had a child born alive by her. 2 Kent Comm. 180; Ashby v. Smith, 1 Rob. Rep. 55. Hence, in the present case, McGuffin was entitled to the profits only of the surplus after the debts were paid. He was not entitled to the surplus absolutely, because it continued impressed with the character of realty, in the absence of the wife's consent that it should be otherwise regarded. Turner v. Dawson, 80 Va. 841; Ashby v. Smith, 1 Rob. 55."

unless the wife should consent that the money be paid to the husband absolutely; as to which she ought to be privily examined, separately and apart from her husband, in the same manner as in the conveyance of her real estate.

Decrees—Reversal—Costs.*—A decree being reversed in consequence of an error committed against one of the appellees, costs decreed to be paid by the appellant to the appellees, as the parties substantially prevailing.

Lewis Ashby, of Frederick county, made his will on the 20th of March 1806, whereby he devised as follows:

"First, The tract of land I now live on, on Shenandoah river, together with the tract whereon my mill is situated, I desire may be sold at such time and upon such terms, by my executors, as they in their judgment may think will be most to the advantage of my heirs.

"Secondly, The money so arising from the sale of the above land, it is my will and desire may be applied to the purchasing other lands upon the most advantageous terms, either in the state of Kentucky, or some other part of the western country that my executors *may think will be most to the general interest of my heirs.

"Thirdly, It is my will and desire that the lands so purchased shall be divided amongst my daughters and my two sons Alfred and John, in the following manner; that each of my daughters to have four hundred acres, and the residue to be equally divided among my two sons Alfred and John; all of which divisions shall bear an equal proportion to each other in respect to quality of land."

By the fourth clause the testator devised a tract of land in Kentucky, derived by him from his father, to his youngest sons Buckner and Lewis. Fifthly, he stated that he had already given his two daughters, Lucy Lewis Catlett and Kitty Morehead, as much of his personal property as was intended for them. He bequeathed, sixthly, a negro girl to his daughter Judy; and seventhly, a negro boy to his son Buckner. By the eighth clause he gave the remainder of his property to his children of the following names, viz. Judy, Alfred, Mildred, Jenny, John, Buckner, Sidney and Lewis. And lastly he appointed his wife Leannah executrix, and his son Alfred D. executor.

On the 1st of September 1806, the will was admitted to record, and the widow in open court renounced the provision made for her. Alfred D. Ashby qualified as executor the 2d of December 1806.

The widow survived the testator only about two years. All the testator's children, being ten in number, are named in the will. His daughter Mildred married Lewis A. Smith.

By a deed of the 5th of February 1813, William Catlett and Lucy his wife conveyed their rights under the said devises, to Lewis A. Smith. On the 18th of November 1815, Joel Morehead and Kitty his wife conveyed their rights under the said devises, to Alfred D. Ashby. And on the 2d of September 1816, Judy Ashby *and Jane Ashby (called in the will Jenny) conveyed their rights under the will to the said Alfred.

On the 28th of June 1816, Smith and wife commenced a suit in the superior court of chancery at Winchester, against Alfred D. Ashby, in his own right, and as executor and trustee. There were other defendants, amongst whom were John Ashby and Sidney Ashby, the only persons, besides the plaintiffs and Alfred D. Ashby, now interested under the devise of the land in Frederick county.

The bill, besides seeking an account of Alfred D. Ashby's transactions as executor and trustee, asked that he might be compelled to execute the trust reposed in him, by selling the land in Frederick county and distributing the proceeds, or that the parties interested might elect to hold their proportions of the said land.

A supplemental bill, filed in June 1827, set forth, that pending the suit, to wit, on the 5th of November 1817, the defendant Alfred D. Ashby had sold the lands devised by his father to be sold; that they were sold to the defendant John Ashby, for 10244 dollars, two thirds payable in cash, and the balance in two annual payments; and that since the sale, Alfred D. Ashby had taken no farther step towards the execution of the trust confided to him for the benefit of his sisters. The bill prayed that the plaintiffs might have a decree for their proportion of the rents and profits before the sale, and of the proceeds of said sale, with interest thereon.

Alfred D. Ashby answered, that he had always been ready to purchase 400 acres of good land, such as his testator intended, in the western country for complainants.

The death of John Ashby was suggested on the 3d of December 1828; and on the 5th of that month, by consent of Buckner Ashby executor and devisee of John, the suit was revived against him.

Numerous depositions were taken in the case.

59 *On the 6th of July 1832, the circuit court pronounced the following opinion:

"The court is of opinion that the will of the testator ought now to be construed as if it read thus: 'The proceeds of the Frederick lands to be invested in unseated lands in Kentucky, or some other part of the western country. The land to be selected with a view to the interest of all those of my children between whom it is divided. Of the lands so purchased, each of my daughters shall have 400 acres of an average quality, and my two sons Alfred and John the residue.' Before the testator could have determined on any particular number of acres for his daughters, he must have formed some estimate in his own mind of the relative value of the land to be sold and that to be purchased. What that estimate was, he has not informed us. As Kentucky lands seem to have been uppermost in his mind, it is probable that the price at that time of good unseated lands in that state was in his view. What was the value which he placed upon his own lands might be ascertained with some probability by taking the opinions of his neighbours. Thus, if the trust had been executed immediately, or within a reasonable time, some approximation might have been made to such a division as the testator intended; but it is obvious that it would have been but an approximation. The difficulty existing at the death of the testator,—one which could not have been surmounted but by the exercise of a large discretion by the trustees, is now insurmountable. One of the trustees to whom this large discretion was confided (his widow, and the mother of the devisees) died about two years after him. He never could have intended to confide such a trust to his son alone, who was so deeply interested in abusing it. His scheme was to settle his children (most of whom were then young) in some of the new and growing 60 states; to provide for his daughters and two of his sons, by a *sale of his Virginia lands, and the investment of the proceeds in western lands, which were to be divided by some rule of which he himself could have had but a faint idea, and which we can only guess at. It is evident, however, that he meant to provide for them all; that they all had equal claim upon his bounty: and we have no right to presume that he meant to make any great departure from equality, if he meant to depart from it at all. In this state of uncertainty,—nay, when it is impossible to say in what proportion the testator intended that his children should share his bounty, the court must apply its own rule,—equality. The son who was one of the trustees having sold the land, and the plaintiffs having elected to affirm the sale, the court will confirm it. The proceeds, principal and interest, must therefore be divided equally between the daughters, or those entitled to their shares by purchase, and the two sons Alfred and John.”

Whereupon the court proceeded to decree to the plaintiff Lewis A. Smith, as well the share of his wife, as the share to which he was entitled by purchase from Catlett and wife.

On the petition of Alfred D. Ashby, an appeal was allowed.

The cause was argued by C. and G. N. Johnson, for the appellant, and by Cooke, for the appellees.

CABELL, P., delivered the following as the resolution of the court.—If Alfred D. Ashby, executor and trustee of and under the will of Lewis Ashby deceased, had, in a reasonable time after the death of the testator, sold the Frederick lands, and vested the proceeds thereof in good lands, situated in the state of Kentucky, or any other part of the western country most conducive to the general interest of the beneficiaries under the will, and had assigned to each 61 of the daughters 400 acres thereof, *of the average value of the whole tract, this court is of opinion, considering the latitude of discretion confided to the trustee, that the daughters would have had no right to complain of such investment and assignment, although it might have resulted in leaving to the two sons of Lewis Ashby a greater quantity than 400 acres each. But as the trustee has improperly delayed the execution of the trust until a great change has taken place in the situation of the western country and in the circumstances of the parties, the court is of opinion that the beneficiaries ought not now to be compelled to take lands in the western country, but should be allowed to elect to take their just proportion of the money arising from the sale of the Frederick lands, in lieu thereof: and as there is nothing in the will which clearly indicates an intention in the testator to give a preference to his sons over his daughters in relation to this fund, or, if a preference was intended, to indicate the extent of that preference, the court is of opinion that the principle of equality of right is the only just one applicable to this case. This court therefore approves of the decree of the chancellor in establishing the right of the beneficiaries to elect to take money instead of land, and in directing an equal division of the fund among the parties. But the decree is defective in not having so secured and protected mrs. Smith's portion of the money arising from the sale of the Frederick lands, as to prevent its being subjected to the control or debts of the husband to a greater extent than if it were land; in which case, the husband would be only entitled to the profits during the coverture, or for his own life as tenant by the curtesy, in case he survived the wife, having had a child by her, born alive; for this money, being in lieu of land to which the wife was entitled, ought to be regarded as land, and treated accordingly, unless indeed the wife should consent

62 husband absolutely, as to which *she ought to be privily examined, separately and apart from her husband, in the same manner as in the conveyance of her real estate.

The decree is therefore reversed so far as it is in opposition to the principles declared above, and is affirmed as to the residue: and the cause is remanded, to be proceeded in to a final decree accordingly. But as this reversal is in consequence of error committed against one of the appellees, it is to be at the cost of the appellant.

STANARD, J., said, that as the decree of the circuit court required the appellant to make payment to the plaintiff Lewis A. Smith, of money which it was erroneous to require him so to pay, and which he could not, even with the authority of that decree, safely have paid; and as this court, by its decree, corrected the error of the circuit court, and provided for the appellant's paying in a way which would be safe, it seemed to him that the appellant ought not to be decreed to pay costs: and he therefore dissented from so much of the decree of this court as related to the costs. In all other respects, he concurred in that decree.

63 *Medley v. Pannill's Adm'r.

Same v. Tunis's Ex'ors.

May, 1842, Richmond.

(Absent BALDWIN,* J.)

Injunctions—Against Judgments—Irregular—Case at Bar.—Where, pending an injunction to a judgment for money, the judgment creditor dies, and there is a revival in the name of his administrator of the suit in equity, but not of the judgment at law, it is not regular, though the object be to avoid the delay that would take place after a dissolution of the injunction in reviving the judgment, to make a decree in the suit in equity for the money which will be payable to the creditor upon such dissolution. The court of equity is to dissolve or perpetuate the injunction, or perpetuate it in part and dissolve it for the balance, and it may in the latter case, if it shall appear just, direct that no damages shall be paid by the complainant; but it is not, in any injunction case, not even where the injunction is wholly dissolved, to make a decree for the damages payable to the creditor on the dissolution.

The decrees from which these appeals were allowed, were made by the circuit court of the town of Lynchburg. The causes were argued upon the merits by Grattan for the appellant, and Robinson for the appellees. But there was no point adjudged in them which deserves to be reported, except that stated in the following opinion.

ALLEN, J. The merits of the case of Medley v. Pannill's adm'r, it seems to me, are with the appellee. But a new mode of proceeding is adopted by the court in the decree rendered. The original parties to the judgment enjoined having died during the pendency of the injunction, the court, instead of dissolving the injunction, was of opinion that it would be more equitable at once to decree the amount due, than, by a dissolution of the injunction, to put the administrator of Pannill to the delay and expense of a 64 further proceeding at law *to revive the judgment, before it could be made available. A decree was therefore rendered for the amount of the debt, interest and damages, with a provision that if the decree was satisfied, the injunction was to stand perpetuated, but until satisfied, the rights of the creditor under the judgment, and against the sureties in the injunction bond, were not to be impaired; and liberty was therefore reserved to the creditors, if the decree was ineffectual in whole or in part, to resort to the court for any further decree which might be proper. The proceeding, though novel, struck me at first as convenient; but upon further reflection and consultation, I am satisfied the innovation upon the accustomed modes of procedure ought not to be sanctioned. Passing by the incongruity of giving a decree for that for which the party already has his judgment at law, and waiving the enquiry as to the power of a court of equity to decree damages, which are allowed by statute only upon the dissolution of the injunction, whereas the decree continues the injunction, and upon a certain contingency perpetuates it,—there are other difficulties in the way. The decree, though it contemplates a resort to the court in a certain contingency, is in effect final. The whole matter in controversy is settled; debt, interest, damages and costs decreed. Is it competent for the court, after having so disposed of the subject, to revive, at any distance of time thereafter, the lien of the original judgment, so as to affect intermediate purchasers? If it can do this, purchasers would be always insecure. If it cannot, the judgment creditor would lose one of his securities. Of that perhaps he would not be permitted to complain, as he takes the decree. But he retains all his rights against the surety in the injunction bond. These he never waived; and probably he would not have consented to take such a decree, unless the court had professed to preserve his securities unimpaired. If, too, the lien of the judgment has been lost, the 65 sureties in the injunction bond might be materially *injured. Again, the lien of the judgment results from the capacity to sue out an elegit, or to revive it. Here the creditor has not, and may never have, the right to do either. In what condition would the purchaser of lands prior to the decree, which otherwise would have been bound by the judgment, be placed by such a decree? Again, the law gives the sureties in the injunction bond a remedy over against those in the appeal bond. The injunction is not dissolved, and neither the surety in the injunction bond, nor the surety in the appeal bond, can be rendered liable primarily. If subsequently the court undertakes to give relief, it must set aside the first decree (the power to do which in such a case as this might be questioned) and then give a new decree dissolving the injunction, in order to revive the liability of the surety in the injunction bond, and by so doing revive that of the surety in the appeal bond. If it cannot do both, it does injustice to the sureties in one bond, and ought not to revive the liabilities of either set. And even if it could do both, great injustice might be done to one set of sureties by the intervening insolvency of the others. The old and recognized mode involves none of these difficulties. If the party desires to be ready with his execution

Injunctions—Against Judgments—Death of Judgment Creditor—Revival.—The right to sue out an execution upon the dissolution of an injunction, is the very condition of an injunction to a judgment; and if the judgment creditor die pending the injunction, the court of equity will in a summary way impose it as a condition on the complainant to consent to revive at law, under the penalty of having his injunction dissolved if he refuse. Richardson v. Prince George Justices, 11 Gratt. 198. The principal case is cited and distinguished in Kraker v. Shields, 20 Gratt. 397. See monographic note on "Injunctions" appended to Claytor v. Anthony, 15 Gratt. 518.

as soon as the injunction is dissolved, the chancery court would impose it as a condition on the complainant to consent to revive at law, under the penalty of having the injunction dissolved for that cause. And the revival itself, if the party be driven to that course, is attended with but little delay or expense. For this reason, I think the decree must be reversed with costs.

The other judges concurring, the decree of the court of appeals, in Medley v. Pannill's adm'r, declared that there was error in the decree, in proceeding to decree against the appellant for the amount of the judgment enjoined, with damages and interest, instead of dissolving the injunction and dismissing the bill with costs: Therefore, decree reversed with costs, and injunction dissolved and bill dismissed with costs.

In Medley v. Tunis's ex'ors, the circuit court and this court held that the appellant was entitled to a credit against the judgment. But the decree of this court declared that the circuit court erred in rendering a decree for the balance due, instead of perpetuating the injunction for the amount of the credit, with costs, and dissolving it as to the residue, without damages: Therefore, decree reversed with costs, and decree entered perpetuating the injunction for the credit, with costs, and dissolving it as to the residue, without damages.*

*Where any injunction shall be hereafter obtained, to stay proceedings on any judgment rendered in any of the courts of this commonwealth, for money or tobacco, and such injunction shall be dissolved wholly or in part, damages at the rate of ten per centum per annum, from the time the injunction was awarded until the dissolution, shall be paid to the party on whose behalf such judgment shall be obtained, on such sum as appears to be due, including the costs; and where any such injunction shall be depending in the circuit superior courts of law and chancery, the clerk of such court shall, on dissolution thereof, certify to the clerk of the court wherein the judgment was obtained, the order of dissolution, as also the time of granting and dissolving such injunction, and the clerk shall issue the execution according to the provisions of this act; and in all cases where a forthcoming bond has been executed by the complainant in such injunction, and no judgment rendered thereupon, the court in which execution is awarded shall direct the said damages to be included in the judgment, which shall be in satisfaction of all interest and damages during the time aforesaid: provided nevertheless, that where the injunction is granted in order to obtain a discovery, or any part of the judgment shall remain enjoined, the court wherein the injunction shall be depending may, if it appear just, direct that no such damages shall be paid by the complainant, or such proportion as according to equity the court may deem expedient; and the clerk of the court where the judgment was rendered, or the court by whom execution shall be awarded, shall govern themselves accordingly. 67 *Winchester and Potomac Railroad Company v. Washington.

May, 1842, Richmond.

(Absent ALLEN* and BALDWIN,† J.)

Debt—Railroad Company—Condemned Land—Assessment of Damages.‡—Under the act passed April 8, 1831, to incorporate the Winchester and Potomac railroad company, the freeholders appointed by an order of the county court for the purpose of ascertaining the damages which would be sustained by the proprietor of certain lands through which the railroad was to be opened, certified, in the form prescribed by the act, that they assessed the damages at the sum of 972 dollars; and then subjoined the following words: "We further declare that if the railroad company shall refuse to pass the water from the south side of the road to the north side, by a culvert west of the lane, the thoroughfare of the farm, and return the same by a culvert on the east side of the lane, she (the proprietor) shall receive the additional sum of 2000 dollars." The report, upon being returned to the county court, was ordered to be recorded. An action of debt was afterwards brought to recover the 2000 dollars: the declaration averring that the company, although requested so to do, had refused to pass the water as aforesaid. Upon demurrer to the declaration, HELD, the action cannot be maintained. Per STANARD, J., the charter of the company does not warrant a contingent assessment of damages by the commissioners, and does not authorize the county court to render a conditional judgment therefor: the court is authorized to render such judgment only as would authorize the clerk to issue an execution thereon.

In an action of debt in the circuit court of Jefferson, in the name of Louisa Washington, who sues for the use of herself and children, against the Winchester and Potomac railroad company, for 2000 dollars, the declaration contained three counts.

The first count was in these words:

"For that whereas, by an act of general assembly of Virginia passed on the 8th day of April 1831, *entitled 'an act to incorporate the Winchester and Potomac railroad company,' among other things it is provided and enacted, in substance, as follows:" [Here the 9th, 10th and 11th sections of the company's charter were set forth verbatim as in the session acts of 1830-31, ch. 122, § 9, 10, 11, p. 189-91.] "And whereas, in pursuance of said act, George Reynolds, Henry S. Turner, Edward Lucas

*He was a connection of the defendant in error.

†The cause was argued before his appointment.

‡Assessment of Damages.—The principal case is cited in S. V. R. R. Co. v. Robinson, 82 Va. 545, to the point that if the case is proceeded in in the county court to final judgment, the amount of the damages fixed and paid and acquiesced in, paid on the one side and accepted without exception on the other, there is no authority in law for the circuit court to set aside these proceedings; or, without, setting them aside, proceed to appoint a new set of commissioners to assess other damages for the same land, upon the ground that the defendant company did not comply with its promise.

senior, William Hurst and Joseph M'Murran, freeholders, or any three of them, were appointed, on the motion of the said Winchester and Potomac railroad company, by an order of the county court of Jefferson county in the state of Virginia, for the purpose of ascertaining the damages which would be sustained by said Louisa Washington and her children, as the proprietors of certain lands in the said county through which the Winchester and Potomac railroad company proposed to open a railroad; and George Reynolds, Edward Lucas, William Hurst and Joseph M'Murran, four of the said freeholders, having been first duly sworn, as required by the said act, impartially and justly to the best of their ability to ascertain the damages which would be sustained by said Louisa Washington and children from opening of said railroad through their land, and that they would certify their proceedings thereupon to the county court for the said county of Jefferson, did, on the 19th day of November 1833, under their hands and seals, certify and report to the said county court of Jefferson county aforesaid, that they had met together on the aforesaid land on the 1st day of November 1833, the day to which they were regularly adjourned from the day appointed by the said order for their meeting, and having been duly sworn, and having viewed the premises, they proceeded to estimate the quantity and quality of the land aforesaid which would be occupied by the said railroad, the quantity of additional fencing or gates which would probably be occasioned thereby, and all other inconveniences which seemed to them

69 *likely to result therefrom to said land; that they combined with these considerations, as far as they could, a just regard to the advantages which would be derived by the proprietor of the said land from the opening of the said railroad through the same; that under the influence of these considerations, they had estimated and did thereby assess the damages aforesaid at the sum of 972 dollars, and did further declare that if the said railroad company should refuse to pass the water from the south side of the road to the north side of the road, by a culvert west of the lane, the thoroughfare of the farm, and return the same by a culvert on the east side of the same, she the said Louisa Washington should receive the additional sum of 2000 dollars: which said report, together with the certificate of magistrate before whom the said freeholders were sworn, having forthwith been returned to the county court of Jefferson, and no good cause having been shewn against the said report, the same was, on the 20th of November 1833, affirmed by said court, and entered of record; as by the record and proceedings thereof, still remaining in said county court of Jefferson county, Virginia, more fully appears. And the said plaintiff avers, that on the 19th day of July 1835, she demanded and required of the president of the said Winchester and Potomac railroad company, that the said Winchester and Potomac railroad company should pass the water from the south side of the road to the north side, by a culvert west of the lane, the thoroughfare of the farm, and return the same by a culvert on the east side of the lane. Yet the said Winchester and Potomac railroad company, although then and often since requested so to do, have refused and still do refuse to pass the water from the south side of the road to the north side, by a culvert west of the lane, the thoroughfare of the farm, and return the same by a culvert on the east side of the same, nor have they paid to the said Louisa Washington (proprietor of the said land referred to in said proceedings, and, *under the terms of the aforesaid act, entitled to the said damages) the aforesaid sum of 2000 dollars, according to the form and effect of the said report, and the judgment of the court aforesaid affirming the same, which still remains in full force and effect, and is in nowise satisfied, vacated or discharged; and the said Louisa Washington hath not as yet obtained execution for the same 2000 dollars. Whereby an action hath accrued to the said Louisa Washington to have and receive from the said Winchester and Potomac railroad company the said sum of 2000 dollars."

The second count was exactly like the first, with the exception of this difference in the breach: In averring nonpayment to Mrs. Washington of the 2000 dollars, it omitted the allegation that she was "proprietor of the said lands referred to in said proceedings, and, under the terms of the aforesaid act, entitled to the said damages."

The third count omitted the recital of the provisions of the charter, and differed from the two other counts, moreover, in alleging in general terms what is alleged in those two counts in detail.

The company filed general demurrers, in which the plaintiff joined. Upon argument, the circuit court sustained the demurrer to the third count, but overruled the demurrers to the first and second counts. A trial was then had upon plea of nil debet.

Upon the trial, the plaintiff offered in evidence the record of the county court of Jefferson, whereby it appeared, that on the 1st day of October 1833, the president of the company addressed to "Mrs. Louisa Washington widow of Samuel W. Washington deceased, for herself and children," a notice in writing, informing her that on the 21st of that month, application would be made by the company to the county court of Jefferson, in pursuance of the provisions of the charter, to appoint five freeholders to assess the damages which * "you will sustain from the opening of a way for the said railroad through your land;" that at a court held for Jefferson county, on the 21st of October 1833, "on the motion of the plaintiffs, suggesting that the defendants are the owners of a tract of land in the county of Jefferson, through which it is proposed to open the said railroad, and that they cannot agree with the said owners," an order was made appointing the freeholders; that George Reynolds, Edward Lucas, William Hurst and Joseph M'Murran, four of the freeholders appointed, were sworn or affirmed in the manner prescribed by the charter, to "ascertain the damages which would be sustained by the above named Louisa Washington and children;" that on the 19th day of November 1833, the said freeholders made a report under their hands and seals, whereby, after setting forth that they were appointed "for the purpose of ascertaining the damages which would be sustained by Louisa Washington and children, the proprietors of certain lands in the said county through which the Winchester and Potomac railroad company proposed to open a railroad," and that they met together on the land aforesaid on the first day of November 1833, they certified, in the form prescribed by the charter, that they assessed the damages at the sum of 972 dollars; at the end of which report, after the words "Given under our hands and seals this 19th day of November 1833," and before the signatures and scrolls, were these words: "And we further declare that if the railroad company shall refuse to pass the water from the south side of the road to the north side, by a culvert west of the lane, the thoroughfare of the farm, and return the same by a culvert on the east side of the lane, she shall receive the additional sum of 2000 dollars;" and that at a court held for Jefferson county on the 20th of November 1833, the following order was entered: "George Reynolds, Edward Lucas, 72 William Hurst and Joseph M'Murran, four of the five commissioners *appointed at the last term of this court for the purpose of ascertaining the damages which would be sustained by Louisa Washington and her children, the proprietors of certain land in this county through which the Winchester and Potomac railroad company propose to open a railroad, this day returned a report, which is ordered to be recorded, and is in the words and figures following:" [here it was copied]. To this evidence the defendants objected, because it did not shew that the report of the freeholders had been affirmed by the court; but the objection was overruled by the court, and the evidence allowed to go to the jury. To which the defendants excepted.

A second bill of exceptions stated, that on the trial, the defendants introduced a witness to prove the actual amount of damages sustained by the plaintiff, by reason of the alleged failure on the part of the defendant to pass the water, mentioned in the report of the commissioners and the declaration, from the south side of the road to the north side, by a culvert west of the lane, the thoroughfare of the farm, and to return the same by a culvert on the east side of the lane, as in the declaration averred; that the plaintiff objected to the evidence, and moved the court to exclude the same; and that the court sustained the objection, and excluded the evidence from the jury: to which the defendants excepted.

The jury found for the plaintiff on the issue, and allowed interest on the debt from the 8th of August 1835; and judgment was rendered accordingly for the debt and interest, with costs. To which judgment a supersedeas was awarded.

Leigh, for plaintiffs in error. I. The demurrers to the first two counts of the declaration ought to have been sustained. 1st. According to the shewing of those counts, truly understood, the conditional damages claimed as having been assessed by 73 the commissioner, and adjudged *by the county court, were assessed and adjudged to mrs. Washington and her children, as proprietors of the land condemned for the road, and she alone cannot maintain the action for the use of herself and children. Or, 2dly, if the conditional damages assessed for the lands of mrs. Washington and her children are to be considered as assessed to her alone, such assessment of damages was plainly contrary to the provisions of the charter of the company, and to the order of the county court, under which the commissioners acted. And 3dly, the assessment of such conditional damages is wholly unauthorized by the company's charter, and no judgment could be given by the county court upon the report for such conditional damages. The 12th section of the charter, which provides that for the damages, when ascertained by a confirmation of the report, the clerk of the court shall, after the adjournment of the court, on the application of the party entitled to the damages, issue an execution, manifestly contemplates the case of an unconditional assessment of damages. At all events the action of debt will not lie in such a case.

II. The declaration avers that the report, on which the action was founded, was affirmed and entered of record, and counts on the affirmance of the report as on a judgment; but the record produced in evidence does not shew that the county court affirmed the report, but that the report was returned and ordered to be recorded; so that here the record produced in evidence shews that there was in fact no manner of judgment for the conditional damages, besides being liable to the objection that it is variant from the record pleaded. 1 Chitty's Pl. 305, 6, 355, 6. Moore v. Fenwick, Gilm. 214. Crawford & al. v. Jarrett's adm'r, 2 Leigh 630. Wood v. The Commonwealth, 4 Rand. 329.

74 III. If it be true that there was no judgment given by the county court for the conditional damages, or at *least no judgment for those damages to mrs. Washington alone, then she could not recover the whole amount of damages assessed by the commissioners, but could only, in a proper form of action, recover, pro interesse suo, the actual damages which could be proved to have been sustained by her; and therefore the evidence on that point, offered by the company, ought not to have been excluded.

Robinson, for defendant in error. I. The demurrers to the first and second counts were properly overruled. 1st, According to the shewing of those counts, the conditional damages were assessed and adjudged to mrs. Washington alone. 2ndly, Such assessment is not contrary to the charter. For that in terms declares that the commissioners "shall consider the proprietor of the land as being the owner of the whole fee simple interest." And the first count states her to be proprietor of the land, and, under the terms of the act, entitled to the damages. But, independently of this averment, the report shewing that the damages were assessed to her, and both counts averring that the report was affirmed by the court and entered of record, this court, when the question comes before it in this collateral manner, is bound to suppose that such a state of facts existed as authorized the assessment, if, under any state of facts, such assessment could be authorized. Now, if she appear to the commissioners to be the proprietor of the land, they might make the assessment of damages to her, although they were sworn to ascertain the damages sustained by Louisa Washington and her children. The objection that in consequence of the order and of their oath, they could not properly assess damages to Louisa Washington alone, is an objection at most going only to shew irregularity, which might have been corrected upon appeal or supersedeas; not matter which makes

75 *the proceedings before the commissioners and in court, void. 3dly, The commissioners have estimated the whole damages at 2972 dollars, and if they had made the assessment in one entire sum, there could be no doubt of their authority. Now, whether the assessment is made in one entire sum of 2972 dollars, or in one sum of 2000 dollars and another of 972 dollars, can make no manner of difference. Nor can the company with any reason object, that a clause is inserted allowing it to be relieved from part of the estimated damages upon the performance of a specific act, and that the assessment thus made is affirmed and entered of record. If the assessment for the whole amount had been absolute and unqualified, it might have been affirmed and entered of record. And the county court, in affirming a report which permits the company, if it pleases, to be relieved from part of the estimated damages upon the performance of a specific act, does that which operates in favour of the company, and of which the company should not afterwards be permitted to complain. It may be, that such conditional damages as were assessed in this case, cannot, even after the report is affirmed and entered of record, be considered to be so ascertained by a confirmation of the report, as to authorize the clerk to issue an execution for the same under the 12th section of the charter. But though an execution may not lawfully issue for such conditional damages under that section, it does not follow that the assessment itself should be considered as unauthorized. It was made by commissioners appointed at the instance of the company, and the report containing it has been affirmed by a court which undoubtedly had competent jurisdiction to act upon that report. The company having been a party to the case in which the report was made, and the judgment affirming the report never having been reversed on appeal or supersedeas, that company. If it is binding, and the specific act has not been performed, there is a duty on the defendants to pay the plaintiff a determinate sum of money and the action of debt is properly brought for that money. Bullard v. Bell, 1 Mason 299.

II. The statute provides, that unless good cause be shewn against the report, it shall be affirmed by the court and entered of record. The order directing it to be entered of record is, under the statute, to follow the affirmance. And when such an order is made, it necessarily imports that the report is affirmed. But secondly, the evidence was clearly admissible and proper, as far as it went: and though it might have been competent to the defendants to move the court to instruct the jury, that the plaintiffs could not succeed without producing an order of affirmance, yet as no such motion was made, an appellate court can take cognizance of no such question.

III. The other bill of exceptions must be considered with reference to the case stated in the declaration. That states a regular assessment of damages, and a regular confirmation thereof: and considering that assessment as valid, its effect could not be impaired in a collateral proceeding, by evidence going to shew that the commissioners made too high an estimate. The time for such an objection was in the county court, before the report was affirmed.

STANARD, J. The title to this action, as for a debt due by judgment, is founded on those provisions of the charter of the company, which prescribe the manner of assessing damages to the proprietors of lands through which the railroad might run; providing, in effect, that the affirmance of a report assessing the damages, and entering it of record, shall be a judgment in favour of the proprietor against the company for the amount of the damages: and it

77 is contended that the order recording *the report is in effect an affirmance thereof, and a judgment for the damages. Supposing this to be so, the next question presented (and which may justly be regarded as preliminary to many others arising on the record in this case, and ably discussed at the bar,) is, What are the damages for which such judgment is or can be rendered? Do the provisions of the charter warrant a contingent assessment of damages by the commissioners, and authorize the court to render a contingent or conditional judgment therefor, so that the title thereto may depend on some future act in pais? If so, the anomaly might be presented of a judgment without certainty as to the time in which, or the amount for which, it could be enforced, and not capable of being enforced without a new action, the recovery in which would also be uncertain, as the performance of the act in pais on which it was made to depend might be more or less perfect. The terms of the statute must be very distinct and imperative, to justify the court to introduce, by its construction thereof, such an anomaly. The statute in this case, so far from requiring such construction, seems to me by inevitable implication to for id it. The latter part of the 12th section provides, that for the damages when ascertained by a confirmation of the report, the party may have execution as on a judgment; and the necessary implication is, that the court is authorized to render such judgment only as would justify the emanation of an execution thereon. Now, for contingent damages such execution certainly could not issue, since by the very terms of such judgment, if full expression be given to it, the party is not entitled to damages but in a future and contingent event; and as such future event may more or less imperfectly occur, the damages may in whole, or in part only, be justly demandable. These considerations present an insuperable difficulty to the recovery in this action, and shew, in my opinion, that the court below ought to 78 have sustained *the demurrer to the first and second counts of the declaration.

I deem it proper to add, that according to the legal effect of the report in this case, especially when coupled with the subsequent action of the company, the damages that were effectively assessed, to wit, the 972 dollars, are to be regarded as the damages for a road constructed with proper culverts to pass the water in the manner specified in that part of the report assessing the contingent damages; that the company had no right to construct the road in any other manner, and is liable to the actions of the parties injured by a deviation from that mode of construction which has governed the amount of the unconditional assessment of damages, for the injury resulting from such deviation; and that such actions may be repeated toties quoties, as long as such injury is continued by such deviation.

The other judges concurring, the judgment of the court of appeals was entered as follows:

The court is of opinion that the said circuit superior court erred in overruling the demurrers of the plaintiffs here to the first and second counts in the defendant's declaration: therefore judgment reversed with costs, and judgment entered for the said plaintiffs upon said demurrers.

Partnership—Suit for Account—Statute of Limitations.†

Same—Same—Same.‡—A suit in equity by one partner against his copartner, for a settlement of the partnership accounts, being a substitute for the action of account, should, like that action, be brought within five years, and if not brought within that time, will be barred by the statute of limitations. Same—Same—Same—Exception—Cessation of Dealings.

—Question whether the exception made by the statute of limitations, of accounts which concern the trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant, prevents the statute from barring an action upon such accounts, when there has been a cessation of dealings between the parties for five years. Per STANARD and ALLEN, J., the statute is no bar in such a case. Accord, Mandeville &c. v. Wilson, 5 Cranch 15, and Robinson v. Alexander, 8 Bligh 352.

Same—Same—Same—Same—Who Are Merchants.—

Question whether persons engaged as partners in the business of farming, distilling, and purchasing and selling cattle, can properly be considered merchants within the meaning of the said exception. It seems, from opinions of STANARD and ALLEN, J., they cannot be so considered. Accord, Lansdale v. Brashear, 8 Monroe 330, and Forbes v. Skelton, 8 Simons 335, 11 Cond. Eng. Ch. Rep. 466.

William B. Coalter filed a bill in the circuit court of Augusta against John Coalter, setting forth a partnership between them in the business of farming, distilling, and purchasing and selling cattle &c. and praying for a settlement of the partnership accounts. It appeared by *the bill, that the partnership was entered into in December 1828, to continue for four years, so that the partnership was ended in December 1832. Yet the bill was not filed until December 1838. It stated, that in the summer of 1833, the parties referred the settlement of the accounts to two friends, who found a balance due the plaintiff upon the operations of the partnership; but there being at that time a crop of grain growing, the value of which could not then be ascertained, the referees did not close the account, and no final settlement had since been made. The defendant, in his answer, admitted that there had been a partnership between him and the plaintiff, though he stated it somewhat differently from the plaintiff. He admitted also that there had been no final adjustment of the accounts of the partnership, but relied on various grounds of defence, one of which was the statute of limitations. The statement of the partnership accounts made by the referees, bore date the 27th of June 1833, and it stated that they had been unable to settle as to the grain then growing. One of the referees deposed.

‡Same—Same—Same—Construction.—The principal case is cited in Boggs v. Johnson, 26 W. Va. 827, to the point that the statute, regulating the time within which an action by one partner against his copartner for a settlement of the partnership accounts may be brought, applies to suits in equity as well as actions at law. See foot-note to Marsteller v. Weaver, 1 Gratt. 391.

that as they went on, item by item, each one was agreed to by the parties, until they came to the item of the grain in the ground, upon which they could not agree, John Coalter claiming the whole of the grain in the ground, and William B. Coalter claiming one third part of it. The sums agreed upon being then added up, John Coalter refused to sign a paper acknowledging the amount to be correct.

The circuit court referred the accounts to one of its commissioners; and a report thereof being made, a decree was pronounced in favor of the plaintiff. From which decree, on the petition of the defendant, an appeal was allowed.

Michie and John B. Baldwin, for appellant.

81 Accounts between partners, though not particularly mentioned in *the statute of limitations, 1 R. C. 1819, p. 488. ch. 128. § 4. are embraced within the limitation of actions of account. Courts of equity having taken cognizance of matters of account, and being better able to settle them, the action of account has fallen into disuse: but it may still be maintained. Gow on Partnership 83. And by the rules of equity, where there is concurrent jurisdiction, the statute of limitations is as good a plea in equity as at law. 2 Tuck. Comm. 388. Indeed the statute is never disregarded by courts of equity, except in cases of technical trusts, of which equity has exclusive and peculiar cognizance; and even in those cases the trust must be continuing. Ibid. 389. Kane v. Bloodgood, 7 John. Ch. Rep. 90. There seems to be no reason why the statute should not run between partners after dissolution, as well as between other persons. Upon the dissolution, the balance due to either partner becomes an individual demand against his copartner; a demand which he ought to be bound to prosecute with as much diligence as any other. All the reasons which led to the enactment of the statute of limitations apply with full force to such a claim. And accordingly, it has uniformly been held that the statute is a good plea between partners. Gow on Partn. 117. Barber v. Barber, 18 Ves. 286. Foster v. Hodgson, 19 Ves. 180. See also Union Bank v. Knapp, 3 Pick. 112. and Lansdale v. Brashear, 3 Monroe 330.

This case does not fall either within the letter or the reason of the exception in the statute. A construction by which these partners should be held to be merchants within the meaning of the exception, would virtually repeal the statute; for there is hardly any one who would not be a merchant under such a construction. The word merchant applies to those who are such in the ordinary acceptation of the term, and perhaps to some others, the similarity of whose pursuits brings them clearly within the reason of the exception. See Lansdale

82 v. Brashear*, 3 Monroe 330. Where the objects of the partnership are such as existed in this case, the parties cannot be considered merchants at all. But if they could not be so considered as between their firm and another firm, they cannot be so regarded in this case; for the two partners constitute, in fact, but one merchant. If, however, they should be held to be strictly within the exception, still all dealings having ceased for more than five years, the statute would be a bar to the recovery. In Coster v. Murray, 5 Johns. Ch. Rep. 522, chancellor Kent, after reviewing the english cases, concludes that the weight of authority is in favour of this position. See also 1 Rob. Prac. 101.

Peyton, for appellee. This is not a case in which an action at law could have been maintained by the plaintiff. The association between the parties, from its nature and character, created such an unity of interest between them, that neither of them, whatever share of the stock or profits he might have been entitled to, or in whatever sum the firm might have been indebted to him, could exercise an exclusive right to enjoy or receive it, until a balance had been struck between them. Holmes v. Higgins, 1 Barn. & Cress. 74. 8 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 27. Bovill &c. v. Hammond, 6 Barn. & Cress. 149. 13 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 126. Milburn v. Codd &c. 7 Barn. & Cress. 419. 14 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 67. Bac. Abr. tit. Merchant. letter C. If one partner cannot sue his copartner till a settlement is had and a balance struck, then the action does not accrue till such settlement. In the present case, no settlement was ever made before this suit was brought; and therefore the statute cannot bar the suit.

But the statute excepts such accounts as concern the trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant, their factors or servants. And this exception applies to all accounts current, which concern the trade of merchandise. Webber v. Tivill, 2 83 Saund. 124. and cases *cited p. 127. note 6. If lord Hardwicke said what is reported in Welford v. Liddel, 2 Ves. 400. he is not sustained by the authorities, either english or american. The contrary is held in Franklin v. Camp's ex'ors, 1 Coxe's Rep. 196. and Mandeville &c. v. Wilson, 5 Cranch 15. The cases further shew that all persons will be embraced within the exception, whether merchants or not, provided the accounts be open and current. Cotes v. Harris, Bull. N. P. 149. Cranch v. Kirkman, Peak's N. P. C. 121. Catling &c. v. Skoulding &c. 6 T. R. 189. Wilkinson on Lim. 21. Moreover, persons associated for such purposes as those for which the parties were associated in this case, are to be considered as merchants. The old idea was, that a merchant meant one who traded to and from foreign parts. But this definition is too narrow. Wilkinson (p. 21.) refers to an old case where it is said, "There are four sorts of merchants; that is, merchants adventurers, merchants dormants, merchants travelling, and merchants residents." Hamond v. Jethro, 2 Brownl. 99. The english bankrupt law, passed in the same year with the statute of limitations, defines a trader to be one who uses the trade of merchandise by way of bargaining, exchange, re-exchange, bartering, chevance or otherwise, by gross or retail, or making a living by buying and selling. In Com. Dig. title Merchant. A. a merchant is defined to one who traffics by way of buying and selling any goods, within the realm or in foreign parts. Lord Holt, in The Mayor &c. v. Wilks, Salk. 445. says, a merchant includes all sorts of traders, as well and as properly as merchant adventurers. In the present case, the partnership extending to farming, to distilling, and to the purchase and sale of cattle, hogs and other stock, the parties come within the definition of merchants.

ALLEN, J. Supposing the complainant to be entitled to his proportion of the 84 grain crop growing at the *time of the reference, that must have been gathered in the summer of 1833. There is nothing to shew that any debts have been collected or paid by the firm since that period. The partnership had terminated, and all its transactions with others would seem to have been closed, more than five years before the institution of this suit. As early at least as the summer of 1833, there might have been a full settlement of the accounts, so as to ascertain the rights and liabilities of the different partners. The attempt which had been made, with the assistance of their mutual friends, to settle, had failed; the parties disagreeing. This occurred more than five years before the bill was filed; and from that period they stood, in regard to the partnership, in a hostile attitude towards each other. Upon this state of facts, it becomes necessary to determine whether the statute of limitations is a bar to the relief sought.

The counsel for the appellee has contended, That the exception "of such accounts as concern the trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant, their factors and servants," extends to all such accounts, although there may be no item within five years: That a partnership for the purposes disclosed in this record, constituted these persons merchants within the meaning of that clause: and That the statute cannot be pleaded in bar to an unsettled account between partners.

On the first point, there seems to have been much diversity of opinion amongst the english judges, and the question until recently was considered as an open one in that country. On the one hand, the courts held, that as between parties not merchants, where some of the items of a mutual account are within the period of limitation, the case is taken out of the statute: whilst on the other hand it has been determined, that as between merchant and merchant, where all accounts 85 had ceased for six years, the statute was a bar. These decisions *destroyed all distinction between accounts concerning the trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant, and other open mutual accounts. The various cases upon this subject are reviewed and commented upon by chancellor Kent in Coster v. Murray, 5 Johns. Ch. Rep. 522. He seems inclined in that case to adopt the construction given by the english courts in the earlier cases, which would, in effect, repeal the exception contained in the statute altogether. Since these cases were reported, the question has been decided in the house of lords, and the construction of the exception settled in opposition to the earlier opinions; the house of lords holding that the account was not barred, though none of the items were within the six years. Robinson v. Alexander, 8 Bligh 352. The supreme court of the United States, in the case of Mandeville &c. v. Wilson, 5 Cranch 15. has adopted the same construction. Chief justice Marshall, delivering the opinion of the court in that case, says—"The exception extends to all accounts current which concern the trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant. An account closed by the cessation of dealings between the parties is not an account stated, and it is not necessary that any of the items should come within five years." The same construction has been given to the statute by the courts of some of our sister states. In our own courts the question has not been decided. It was discussed in the case of Watson &c. v. Lyle's adm'r, 4 Leigh 236. but the case went off on other grounds. Judge Tucker however, in the opinion delivered, concurs with judge Marshall. After referring to the contradictory decisions in England, he quotes the opinion in Mandeville &c. v. Wilson, and adds, "This is the reasonable doctrine; for otherwise there would be no perceivable difference between merchants' accounts and others." It seems to me to be the clear intention of the statute to except such accounts from its operation

86 *altogether. Independent of the statute, there is no bar to personal actions, except the presumption arising from the lapse of time. The law was passed to remedy this evil; but, by express words, exempted certain accounts from its operation. Such accounts stand as though the statute had never been enacted; and the courts, in requiring some of the items to be within the period of five years, bring within the operation of the statute a subject which the legislature had intended to exclude.

Were these parties, from the facts disclosed in the record, merchants within the meaning of that clause of the statute? I have not thought it necessary to consider the question whether a partnership for carrying on such business as these parties were engaged in, would constitute them merchants in the proper sense of the word. In the view I have taken, it is not necessary to decide whether persons engaged in such transactions can properly be styled merchants; though I have a very strong conviction that such accounts do not fall within the description of accounts concerning the trade of merchandise. But waiving that question, is there any authority for the position that accounts between partners in merchandise are embraced in the exception, and that they are to be treated, in regard to their mutual accounts, as merchant and merchant? No such authority has been produced; nor have I been able to find any case in the english reports, where the questions has been much considered. It arose in 1726, in the case of Bridges v. Mitchell, Bunbury's Rep. 217. but was not adjudged. This case is referred to as a very important authority upon the point decided by it, by the lord chancellor in Foster v. Hodgson, 19 Ves. 180. In Bridges v. Mitchell, the bill set forth that the plaintiff and defendant, many years before, were partners as merchants; and prayed a discovery, account and satisfaction.

The defendant relied on the statute of limitations. *The plea was allowed on the long acquiescence of the party.

And it is stated that "the court seemed to think this was not a merchant's account within the statute, these persons not dealing as merchants with one another, but as one merchant with others; but gave no opinion on this head." Notwithstanding the intimation thus given at so early a period, the subject seems not to have been again adverted to in any of the english cases. Our own reports are silent respecting it. But in the case of Patterson v. Brown, 6 Monroe 10. the precise question was decided by the court of appeals of Kentucky. There the complainant charged, that he and the defendant were partners in a grocery store: that they had long since dissolved, and had never settled their accounts. The defendant admitted the partnership and its dissolution, denied any balance, and relied on the statute. The court held, that accounts between the partners of this mercantile firm were not embraced by the terms "accounts concerning the trade of merchandise &c." and therefore that such demands were barred by the lapse of five years. The court say, that the first clause of the exception would seem to meet the case, and the mutual accounts of the parties with each other might be considered as accounts concerning the trade of merchandise: but that this clause alone cannot give the construction: that the whole exception must be taken together, otherwise all accounts between a merchant and his ordinary customers would fall within the exception, for they are accounts concerning the trade of merchandise: that the accounts must not only be concerning the trade of merchandise, but they must be between merchant and merchant: that both parties must be merchants dealing in their several businesses with each other; and that partners cannot be regarded as occupying such a relation to each other. On this head, their reasoning is but an amplification of the suggestion contained in the case of Bridges

88 v. Mitchell, that "these persons *do not deal as merchants with one another, but as one merchant with others." And it seems to me that no other conclusion could have been arrived at. Whilst the partnership subsists, the individuality of each partner, for the purposes of the partnership, is merged. Their mutual accounts grow out of the dealings of the firm, as a unit, with third persons, and do not arise out of individual dealings with each other. When the business has closed, they stand, in respect to such accounts, in the same situation as others having unsettled accounts to adjust; and I do not perceive how such accounts can be considered as accounts between merchant and merchant.

If the parties are not to be treated as merchants, is there any thing in the mere relation of partners, which would exempt their unsettled accounts, after the business of the firm has entirely closed, from the operation of the statute? No case has been cited, in which it has been held that the existence of such an unsettled account constitutes an exception. Most of the cases, indeed, have proceeded upon the presumption that no such exception exists. The case of Barber v. Barber, 18 Ves. 286. was a case of partnership. The bill prayed an account against the representative of a deceased partner. The dealings having ceased for more than six years, the court held the case to be within the statute. The plaintiff relied upon the exception: but if the mere fact of there being unsettled accounts between partners had been sufficient to take the case out of the statute, it was unnecessary to rely on the exception, and the court should have entertained the case. The same remark applies to the case of Patterson v. Brown, 6 Monroe 10. In Coster v. Murray, 5 Johns. C. R. 522. chancellor Kent entertained the bill, upon the ground of a trust between the parties. But his argument goes to establish that the parties did not stand in the relation of debtor and creditor, or of joint 89 partners, but in that of agent or factor and principal, and so the *statute did not apply: from which it may be inferred that in his opinion it did apply to joint partners. The words of the statute embrace the accounts of partners, as well as others; and if they cannot be treated as merchant and merchant trading with each other, the exception cannot apply to them.

Nor can I perceive any thing in the policy of the law, which should lead us to create a new exception, not contained in the statute. Looking to the period at which the exception was introduced, there can be little doubt that it was intended to apply principally to cases of merchants resident in England, and their correspondents, servants and factors abroad. Owing to their distance, the difficulty of communication, and the necessity of an extended credit for the transaction of their business with each other, it was deemed improper to subject them to the operation of the statute. But none of the reasons which apply to them are applicable to the case of partners. They are ordinarily in the habit of communication with each other: the business having closed, there is no necessity for an extended credit: and the risk of doing injustice, from the death of witnesses, loss of vouchers, and failure of evidence, is as great in their case as in the case of ordinary accounts. Upon the close of the business, each partner is entitled to his share of the partnership effects; and for the balance which may be due from one to the other, they stand in the situation of ordinary debtor and creditor. They should also be held to the same degree of diligence.

In the case under consideration, there was every motive to urge the partners to an immediate settlement. As early as the spring of 1833, when the partnership had terminated, and its concerns been closed (according to the pretensions of both parties) except as to one inconsiderable item, the grain which was then growing, 90 *they made an effort to settle, but disagreed. The pretensions on the one hand and the other were controverted. But though apprized that his claim to any balance would be resisted, the complainant seems to have abandoned the subject for more than five years. Under these circumstances, the statute, it seems to me, was a complete bar to any investigation of these accounts, and the court should have dismissed the bill.

STANARD, J. The claim of the appellee, under its most favourable aspect so far as it is affected by the defence on the statute of limitations, is that of one partner against another, arising from a partnership in the cultivation of a farm, the purchase and sale of stock, and the conducting of a distillery; the partnership having ceased, and the claim asserted by the bill having been resisted by the partner sued, more than five years before the suit commenced; and there having been no item of debit or credit to either partner, nor any claim by or against the partnership outstanding, within five years before suit. The first question is, does the statute of limitations present an effectual defence to such a claim?

The argument on the part of the appellee is, that an account between mercantile partners is embraced by the exception in the statute, of accounts "relating to the trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant, their factors or servants:" that such a partnership as that which existed between these parties, is, within the intent and meaning of the statute, a mercantile partnership: and that while the accounts between such partners remain open and unsettled, the statute of limitations is no defence to a suit for the settlement of them.

It is remarkable that the question, whether the accounts between partners who are confessedly partners as merchants, are embraced by the exception in the *statute 91 of limitations, seems never to have been adjudicated by our own courts, and has never been distinctly decided by the courts of Westminster hall. In the case of Bridges v. Mitchell, Bunb. 217. the reporter states, that "the court seemed to think that this was not a merchant's account within the statute of limitations, these persons not dealing as merchants with one another, but as one merchant with others; but gave no opinion on this head:" and I have found no case in the reports of the decisions of Westminster hall, in which an opinion on that question is more strongly intimated.

The absence of decisions of this question is to be ascribed to the operation of the decisions of two other questions, the combined effect of which rendered the decision of this supererogatory.

These were, 1st, That where there had been mutual dealings between parties, whether merchants or others, and whether the dealings related to the trade of merchandise or not, if one of the items of the current account was within the term of limitation of the statute, the claim for the balance that might be ascertained on the adjustment of the account embracing that and the other items, was not barred by the statute: and 2dly, That although the account were confessedly between merchant and merchant, relating to the trade of merchandise, yet if the dealings had ceased for the term of limitation, and there were no item within that term, the claim on such account was subject to the bar of the statute. Although there was some fluctuation in the decisions upon this second question, I think with chancellor Kent in Coster v. Murray, 5 Johns. C. R. 522. that up to the time when he decided that case, the preponderance of authority of the courts of Westminster was in favour of the decision. A different (and, I presume, final) decision has been since made by the house of lords in the case of Robinson v. Alexander, 8 Bligh 352. and the law as now settled in Eng- 92 land, leaves the case *of accounts between merchant and merchant, relating to the trade of merchandise, within the exception of the statute, though the dealings may have ceased for more than the term of limitation, and there be no item within the term.

Were the decree of the court in this case to be governed by the decisions of the english courts prior to the case in 8 Bligh, they requiring that in respect to claims on accounts, even between merchant and merchant, relating to the trade of merchandise, some item should be within the term of limitation, to prevent the bar of the statute, it would sustain the defence in this case.

The objection (and I think a most cogent one) to those decisions in the combined effect, is, that that effect renders the exception in the statute practically superfluous and inoperative. My opinion is, that accounts between merchant and merchant, relating to the trade of merchandise, being expressly excepted from the effect of the statute, suits on them while they continue open and current are not liable to the bar of the statute, even though the dealing may have ceased for more than five years. and there be no item within that time. This opinion rests on the plain language of the statute, and is sustained by the case in Bligh, which finally settles that question in England, and the authority of the supreme court of Massachusetts, Bass v. Bass, 6 Pick. 362. S. C. 8 Pick. 187. and of the supreme court of the United States, Mandeville &c. v. Wilson, 5 Cranch 19.

The question remaining to be solved is, are accounts between merchant partners embraced by the exception? The absence of decisions on this point both in England and in this state has already been noticed. The question has, however, been expressly decided in the negative by the supreme court of Massachusetts, Cotman v. Rogers, 10 Pick. 93 112. and in Kentucky, 3 Monroc *330. 6 Id. 10. The result of my examination of the question is a concurrence in those decisions. It is hardly necessary to remark, that according to this opinion, to subject a suit for the settlement of partnership accounts to the bar of the statute, it must not only appear that the partnership has ceased more than five years, but that there were no valid claims of debit or credit against or in favour of the partnership, paid or received, or outstanding, within that time. For, as any such claim paid or received by either partner would form an item in the account between them, that might protect the claim on the account from the bar of the statute, on the principle applicable to mutual accounts, whatever may be the subject of such accounts, or whatever the vocation of the parties.

It is not necessary to decide the third proposition which it was incumbent on the appellee to sustain: that is, whether, within the meaning of the exception, the partnership in question is a mercantile one, and its dealings to be regarded as dealings relating to the trade of merchandise. My impression is, that it is not: but, for the reasons assigned, I forbear to express a definitive opinion on the point.

The other judges concurring, decree reversed and bill dismissed with costs.

94 *Bryan v. Hyre and Others.

August, 1842, Lewisburg.

(Absent CABELL, P. and BROOKE, J.)

Ejectment—Parol Disclaimer.*—In ejectment by the heirs of the devisee of an estate in fee, the defendant introduced evidence tending to shew a parol disclaimer by the devisee, of the land devised to him, and moved the court to instruct the jury, that if they believed, from the facts proved, and there was such parol disclaimer of the land devised, they must find for the defendant. The court refused to give this instruction to the jury, and instructed them that the disclaimer must be by writing.

Ejectment—Parol Disclaimer.—In Corbett v. Nutt, 18 Gratt. 647, it is said: "Whether an estate of freehold in land can be effectually disclaimed by parol, so as to divest the title of the devisee, has not been settled by the decisions of this court. In Bryan v. Hyre, 1 Rob. 94, it was conceded that the question did not arise. The case cannot be regarded, therefore, as settling the question against the validity of such a disclaimer, though the opinion of JUDGE ALLEN is said by the report, in general terms, to have been concurred in by the other judges who sat in the case. It is not necessary to determine that question in this case."

But in Suttle v. Richmond, F. & P. R. Co., 76 Va. 286, it was said, it has been long settled in this state that the disclaimer of the freehold can only be by deed or in a court of record, citing Bryan v. Hyre, 1 Rob. 101, as conclusive authority upon the subject.

Also in Fisher v. Camp, 26 W. Va. 580, the principal case is cited as authority upon the same proposition as in the latter case. See monographic note on "Ejectment" appended to Tapscott v. Cobbs, 11 Gratt. 172.

Freehold Estate—Parol Disclaimer.—The opinion of HOLBOYD, J., in Townson v. Tickell &c., 8 Barn. & Ald. 31, 5 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 219, that it is not necessary that a party, "should be at the trouble or expense of executing a deed to shew that he did not assent to the devise" of a freehold estate, disapproved.

Ejectment in the circuit court of Hardy county, by John Doe lessee of Elijah Hyre, Elihu Vandeventer, Solomon Bean, Benjamin H. Bean, Peter J. S. Hyre, and Cornelius Vandeventer and Susanna his wife, heirs at law of Peter Hyre deceased, against William Bryan.

At the trial, the plaintiff introduced as evidence the will of Valentine Power, which had been duly admitted to record, and contained the following clause:

"Providing Peter Hyre pays two hundred pounds unto the fatherless and motherless children of Henry and Magdaline Fink deceased, and likewise maintain his father in law Valentine Power and his wife Mary, with meat, drink, washing, lodging, needful apparel, and every thing that is necessary for to support human life, during his natural life, then for a true reward he shall have my plantation whereon I now live, with the two surveys adjoining the said plantation and the spurs of New Creek mountain. I say, I give and bequeath the said land to the said Peter Hyre, and his heirs and assigns forever."

95 *It was agreed between the parties, that the lessors of the plaintiff were the heirs at law both of Peter Hyre and of Susanna his wife; that Valentine Power died leaving eleven children and heirs at law, of whom the said Susanna was one; and that Amelia Power, one of the said children and heirs at law of Valentine Power, had died intestate and without issue. The lessors of the plaintiff rested their claim to the land devised to Peter Hyre, upon the said will, and on testimony adduced by them to prove that Peter Hyre had complied with the conditions of the will. The defendant moved the court to instruct the jury, that the provision of the will by which Valentine Power devised his land to Peter Hyre, created a precedent condition that Peter Hyre should maintain the testator and his wife Mary, during their lives, with meat, drink, washing, lodging, needful apparel, and every thing necessary to support human life; and that unless the jury believed it had been proved that Peter Hyre, or some person at his instance and procurement, did maintain the said Valentine Power and his wife during their lives, as above stated, then they ought to find for the plaintiff only one tenth of the lands set forth in the declaration. The court refused to give this instruction, but instructed the jury as follows: that the provision of the will by which Valentine Power devised his land to Peter Hyre, created a precedent condition that Peter Hyre should maintain the testator and his wife Mary, during the life of the said Valentine Power, with meat, drink, washing, lodging, needful apparel, and every thing necessary to support human life; and that unless the jury believed it had been proved that Peter Hyre, or some person at his instance and procurement, did maintain the said Valentine Power and his wife during the life of said Valentine Power, as above stated; or, if they believed that there was only a partial compliance, unless they believed that such partial compliance 96 *condition precedent in the lifetime of the testator, then they ought to find for the plaintiff only one tenth of the land set forth in the declaration. To which opinion of the court the defendant excepted, and his bill of exceptions was signed and sealed.

A second bill of exceptions, after stating that the plaintiff gave in evidence a copy of the will of Valentine Power, set forth that the defendant introduced evidence tending to shew a parol disclaimer by Peter Hyre the devisee, and moved the court to instruct the jury, that if they believed, from the facts proved, that there was a parol disclaimer of the land devised to him, they must find for the defendant: which instruction the court refused to give, but instructed them that the disclaimer must be by writing. To which opinion of the court the defendant also excepted.

A verdict being found against the defendant, he moved for a new trial; which motion was overruled, and judgment entered for the plaintiff.

Whereupon Bryan presented a petition to a judge of this court for a supersedeas, insisting that whatever might be the true construction of the will in reference to the condition precedent, yet the will could pass no title to Peter Hyre if he disclaimed the devise, whether that disclaimer was by parol or in writing; that the title to the land under the will never could vest unless the devise were assented to, and though such assent would be presumed in the absence of all proof, yet it could not be presumed in opposition to an express disclaimer, although that disclaimer were by parol. The supersedeas was awarded.

G. N. Johnson for plaintiff in error. In relation to other modes of conveyance, the assent of two minds is necessary to complete the act. And it is equally necessary in relation to devises. The devisee must assent, to

97 make the devise effectual. Where the devise purports *to confer a benefit, it is admitted that assent will be presumed until dissent be shewn. But here it is alleged that the devisee has dissented. And the question whether he has dissented or not, is a question of fact, to be determined on the evidence. Then we have to enquire, whether this fact may not, like other facts, be established by parol as well as by written evidence. Parol evidence must be received, unless forbidden by some sound principle of law. None such is known to exist. It may perhaps be thought that evidence of this description is of too uncertain a nature. But a declaration of disclaimer may be as clearly made by words as in writing; and after being made, its effect cannot be destroyed by a declaration of a different nature, whether it has been made by words or in writing. Upon the authorities, there is no difficulty. In Townson v. Tickell &c. 3 Barn. & Ald. 31. 5 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 219. the earlier cases are reviewed, and the court decide the disclaimer there, which was by deed, to be good: but the determination is upon reasoning which is equally applicable to a disclaimer by parol. Holroyd, J., says, he "cannot think that it is necessary for a party to go through the form of disclaiming in a court of record, nor that he should be at the trouble or expense of executing a deed to shew that he did not assent to the devise." Chief justice Abbott cites, as a strong authority, the case of Thompson v. Leach, 2 Ventris 198. in which mr. justice Ventris said, a man "cannot have an estate put in him in spite of his teeth." S. C. 3 Mod. 296. 1 Show. 296. Show. Par. Cas. 150. Holroyd, J., refers to Bonifaut v. Greenfield, 1 Leon. 60. Cro. Eliz. 80. There the devise was to four executors. One of the executors refused to take out letters of probat, and it was objected that the sale was not good; to which it was answered, that as it was devised unto him for the intent to sell, if he refused to sell, he refused to take 98 the estate, and so it was unnecessary that he should *join in the sale. The court held the sale good, although the devisee had not renounced the estate, either by matter of record or by deed. The cases of Townson v. Tickell &c. and Thompson v. Leach, are cited with approbation, in Skipwith's ex'or v. Cunningham &c. 8 Leigh 282. by judge Tucker, who says (p. 285.) he presumes "nothing more would be requisite than simple evidence of the fact of disclaimer." The case of Bonifaut v. Greenfield, which seems to be to the very point, is sustained by other respectable authority. In Sheppard's Touchstone, p. 452. it is laid down, that "if one devise his land to another in fee simple, fee tail, for life or years, and the devisee, after the death of the testator, doth refuse and waive the estate devised to him, in this case and by this means the devise to him is become void. And it seems, a verbal waiver is sufficient in this case." The counsel for the plaintiff in Crewe v. Dicken, 4 Ves. 98. cited sir Thompson Rumbold's case as one in which Bonifaut v. Greenfield had been followed. And in Nicloson v. Wordsworth, 2 Swanst. 371. the opinion is expressed, that Crewe v. Dicken proceeded upon a distinction between a disclaimer and a release, which is untenable. Disclaimer is implied from acts inconsistent with claim under the will. There is an implied waiver where the devisee does an act from which it is inferred that he does not accept. 1 Powell on Devises (Jarman's edi.) 429. 21 Law Library 252. Paramour v. Yardley. Plowd. 543. And where one refuses, it is the same as if he had never been named. Smith v. Wheeler, 2 Ventris 128. Evidence of acts of election by parol is sufficient. And evidence of acts of dissent by parol should be equally sufficient. Surely, in the case at bar, if there had been evidence to shew that Peter Hyre had refused to pay the £200. that would be evidence from which dissent might be presumed.

G. B. Samuels for defendant in error. All deeds, whether deriving their effect

99 from the common law or *the statute of uses, do, immediately upon their execution by the grantors, divest the estate out of them, and put it in the party to whom the conveyance is made, though in his absence and without his notice, till some disagreement to such estate appears. 4 Cruise 12. tit. 32. ch. 1. § 25. Thompson v. Leach, 2 Salk. 618. Skipwith's ex'or v. Cunningham &c. 8 Leigh 271. In the case of a devise, the freehold is in the devisee before entry. 2 Tho. Co. Lit. 645. The effect then of the will of Valentine Power was, immediately upon his death, to invest Peter Hyre with the estate devised. This suit being brought to recover that estate, and the recovery being resisted upon the ground that the estate was disclaimed, the question is whether parol evidence shall be received to prove the disclaimer. On this question it is material that the will itself is required to be in writing, and to be recorded. It is required to be written, in order that authentic evidence of the testator's intention may be had, and it is required to be recorded, that it may be preserved, and afford correct information to creditors and purchasers, and to the commonwealth herself for purposes of revenue. If nothing be done by the devisee, the estate is vested and perfect in him. If, however, a valid disclaimer be made, the estate is divested, and transferred to the heir at law, who, by relation, is regarded as seized from the death of the ancestor. A disclaimer, then, is in its essence and operation a conveyance. Why should it not in form also be a conveyance? Why shall there be withheld from devisees, the safeguards provided by the statutes regulating other conveyances of land, whether by deed or by will? If words alone can divest and transfer an estate devised, it will repeal, in practice, the statute of wills. After a will has been executed, conforming in all particulars to the statute, its operation may be divested by parol proof.

The law forbids that wills, deeds, and 100 even less formal instruments, shall *be restricted in their operation by parol proof, and yet it is proposed in this case that a will shall be—not explained, not curtailed, but in effect entirely abrogated and destroyed, by parol. In guarding the devisee against the trouble and possible expense of making a written disclaimer, the law could not have fallen into the indiscretion of committing the whole mass of real estate devised, to the recollection and integrity of witnesses. Perhaps 999 out of 1000 devisees accept the devise: it is supposed, however, that the estates of the 999 are to be committed to the precarious issues of trials upon parol proof, lest the one may be put to the trouble of making a written disclaimer. Such a decision as that asked by the plaintiff in error would open a wide door to frauds and perjuries. No reason for such a course can be found in the policy of the law,—that jealous policy by which all assurances of land are required to be in writing. And no authority can be produced in its support. There is no case in which a parol disclaimer of a fee simple estate has been adjudged valid in law.

The decision in Bonifant v. Greenfield, that if a devise of land be to four executors to sell, and three of them execute the will, that is sufficient, is not in point. In Townson v. Tickell &c. there being a deed of disclaimer, the question did not arise. And the dictum in Sheppard's Touchstone, relied upon on the other side, is wholly unsupported. In the London edition of 1826, by Atherley, the editor has brought together the authorities which sustain him in opposition to the text. He says, "with respect to estates of freehold, verbal waiver or disclaimer would not be sufficient. With respect to an estate of freehold, it was held in Butler and Baker's case, 3 Co. Rep. 26. that it could only be disclaimed by matter of record. But in a late case (Townson v. Tickell, 3 Barn. & Ald. 31.) it was held that it might be disclaimed by deed in pais." The authorities, then, 101 which are cited on the other side, *in no wise conflict with others which establish that a parol disclaimer is not valid. Co. Lit. 111 a. 2 b. 3 a. 4 Cruise 436. tit. 32. ch. 26. § 5. 5 Vin. Abr. tit. Contract and Agreement. D. pl. 1. 8 Vin. Abr. tit. Disagreement. 22 Vin. Abr. tit. Waiver. A.

C. Johnson in reply. All agree that a devisee has a right to accept or reject that which is tendered to him. Where the estate is for his benefit, the law proceeds upon the presumption that he accepts, until he dissents. But when the fact is ascertained that he has not consented, the estate has never been in him. The simple question then is, how this fact is to be ascertained. According to the common law, every fact susceptible of proof may be proved by a single witness deposing to the fact. Wherever the policy of the law requires higher proof, such proof is prescribed by statute. The statute of frauds is framed upon this policy, and so likewise the statute of conveyances. But can any one say that any of these statutes, fairly interpreted, embraces this case? It has not been so contended. It is only insisted that the case falls within the same policy; a proposition which cannot be maintained, any more than the other. With respect to the cases, there is not one which has ever ascertained that the disclaimer must be in writing. The passage from Sheppard's Touchstone 285. is referred to in Thomas's edition of Coke's reports, note E. to Butler and Baker's case, and the editor, after citing the modern decisions, concludes by saying, "It appears to be the better opinion that the disclaimer need not be either by matter of record or by deed."

ALLEN, J. The point arising upon the first bill of exceptions has not been pressed in the argument here, and as there does not appear to be any thing in it, I shall pass it over, with the remark, that I think the opinion thereby excepted to was strictly correct. *It is not very clearly perceived how the question propounded by the second bill of exceptions could arise under the will of Valentine Power. He devises his land upon a condition precedent. The estate could vest only by shewing a performance.

To make out their case, it was incumbent on the lessors of the plaintiff to prove a performance by their ancestors of this condition. When this was shewn, his assent to the devise was thereby also proved. The estate, by his own act, vested absolutely in him, and could not be divested except in the mode prescribed by law. The only question (as it seems to me) arising on this branch of the case was, Has the condition been performed? If it has, the devisee, by performing, has accepted the devise, and the estate has vested. The case of Crew v. Dicken, 4 Ves. 97. is somewhat analogous. There a conveyance was made to trustees, upon trust to sell, and receive the purchase money. One of the trustees conveyed and released to his cotrustee all his interest in the estate. If the trustee had simply declined to act, and executed an instrument declaring his disclaimer, the estate would have vested in the other trustee. The release was considered as an instrument by a person thinking he had an interest to part with, and as furnishing evidence of his acceptance of the trust. If a party intending to refuse the trust could be held to have assented to the conveyance to himself, by the form of instrument he adopted to manifest his refusal, how much stronger is the case of the devisee or alienee upon a condition precedent, who shews a performance!

Supposing, however, that the question did properly arise, it seems to me there is no error in the instruction of which the defendant can complain. It is laid down in Co. Litt. 111. that "in the case of a devise of lands whereof the devisor is seised in fee, the freehold or interest in law is in the devisee before he doth enter, and in that case nothing 103 (having regard to the interest or *estate devised) descends to the heir." The case of Thompson v. Leach, 2 Salk. 618. decided that a surrender immediately divests the estate out of the surrenderor, and vests it in the surrenderee; for that although every grant implies a contract, yet a gift implies a benefit, and consent is presumed. But although the estate vests by presumption of law before entry, it is clear that a man cannot be compelled to take it against his own consent: and there must be some mode by which he may renounce and disclaim it. In the earlier cases it was held, with respect to an estate of freehold, that the disclaimer must be by matter of record. Butler and Baker's case, 3 Co. Rep. 26. And the reason assigned is, that a freehold ought not to be easily divested, to the intent a tenant to the præcipe might be the better known. In Townson v. Tickell &c. 3 Barn. & Ald. 31. the devisee in fee renounced and disclaimed by a deed, and it was decided that such a renunciation was sufficient. One of the judges states it as his opinion, that such disclaimer need not be either by matter of record or by deed. The case did not require a decision of this question, and the authority cited does not, as it seems to me, warrant the conclusion. The judge cites Bonifant v. Greenfield, Cro. Eliz. 80. That was a devise to J. S. and three others, to sell, and these persons were made executors. One refused to meddle with the will, or sell. The other three sold in the lifetime of the fourth; and the sale was sustained. The court said, the sale by the three was good either by the common law or the statute 21 Hen. 8. ch. 4.; that when the testator devised the land to four to sell, and made them executors, it was as if, at the first, he had devised that such his executors should sell; and in such case, by the common law, a sale by three, the fourth refusing, was good. In Co. Litt. 236 a. it is said that where lands are devised to the executors to be sold, the devise taketh away the descent, and vesteth the estate in the executors; and

104 *that when he devises his tenements to be sold by his executors, it is all one as if he had devised his tenements to his executors to be sold. And in the same book, 112 b. 113 a. it is laid down, that where executors have but a naked power of sale, all must join, but where a man devises his lands to his executors to sell, and one dieth, the survivor may sell; in the one case it being a bare trust, in the other a trust coupled with an interest. This distinction has been questioned in modern times, but was the received law when the case in Cro. Eliz. 80. was decided. The devise there was of the land to the four persons named; they were, in another part of the will, named as executors; and the court adjudged that it was the same as if at the first he devised to his executors. The fact that the devise was to them by name in one clause, and that they were made executors in another, did not change their charter; and the land being devised to them to sell, they took, according to Coke, not a bare trust, but a trust coupled with an interest, in which case, by the common law, those who acted could sell. The decision proceeded upon the peculiar doctrines of the common law respecting the relation of executors to their testator's estate, and has no application to a case like the one under consideration. The last case in which the question arose is that of Smith v. Smith, 6 Barn. & Cress. 112. in which there was a devise to one for life, who refused to take it, saying, she claimed the estate as heir at law, and would not accept any benefit by the will of the devisor. It was held that this was not such a disclaimer as prevented her from afterwards bringing her ejectment, and relying on her title as devisee. The court decided that this was not a disclaimer of any estate in the land, but only of benefit under the will, accompanied with the assertion of a right to the land by a higher and better title: that this proceeded under a mistake, and did not preclude the party from acting 105 under her improved *judgment, and taking as devisee. They therefore did not determine whether such disclaimer should be by parol or deed; for, in whatever form made, it must be a disclaimer of any estate in the land.

No case has been cited which establishes the doctrine that a parol disclaimer can be set up against the devisee claiming a freehold estate; nor have I been able to find the rule so laid down in any of the elementary books, except Sheppard's Touchstone. It is there said (p. 452.) that a verbal waiver is sufficient: but this position is controverted by Atherly the editor, who says that a verbal waiver would not be sufficient in relation to freehold estates. The authority referred to (Plowden 543.) does not sustain the position taken in the text. That was the devise of a term, and involved the doctrine of the election of the legatee to take as executor or legatee. That the disclaimer of a freehold estate must be made in a court of record, is laid down in 4 Cruise tit. 32. ch. 26, and in 8 Vin. Abr. tit. Disagreement. And the only modification of the ancient rule is the permission to disclaim by deed. Upon authority, then, it seems to me that the disclaimer, to defeat the devisee claiming under the devise of a freehold estate, cannot be made by parol.

The policy of our laws would seem to demand in this case an adherence to the common law rule, as modified by the more recent decisions. The records with us are relied on as disclosing the chain of title. The commonwealth (as it was properly remarked in argument) has an interest in the question, for the purposes of revenue. The law requires wills to be executed with certain solemnities; and it would present a strange anomaly, if a devise, required to be in writing and executed with such solemnities, could be defeated, and in effect abrogated, by the testimony of a single witness proving some verbal disclaimer. Difficulties, too, would

106 practical *application of the rule.

Should one disclaimer conclude the party? That would seem to be the necessary consequence, since upon the disclaimer the estate passes to the heir. If so, testimony of some loose expression, carelessly uttered and imperfectly remembered, forgotten by the devisee as soon as pronounced, might defeat his estate. If more than one disclaimer is required, where is the limit, or when does the privilege of retracting determine? By requiring the disclaimer to be by deed, at least when set up against the devisee asserting his title under the will, these difficulties are avoided.

I think the judgment should be affirmed.

The other judges concurring, judgment affirmed.

Wills—Direction That Executor Should Receive and Pay Over Legacy Charged on Devisee—Case at Bar.—

A testator, besides bequeathing a sum of money to his wife, and another sum to his daughter Rebecca, bequeathed to his daughter Susanna $4000. to be paid by his executors in equal payments of $1000. each after his decease. He devised lands to certain devisees, provided they should pay into the hands of his executors the sum of $1000. per annum for eleven years. He made a bequest to two sons John and Samuel, they making themselves answerable for certain payments to his wife and his daughter Rebecca. And he directed his executors to receive $1000. annually from the devisees before mentioned for five years, to be paid over by them to his daughter Susanna. The remaining $6000. as it should become due, he gave to his sons John and Samuel. Under this will a question arose as to the quality and extent of the power conferred on the executors over the fund of $1000. per annum, charged on the devisees. Per STANARD, J., the proposition that this fund is identified with the personal estate of the testator, and passes to the executors subject in all respects to the executorial power over personal estate, and to all the liabilities of such estate, cannot be maintained: the legacy of $5000. for the daughter Susanna is not a general one, payable out of the personal assets, with the charge on the land as an auxiliary security, but is a legacy to be paid only by means of the charge; and the fund arising from this charge has no more the quality of personalty, than a fund arising from land directed to be sold to pay a legacy.

Executors and Administrators—Application of Assets to Discharge Individual Liability—Effect.—Parties dealing with an executor or trustee, and co-operating with him in the misapplication of assets or trust funds, in violation of the duties of the executor, or in breach of the trust, cannot use such transactions as a defence against the claim of creditors, legatees, or cestuis que trust. And the application of assets or trust funds, by the executor or trustee, to the discharge of his individual responsibilities, is, unless the estate or trust be indebted to the executor or trustee, a violation of duty or breach of trust.

Samuel Jackson of Fayette county, Pennsylvania, who died in July 1818, by his 108 will, after desiring that all *his just debts should be duly satisfied as soon as convenient after his decease, devised to his wife certain real property for life, and bequeathed to her certain personal property absolutely, and also the sum of 5000 dollars in cash or current bank notes, to be paid by his executors as follows, viz. 1000 dollars to be paid as soon as possible after his decease, and the remainder to be paid in yearly instalments of 500 dollars each, to commence two years after his decease. Then, after devising certain real estate to his sons John and Samuel, he made the following bequest: "I give and bequeath to my daughter Susanna Updegraffe, wife of James Updegraffe, the sum of 4000 dollars in full of her portion, to be paid by my executors to her or her heirs in equal payments of 1000 dollars each after my decease." The reversion of the real property devised by him to his wife for life, was devised to his daughter Rebecca, and he also bequeathed to his said daughter Rebecca the sum of 2000 dollars in cash, one half of which was to be paid by his executors as soon as she might want it and as soon as possible after his decease, and the other half to be paid in two years after his decease. He then devised and bequeathed as follows: "I give and bequeath unto my son Josiah Jackson and my daughter Ruth Dixon, wife of Henry Dixon, all my lands and other property in Monongalia county, Virginia, consisting of forge, slitting and rolling mill, grist and saw mill, with sundry other improvements: provided nevertheless, that they jointly and severally pay or cause to be paid into the hands of my executors the sum of 1000 dollars per annum for the space of eleven years, to be by them appropriated as shall be hereafter mentioned." After a devise and bequest to his son Jesse Jackson, and after directing certain property to be sold and the proceeds appropriated towards completing and finishing the glass works establishment then progressing, and also 109 directing certain other property *to be sold and a payment out of the proceeds of sale of 500 dollars to his daughter Rebecca, he bequeathed as follows: "It is my will and desire that the stock I hold in the Monongalia bank of Brownsville, and my stock in Clarksville manufacturing company, and all debts due me at my death, shall after my decease belong to, and I hereby bequeath the same to my sons John and Samuel, they making themselves answerable and paying the dower herein given to my wife, and the balance of the legacy herein granted to my daughter Rebecca. Item, My will and desire is, and I order it so to be done, that my executors receive annually 1000 dollars, as is herein mentioned and expressed, from my son Josiah and my son in law Henry Dixon, for the space of five years, which sum, as soon as may be after its reception, shall be by them paid over to my daughter Susanna or her heirs. The remaining 6000 dollars, as it becomes due, I give and bequeath to my sons John and Samuel, in order to compensate them for making advances of moneys to pay debts that I may owe, and to enable them more effectually to complete their glass manufactory." Then, after authorizing his executors to make sale of his real property not before enumerated, and divide the proceeds amongst all his children, he appointed his sons John Jackson and Samuel Jackson executors of his will. The testator, by a codicil, revoked the devise and bequest to his son John, and in lieu thereof devised and bequeathed the same property to John's children. The death of the testator occurred before the 28th of July 1818.

The executors took probat of the will in Pennsylvania, and one of them (John Jackson) also qualified in Virginia. The testator's daughter Susanna died in 1823, leaving six children, Anne, Joseph, Rebecca, Maria, Samuel and Nathan. Anne married Jourden Parker, who afterwards died. Their father 110 qualified in Pennsylvania as guardian of the others, and brought an *action there for the legacy against the executors. This action having proved unavailing, a suit was brought in Virginia, in the superior court of chancery formerly holden at Clarksburg. The original bill was in the name of the surviving husband and children of the legatee Susanna, but an amended bill was afterwards filed, making the husband a party plaintiff in the character of administrator of his deceased wife. The defendants were John and Samuel Jackson the executors, and Josiah Jackson and Henry Dixon and Ruth his wife, and the bill prayed that unless the legacy should be paid in such time as the court might direct, such part of the real estate charged therewith might be decreed to be sold, as might be sufficient to pay the same.

Josiah Jackson, in his answer, insisted that he had paid the legacy in full to the executors. The suit was proceeded in against the other defendants in the mode prescribed by law as to absent defendants.

The circuit court of Monongalia (to which court the case had been removed) made an order directing a commissioner to ascertain how much, if any, of the legacy had been paid by the devisees to the executors, and how much of what was paid to the executors, had been paid over by them to the parties entitled.

A report was made, to which the plaintiffs filed exceptions; and the circuit court, sustaining the exceptions, recommitted the report.

A second report was made, stating that no part of the legacy appeared to have been paid the executors, unless certain vouchers referred to in the previous report, and decided by the court to be insufficient, were received as evidence of payment. To this report exceptions were filed on the part of the defendants. And the cause came on to be heard the 19th of April 1836, upon the said report and exceptions.

The payments alleged to have been made to the executor John Jackson rested 111 for proof on certain papers *purporting to be his receipts, and on two depositions of Thompson Neave. One item was a charge of 902 dollars 25 cents, which Neave stated was the amount paid by Neave & son, between the 20th of March 1818 and the 10th of May 1819, to John Jackson for the proceeds of the sales of paper deposited with them by Jackson & Sharpless. The defendant Josiah Jackson had exhibited with his answer an account professing to embrace all the claims of Josiah Jackson in transactions with the executors or either of them, but the account so exhibited did not include this sum of 902 dollars 25 cents, though it comprehended all the other claims resulting from the transactions with Neave & son. In respect to another item, of 1763 dollars 13 cents, for nails and brads delivered to John Jackson between June 1820 and June 1823, which was attempted to be sustained by the evidence of Neave, there was no ground to conclude that the nails and brads were the same mentioned in two receipts of John Jackson separately charged. Both of these receipts shewed that John Jackson received the nails for Josiah Jackson, and bound himself to pay over to the said Josiah the proceeds of the sales of the same when sold. Another charge was a debt of John Jackson to Neave & son, charged to Josiah Jackson. Another was a draft of Josiah Jackson on Neave, on nail account, in favour of John Jackson. Only one other payment to John Jackson was alleged, and of that there was no evidence except a paper purporting to be a receipt, but which was not proved.

The evidence of payments to or claims on the executor Samuel Jackson, is (in the view taken thereof by the court of appeals) unnecessary to be stated, with a single exception. There was a paper marked F. importing that Samuel Jackson received, the 26th of March 1825, of Josiah Jackson, 3969 pounds cut nails, in full of the last 6000 dollars due John & Samuel Jackson from the estate of Samuel Jackson deceased, 112 as devised in his *will. The genuineness of this paper was drawn in question.

The circuit court overruled* the defendants' exceptions, and by consent of James Updegraffe administrator of his deceased wife, decreed that the defendants Josiah Jackson and Henry Dixon and Ruth his wife pay to the plaintiffs who were children of Susanna Updegraffe, the sum of 5000 dollars, with legal interest on 1000 dollars parcel thereof from the 28th of July 1819, on 1000 dollars other parcel thereof from the 28th of July 1820, on 1000 dollars other parcel thereof

*JUDGE FRY, who pronounced the decree in the circuit court, delivered a very elaborate opinion. He considered that the executors were, as to the legacy, trustees, and their authority over this fund more limited than that of an executor over assets; citing, to shew the difference between an executor and a trustee, Graff &c. v. Castleman &c. 5 Rand. 208-9. He declared it to be a principle, that a trustee cannot apply the trust fund either to the payment of his own debt, or to his private trade or business, and that all persons who are privy to and aiding him in so doing, are precluded from taking any benefit from their act; citing, in support of this proposition, and to shew the extent to which it is carried, Wilson v. Moore, 1 Mylne & Keene 387. 7 Cond. Eng. Ch. Rep. 78. Graff &c. v. Castleman &c. 5 Rand. 201. Then the judge examined the evidence, and from it came to the conclusion, that the alleged payments to and receipts of Samuel Jackson were confined to his own legacy, and to his private dealings and business with Josiah Jackson, and that it was fraud to attempt to make them serve the double purpose of discharging the legacy of Mrs. Updegraffe. Proceeding further to examine the case as to the alleged payments to John Jackson, it seemed to him that the sum of 902 dollars 25 cents, composed of payments which had commenced before the testator's death, was manifestly the private debt of John Jackson; that the sum of 1763 dollars 18 cents was for the same nails and brads mentioned in two receipts of John Jackson separately charged, and must moreover be altogether excluded upon the principles before mentioned; and that the want of sufficient evidence to support the other claims, and the principles aforesaid, required the rejection of the same.

from 28th of July 1821, on 1000 dollars other parcel thereof from the 28th of July 1822, and on 1000 dollars the residue thereof from the 28th of July 1823, until paid, and 113 the *costs of suit; and the decree provided that unless the said sum of 5000 dollars, with the interest and costs, should be paid within 120 days from the date of the decree, the lands devised to Josiah Jackson and Ruth Dixon, or so much thereof as might be necessary, should be sold.

On the petition of Josiah Jackson and Henry Dixon and Ruth his wife, an appeal was allowed from the decree.

The cause was argued in August 1840, before Tucker, P., and Brooke and Stanard, J., by C. Johnson for the appellants, and Baldwin for the appellees.

Johnson said, the court below seemed to have thought that the trust to receive the annual sum of 1000 dollars was a personal joint authority to the executors, which could only be discharged by their joint act. But he insisted it was an official trust, which could be performed as any other executorial trust. It is created by the official designation. The clause in the first part of the will containing the bequest directs the payment by the executors, and under that clause it must have been payable out of the general assets. The subsequent provision in the will only creates a specific fund to be received by the executors, to enable them to discharge the legacy given by the previous clause. As executors, then, they are to receive, and as executors they are to pay, by the express terms of the will. Suppose the executors had not qualified, they surely would have had no right to receive the money. Having qualified, they are entitled to receive the same, and may receive it in equivalents or commutables, as well as money. The case of Wilkinson & Co. v. Holloway, 7 Leigh 277. in which it was held that an attorney employed to collect money cannot receive bonds or other things under that authority, has no application to this. Here the executors gave an official bond, and have 114 all the power *of the testator where they act bona fide. And surely neither the debtor who gives, nor the executor who receives money's worth in discharge of a debt, is chargeable with bad faith. The principle of the case of Graff &c. v. Castleman &c. 5 Rand. 201. applies only to a few items of disbursements claimed by Josiah Jackson as made to the executors. And even in respect to these, there is pregnant proof in the deposition of Neave, that those debts were the result of a previous authority given by Josiah Jackson to the ostensible creditor, to make advances to the executors on account of their claim as such. The objection is made, that none of the receipts but that marked F. import to be given as executors, or on account of the sums payable by Josiah Jackson under the will, and that they were private transactions, having no connection with the claim of the executors or the responsibility of the devisees. There was, however, no running account between the parties; no claim on Josiah Jackson but for the sums payable under the will. And the only effect of the omission to state, on the face of the receipts, that the executors received in that character, is to throw the burden of proof on the party paying. The last receipt is avowedly for what was payable under the will, yet that is not subscribed as executor. (The counsel then examined the evidence in the cause, and endeavoured to shew that it established all that was necessary on the part of the appellants.)

Baldwin for the appellees. The executors were entitled to the 6000 dollars for their own use. Over that they had full dominion, and against that Josiah Jackson was entitled to credit for any liabilities they might incur to him. Not so as to the 5000 dollars. As to this, they stood in a fiduciary character, with the limited and special authority of trustees, liable themselves for a breach of the trust, and with a liability on the part of others concurring in that breach of trust. The power given in this case to the two trustees could not be lawfully 115 *executed by one. 2 Story's Eq. 322.

§ 1280. But another objection to the validity of the alleged payments arises from the duty of trustees to keep the funds of their trust distinct from other funds. 2 Fonb. Eq. 187. (Philad. edi. of 1831, p. 474. note.) They are not permitted to apply the trust funds to their own debts, trade or business. To the authorities cited by the judge of the circuit court may be added the case since decided of Fisher v. Bassett and others, 9 Leigh 119. Furthermore, the trust in this case was created by a will containing special directions, which should have been faithfully followed. 2 Story's Eq. 517. § 1276. There was no right to receive payment but in money. The decision in Wilkinson & Co. v. Holloway is quite apposite to the case. (Having laid down these principles, the counsel proceeded to examine the evidence, and to shew, upon each ground, the invalidity of the alleged payments.)

The cause not having been decided before the resignation of Tucker, P., was again argued in August 1842, before Cabel, P., and Brooke and Stanard, J., by C. and G. N. Johnson for the appellants, and Guy R. C. Allen for the appellees. The argument on this occasion was chiefly upon the evidence, to shew the proper inferences therefrom. But in the course of the argument, G. N. Johnson, for the appellants, maintained, 1. That the thing given to the executors being money, though they had a right to charge the land for it, they took it as executors, and not as trustees. 2. That being executors, a payment of nails and iron to one of them was good, if accepted by him in satisfaction; (citing Sallee v. Yates, 1 Wash. 226. in which payments in paper money were held good, in accordance with the custom of 116 the country, *though before the act of assembly authorizing such payments.) 3. That even if the executors were to be considered as trustees, one might make a valid contract, and the assent of the other be presumed. Nelson v. Carrington & others, 4 Munf. 332. He also, in noticing the doctrine of Graff &c. v. Castleman &c. 5 Rand. 201. cited and commented on Landley v. Merrifield, 7 Leigh 360, 61. The counsel for the appellees referred to the authorities relied on by the judge of the circuit court, and to the case of Wilkinson & Co. v. Holloway. He insisted that the trustees here were as limited in their authority as the attorney at law in that case. He insisted further, that the trustees could not give a release in consideration of a debt due from themselves individually. As well might they give such release for no consideration, as for a consideration enuring entirely to their own individual benefit.

STANARD, J. The fate of this case depends on the fact and validity of the payment, alleged by the defendant Josiah Jackson to have been made, of the annual instalments intended for the daughter Susanna.

It requires but a brief examination of the record, though the mind of the enquirer be disposed to make the most charitable construction, to find the most convincing proof that the defendant Josiah Jackson, in his efforts to sustain the defence, has been betrayed into gross inconsistencies, has made many misstatements, has in numerous instances duplicated his claims of credit, and has put forward unfounded pretensions or suppressed material facts. But all this, though it may cover the defence with suspicion, does not necessarily doom it to unconditional condemnation. The judicial annals of this and other countries are not without examples of attempts to vindicate innocence by falsehood, nor of a resort to fraud and misstatement to sustain claims or defences intrinsically 117 sound and sustainable *without such auxiliaries; and though a court of equity may refuse its aid to a plaintiff who has resorted to fraudulent misstatements or suppressions to obtain it, it has no right to inflict the forfeiture of a defence, if otherwise good, because resort has been attempted to such reprobated auxiliaries. Such an infliction would be a punishment of the delinquent, not perhaps undeserved, but would not fulfil the appropriate function of a court of equity, which is to administer justice between the parties. The detection of misstatements, inconsistencies, and efforts to deceive by concealing facts or by unfounded suggestions, while it justly subjects the defence to strict scrutiny, should also warn us to conduct the scrutiny with jealous caution against the prepossions that such detection is calculated to produce.

That the traits I have suggested as characterizing the defence have not been overcharged, a short survey of the facts developed by the record will evince. [Here the judge went into some specifications, to shew the general traits which mark and cast suspicion on the defence; and he then proceeded as follows:]

Without adding to the number of these specifications, which might easily be done, I proceed to the enquiry how far the evidence in the record affords satisfactory proof of valid payment, in whole or in part, to either or both of the executors, of the annual sums charged on the devisees in favour of the daughter Susanna.

[The judge examined first the evidence of payments to, or claims on, the executor Samuel. If the receipt F. was genuine, he considered the fair construction thereof to be, that it was for a small sum as a balance of the 6000 dollars payable to John and Samuel Jackson, as contradistinguished from the 5000 dollars to which the daughter Susanna was entitled. And upon the whole evidence in relation to said payments 118 or claims, his *conclusion was, that they were not only not shewn to be for Susanna's annuity, but were affirmatively shewn to be on a different account, and ought not to affect the claim of her representatives on the devisees.

Next investigating the alleged payments to the executor John, the judge identified the item of 1763 dollars 13 cents, attempted to be sustained by Neave's deposition, with the nails and brads mentioned in two receipts of John Jackson separately charged, the effect of which identification was to limit the charge, at all events, to the said sum of 1763 dollars 13 cents, and not permit any additional charge on account of the receipts. And then he proceeded as follows:]

To the decision of the question touching the efficacy of the transactions of the devisee Jackson with the respective executors, as payments or discharges of the instalments to which the daughter Susanna was entitled, it was deemed by the counsel, especially on the former argument of this cause, important to determine preliminarily the quality and extent of the powers conferred by the will on the executors, over the fund provided by the charge on the devisees. On behalf of the appellants it was contended, that the executors took this fund as personal property, and that their power over the fund was as plenary in all respects as it was over the personal property of their testator. On the other hand it was contended, that this fund was the issue of real estate dedicated by the will of the testator to a specific object, not forming a part of the personal estate of the testator, and not chargeable in the hands of the executors with debts, or other liabilities of personal estate; and that the power of the executors was in the nature of a trust, which could be duly exercised only by their joint act. In my view, it is not necessary to the decision of the case that this question should be solved. I may say however, in passing, that I have examined the question with care, and that that examina-

119 tion *has left a deep impression that the general proposition, that this fund is identified with the personal estate of the testator, and passes to the executors subject in all respects to the executorial power over personal estate, and to all the liabilities of such estate, cannot be maintained. The just construction of the will, taking all its provisions together, is, according to my impression, that the legacy is not a general one, payable out of the personal assets, with the charge on the land as an auxiliary security, but is a legacy to be paid by the proceeds of the charge on the land, and that the charge supplies the only fund for its payment. The consequence of this construction is, to divest the fund of the quality of personalty ascribed to it by the appellants' counsel. No proposition is better settled than this, that a devise of real estate to executors to be sold, or that real estate be sold by executors, for the payment of legacies, does not impress on the proceeds of sale in the hands of the executors the quality or subject them to the liability, of personalty: and it would be difficult to distinguish between a fund issuing from realty by a charge and by a sale, both coming to the hands of the executors for the same specific purpose. In respect to such a fund, the most that could be said is, that when the will directs it to the hands of persons nominatum, who are not executors, the construction is that the power is to be exercised in the terms and manner it is given, that is, jointly, and it would not even survive; but when it is given to executors, the power is expounded by the nature of the executorial power, and as that is a joint and several power and survives, the inferred intention is that such should be the quality of the power under such a disposition, and the construction gives effect to this inferred intention. In such case, the executors take the power, not virtute officii, but ratione officii. The question, however, touching the validity
120 of the alleged payments, will be considered on *the hypothesis that the power, in respect to the receipt of the instalments charged on the land for the daughter Susanna, was as plenary as that of executors over personal estate.

Thus considering it, one general principle need only be premised; and that is, that parties dealing with an executor or trustee, and co-operating with him in the misapplication of assets of trust funds, in violation of the duties of the executor or in breach of the trust, cannot use such transactions as a defence against the claim of creditors, legatees or cestuis que trust: and the application of assets of trust funds by the executor or trustee to the discharge of his individual responsibilities, is, unless the estate or trust be indebted to the executor or trustee, a violation of duty or breach of trust. This principle rests on the firmest foundation of authority, and indeed is not contested.

The evidence to sustain the first charge of 902 dollars 25 cents, shews a liability of John Jackson to Jackson & Sharpless, arising from receipts under an authority which originated at a date antecedent to the death of the testator, and which therefore could have no reference to the rights and responsibilities resulting from the will. Standing on the simple fact of the receipt of the funds of Jackson & Sharpless (and that is all that is proved), it made John Jackson indebted to Jackson & Sharpless, and without some farther posterior agreement between Jackson & Sharpless and John Jackson, could not be set off even against a claim of John Jackson on Josiah Jackson. But suppose there was distinct proof of such posterior agreement, that these receipts should be considered a payment on account of the annuity which the executors were to receive for the daughter Susanna; it would be an application of the instalments for the daughter to the discharge of a debt of John Jackson to Jackson & Sharpless, and therefore, on the general principle pre-121 ised, wholly invalid. Besides, *the claim on this transaction as connected with the liabilities of the devisees, is exposed to strong suspicion, if not certain condemnation, on another ground. The account exhibited with the answer, professing to embrace all the claims of Josiah Jackson connected with those of the executors or either of them, does not include this, though it comprehends all the other claims resulting from the transactions with Neave & son; and while this shews a liability of John Jackson to Jackson & Sharpless in its origin, no account of any kind between them is exhibited. The implication is, that there were accounts between those parties, and that they have been suppressed. To my mind it is clear that this item ought to be excluded, not only as a credit against the instalments to which Susanna was entitled, but from the accounts between Josiah Jackson and the executors, or either of them.

Having identified the item of 1763 dollars 13 cents with the nails and brads mentioned in the two receipts of John Jackson before adverted to, the delivery of these nails and brads is not referrible to the general authority of Josiah Jackson to Neave & son to honour the calls of John Jackson (spoken of in Neave's deposition), but to the authority derived from John Jackson's possession of the receipts. The effect of the receipts was to create a personal liability of John Jackson to Josiah Jackson, for the nails or the proceeds of them. There is no proof, or attempt to prove, that this original liability has, by subsequent agreement, been changed. Standing on that footing, had John Jackson, as executor, sued for the annual instalments, this personal demand on him could not be set off, and had he been sued on it, he could not have set off the claim for the annual instalments.

But suppose the subsequent agreement that this personal liability should pro tanto be a satisfaction of the annual instalments; it would be an application of the annual 122 *instalments to the discharge of the debt of one of the executors, and, on the principle before stated, invalid.

The debt of John Jackson to Neave & son, charged to Josiah Jackson is confessedly within the principle aforesaid, and invalid as a payment or discharge pro tanto of the annual instalments.

The draft of Josiah Jackson on Neave, on nail account, in favour of John Jackson, is on its face a transaction between the said John Jackson and Josiah Jackson, having no connection with the estate of Samuel Jackson. It is a matter between them personally. It was not paid by Neave under the general authority spoken of in his deposition, but on the specific draft of Josiah Jackson. All the other items with which it is associated arise from dealings shewn to be personal to the parties, and in their own individual names; and that still more distinctly impresses on it the character it bears on its face; and upon sound principles of evidence, that character only can be safely ascribed to it.

We thus ascertain that not one of the charges drawn from Neave's account, and attempted to be sustained by his deposition, can be considered as a payment to John Jackson of, or on account of, the annual instalments to which Susanna was entitled.

The other pretended payment to John Jackson is attempted to be sustained by a receipt, which is not authenticated by proof; and if it were, it is like the two other receipts before mentioned, and, as a payment, would share the same fate.

The conclusion from a scrutiny of the alleged payments is, that not one of them can be applied to the yearly instalments for Susanna. A general survey of the whole matter in proof fortifies this conclusion. Excluding the item of 902 dollars 25 cents received by John Jackson for Jackson & Sharpless, (as it ought to be, for the reason before given,) from the transactions

123 between Josiah Jackson and the executors and each of *them, the amount of all the claims of Josiah Jackson on either and both of the executors, on all these transactions, established by adequate proof in this case, falls short of 6000 dollars, unless resort be had to receipt F.; and with the aid of that receipt, only reaches that sum. I have forborne any special notice of that receipt, or to ascertain the extent or depth of the shadow that the circumstances under which it appears in the record should cast on the defence. I am satisfied that in whatever light it is viewed, whether as genuine or antedated or fabricated, it cannot aid the defence; and all that the defendant can with any reason hope for, is that it should not prejudice it.

The three judges concurred in opinion that the decree should be affirmed.

Hutchison and Others v. Kelly.

August, 1842, Lewisburg.

Fraudulent Conveyances—Subsequent Creditors.*—The policy of the statute of 18 Eliz. ch. 5. (substantially adopted in the act of Virginia to prevent frauds and perjuries) investigated by BALDWIN, J., and the true principle declared by him to be, that a fraudulent intent of the grantor against one or more creditors is fraudulent against all, and that no distinction exists between prior and subsequent creditors, other than that which arises from the necessity of shewing a fraudulent intent against some creditor, which cannot be done in behalf of creditors not in existence at the time of the conveyance, but by proving either a prior indebtedness, or a prospective fraud against them only.

Same—Indebtedness of Donor—Presumption of Fraud.—

Kelly*, 1 Rob. 123, says: 'The true principle, I conceive to be this, that a fraudulent intent against one or more creditors is fraudulent against all; and the statute justifies no other distinction between prior and subsequent creditors than that which arises from the necessity of showing a fraudulent intent against some creditor.' Since the statute imposing the limitation of five years, in certain cases, and since the second section of chapter 74 of the Code of West Virginia has been a part of the law against fraudulent conveyancing, when more than five years have elapsed since the deed was made; the same rule applies to such an existing creditor and a subsequent creditor; in both cases fraud in fact must be shown."

The principal case is cited in Johnston v. Zane, 11 Gratt. 566, to the point that subsequent creditors will be let in upon a fund fraudulently alienated, wherever the conveyance has been or might be successfully assailed upon the ground of actual fraud.

Effect of Grantor's Remaining in Possession.—For the proposition that the grantor's remaining in possession of the property conveyed, is not per se fraudulent, the principal case is cited in Sutherland v. March, 75 Va. 236.

Imputing Fraud as Matter of Law.—The principal case is cited in Cribbins v. Markwood, 13 Gratt. 495, in support of the proposition that the doctrine of imputing fraud as a matter of law has been repudiated.

Same—Voluntary Conveyance to Children—Right of Purchaser at Sheriff's Sale—Case at Bar.—A father made a deed, whereby, in consideration of natural love and affection, he conveyed to his four children, who were infants living with him, all of his property both real and personal. He had another child afterwards. The real property was transferred to the grantees on the commissioner's books, and the taxes charged to them. But the taxes were paid by the father, who continued to reside on the lands and cultivate them, and to use the personal property as his own. A small part of the land was sold by him after the deed. One of the tracts of land conveyed by the deed was afterwards levied upon and sold under an execution at the suit of the commonwealth against the father, for money for which he was liable as Gill, 27 Gratt. 592, it is said: "At this day it is unnecessary to consider the question, so long and so ably discussed by former judges of this court, how far a voluntary conveyance without actual fraud is valid against the claims of existing creditors. That question, it is believed, was finally put at rest by the provision incorporated in the revisal of 1849-'50: which declares that every gift, conveyance, &c., which is not upon consideration deemed valuable in law, shall be void as to creditors whose debts shall have been contracted at the time it was made. See section 2, chapter 118, page 565, Code of 1860. This provision excludes all inquiry into the motives and circumstances of the grantor; it adopts the views of JUDGE STANARD in Hutchison v. Kelly, 1 Rob. 123, and of CHANCELLOR KENT in Reade v. Livingston, 3 John. Ch. R. 481, 500, that if the grantor be indebted at the time of the voluntary settlement, it is presumed to be fraudulent in respect to such debts; and no circumstances will permit those debts to be affected by the settlement, or repel the legal presumption of fraud. The effect of the statute is to disable the debtor from making any voluntary settlement of his estate to stand in the way of his creditors whose debts were contracted at the time." See also, 6 Va. Law Reg. 62, 63.

In Crawford v. Carper, 4 W. Va. 68, it is said: "The common law is the basis of the statutory provisions relative to frauds against creditors. These are intended to embody the principles of most general application. Hamilton v. Russel, 1 Cranch 316; Fitzhugh v. Anderson, 2 H. & M. 302; *Hutchison v. Who is a Creditor—Contingent Liability.—The principal case is cited in Wolf v. McGugin, 37 W. Va. 564, 16 S. E. Rep. 800, to the point that a person contingently liable as surety of indorser is a creditor of the principal debtor.

The principal case is also cited for this proposition in Scraggs v. Hill, 43 W. Va. 172, 27 S. E. Rep. 314; First Nat. Bank v. Parsons, 45 W. Va. 700, 32 S. E. Rep. 276; Humphrey v. Spencer, 36 W. Va. 18, 14 S. E. Rep. 413.

sheriff. The father was still residing on the land at the time of the sale; and on the day of the sale, the father and one of the sons offered to sell the land and make a good title; but the son forbade the sale by the sheriff. The purchaser from the sheriff obtained possession by virtue of a judgment against the father upon a complaint for unlawful detainer. And then ejectment was brought against the purchaser by the grantees, all of whom were infants at the time of the sheriff's sale. In the action of ejectment, a special verdict was returned, finding the foregoing facts, and also the additional fact, that the deed made by the father to his children was executed for the purpose of avoiding a liability to which he might be subjected in consequence of being the surety of a deputy sheriff. HELD, the deed made by the father is void as to his creditors, and the purchaser at the sheriff's sale is entitled to hold the tract of land so purchased by him. But it appearing that the commonwealth was satisfied by the proceeds of that tract of land, and the conveyance by the sheriff being not only of that tract, but of another, which was neither levied upon nor sold, HELD further, the conveyance by the sheriff presents no obstacle to a recovery by the lessors of the plaintiff of the last mentioned tract.

Special Verdict—Judgment for Plaintiff in Part and for Defendant in Part.—In ejectment, the jury having returned a special verdict, which finds facts in relation to two tracts of land, and concludes by saying, that if the law arising upon the facts be for the plaintiff, they find for the plaintiff the lands in the declaration mentioned, and one cent damages, but if the law be for the defendant, they find for the defendant; and the court being of opinion that the law is for the plaintiff as to one of the tracts of land, and for the defendant as to the other; HELD, it was unnecessary to award a venire de novo, but judgment may be given on the special verdict, for the plaintiff for one tract, and for the defendant for the other.

By deed bearing date the 8th of March 1820, between Samuel Hutchison of the county of Nicholas of the one part, and his children Eusebius Robinson Hutchison, David Campbell Hutchison, Lemira Henderson Hutchison and Junius Robert Hutchison of the other part, the said Samuel, in consideration of the natural love and affection which he bore unto his said children, conveyed to them the tract of land on which he then lived, five hundred acres whereof were held by him under a deed, and one hundred acres under a patent; also an entry of two hundred acres adjoining, and "two head of horse beasts, ten head of cattle, eighteen head of sheep, thirty head of hogs, and all the household furniture and the farming utensils, one loom and tackling, and all the grain on hand, either in crop or otherwise." This deed, on the day of its date, was acknowledged by Hutchison in the court of Nicholas county, and admitted to record.

The deed embraced all of the property, both real and personal, belonging to Samuel Hutchison at the time it was executed. The grantees were infants residing with their father, and he continued to reside on the lands until the 10th of November 1830, when he was removed from the premises by virtue of the judgment on the proceeding for unlawful detainer hereinafter mentioned. The lands embraced in the deed were regularly transferred to the grantees on the commissioner's books, and the taxes were thereafter charged to them. The taxes so charged were regularly paid; but the payment was made by Samuel Hutchison. He continued to use the personal property as his own, and to cultivate the lands by himself and others. After making the deed, he sold a small part of the land to another.

126 *On the 16th of June 1826, several judgments were rendered in the general court against Samuel Hutchison as sheriff of Nicholas county; one for 304 dollars 61 cents, the balance due of the revenue taxes collected in the said county for the year 1825, with interest thereon from the first of November 1825 till payment, and 45 dollars and 69 cents damages, and the costs of the motion; another for 90 dollars and 1 cent, the balance due of the militia fines collected in the said county for the year 1824, with interest thereon from the 15th of December 1825 till payment, and 13 dollars 50 cents damages, and the costs; and another for 10 dollars 83 cents, due on executions, with interest thereon from the first day of November 1825 till payment, and 1 dollar 62 cents damages, and the costs. On these judgments, executions were issued against the lands and tenements, goods and chattels of Samuel Hutchison, on which returns were made, that the same were levied, the 9th of October 1826, on five hundred acres of land, and that the land was not sold for want of time. The judgment on account of the militia fines was afterwards paid the 12th of January 1827. On the judgment for the balance of the revenue taxes, a writ of venditioni exponas issued, on which a return was made, that the land was sold at three months credit to Robert Kelly for 1500 dollars, and that the balance of purchase money in favour of the defendant amounted to 1019 dollars 19 cents. The land levied on and sold was the tract of 500 acres mentioned in the deed from Samuel Hutchison of the 8th of March 1820; but Isaac Gregory, the sheriff who made the sale, executed a deed to Kelly on the 13th of May 1830, conveying not only the tract of 500 acres, but also the other tract of 100 acres, stating both as having been sold by virtue of the execution and purchased by Kelly. At the time of the levy under the executions, and at the time of the sale, Samuel Hutchison was residing on the lands; and at the time of the sale, 127 *Eusebius R. Hutchison, one of the grantees, was present, and forbade the sale, claiming the lands under the said deed of the 8th of March 1820, for himself and his co-grantees.

After the conveyance to Kelly, he instituted a proceeding for unlawful detainer against Samuel Hutchison, for the 600 acres of land, and recovered judgment therein;

by virtue of which judgment, Kelly obtained possession.

Afterwards an action of ejectment was brought in the circuit court of Nicholas, in the name of John Doe lessee of David Campbell Hutchison, Junius Robert Hutchison, and David Bair and Lemira Henderson his wife, against the said Kelly. The jury returned a special verdict, finding all the facts before mentioned, and also the following: that after the deed of the 8th of March 1820 was made, the said Samuel Hutchison and wife had another child; that the said deed "was executed by Samuel Hutchison for the purpose of avoiding a liability to which he might be subjected in consequence of being the security of Robert Hamilton, deputy sheriff;" that on the day of the sale of the land by the sheriff, Samuel Hutchison and wife and Eusebius R. Hutchison offered to sell these lands and make a good title; and that neither the said Eusebius R. Hutchison, nor either of the lessors of the plaintiff, was of full age at the time of the sale by the sheriff. The ejectment was commenced in December 1837.

The jury concluded the special verdict as follows: "If the law arising upon the foregoing facts be for the plaintiff, we find for the plaintiff the lands in the declaration mentioned, and one cent damages. But if the law be for the defendant, we then find for the defendant."

The circuit court, being of opinion that the law was for the defendant, gave judgment that the plaintiff take nothing, and that the defendant recover of the lessors of the plaintiff his costs.

128 *On the petition of the lessors of the plaintiff, a supersedeas was awarded.

The cause was argued by Peyton for the plaintiffs in error, and Price for the defendant in error. The authorities on which they respectively relied are reviewed in the following opinion.

BALDWIN, J. The principles of the common law denounced all frauds perpetrated against the subsisting rights of others, and gave relief to the party injured. In regard to frauds upon creditors, the mode of redress was to treat the fraudulent act as a nullity, and permit the creditor to prosecute his legal remedies for the recovery of his demand, in like manner as if the fraudulent act had never been done. The statute of 13 Eliz.. ch. 5 (substantially adopted into our code) was passed in aid of the common law, and sprang from the great and growing mischiefs occasioned by the covin and ingenious devices of fraudulent debtors. It is highly remedial and beneficial in its nature, and is entitled to a free and liberal interpretation. It has often been said to be declaratory of the principles of the common law; and this is certainly true; but it is moreover true that its operation is more extensive and salutary than the rules of the common law, at least as they were understood at the time of the enactment of the statute. In fact it introduced a principle which had not theretofore been recognized by the courts, that of extending relief to rights not in existence at the time of the fraudulent transaction; for it was agreed in Twyne's case, 3 Rep. 83, that by common law, an estate made by fraud shall be avoided only by him who had a former right, title, interest, debt or demand, and not by one more puisne. But the statute embraces all creditors, whether existing at the date of the fraudulent conveyance &c. or thereafter arising; for it will be seen on examination, that it 129 *looks more to the fraudulent intent with which the act is done than to the immediate consequences; regarding creditors as a class of persons entitled to the protection of the law, and contemplating not merely actions, suits, debts, damages &c. which should actually be, but those also which might be, in any wise disturbed, hindered, delayed or defrauded; and declaring all gifts, grants, conveyances &c. made with the prescribed purpose of intent, to be clearly and utterly void, frustrate and of none effect, as against all such persons. The result has been to admit subsequent creditors to relief against a fund fraudulently alienated, where the conveyance has been or might be successfully impeached by prior creditors. This is the fair conclusion from the current of decisions, (see Walker v. Burroughs, 1 Atk. 93. Taylor v. Jones, 2 Atk. 600. Russell v. Hammond, 1 Atk. 15. St. Amand v. Countess of Jersey, 1 Com. Rep. 255. Lord Townshend v. Windham, 2 Ves. sen. 1. Montague v. Lord Sandwich, cited in 12 Ves. 136n. Beaumont v. Thorpe, 1 Ves. sen. 27. Reade v. Livingston, 3 John. Ch. R. 497) and must be regarded as the established doctrine, though contrary to the opinion of sir William Grant in Kidney v. Coussmaker, 12 Ves. 136, in which he professed to follow an opinion of lord Rosslyn in Montague v. Lord Sandwich, not reported, but which opinion, it would seem from a note to the same page, he had misunderstood.

The principle, it is true, upon which the subsequent creditor has been admitted to such relief, has not always been distinctly or correctly stated. Lord Rosslyn in particular, in the case of Montague v. Lord Sandwich, fell into the error of supposing the ground to be, that the subject was thrown into assets, and the subsequent creditors so let in. But how can the subsequent creditors be let in, unless the conveyance be fraudulent as to them? and what propriety can there be in placing the right of the subsequent creditor to relief, upon the will and pleasure of the prior 130 creditors in regard *to impeaching the fraudulent alienation? The true principle I conceive to be, that a fraudulent intent of the grantor against one or more creditors is fraudulent against all, and the statute justifies no other distinction between prior and subsequent creditors, than that which arises from the necessity of shewing a fraudulent intent against some creditor; which cannot be done in behalf of creditors not in existence at the time of the conveyance, but by proving either a prior indebtedness, or a prospective fraud against them only. I would moreover, on this part of the subject, refer to the conclusive reasoning of Mr. Atherley in his able treatise on Marriage Settlements, p. 213, and of Sir Thomas Plumer, master of the rolls, in Richardson v. Smallwood, 1 Jacobs Rep. 556.

It is the fraudulent intent, therefore, in relation to creditors generally, which forms the substance of enquiry in all questions of fraudulent alienation; and the courts have, of necessity, resorted to a legal presumption arising out of the general nature of the case, and to marks or badges of fraud furnished by the particular circumstances. The legal presumption is founded upon a comparison of the consideration for the conveyance &c. with that which constitutes the just claims of creditors; and though voluntary conveyances are not mentioned in the statute, their true character and effect are necessarily involved in its application. This leads to a construction natural and wholesome, and not justly liable, it seems to me, to the imputation of Eyre, B., in Jones v. Boulter, 1 Cox's Ch. R. 288, of being artificial and puzzling. Upon the question of fraudulent intent where the conveyance is voluntary, the law, following the dictates of common sense, gives, on the one hand, due weight to the meritorious considerations arising out of the natural duty of the grantor to make provision for his children and family; and, on the other, to the paramount obligation of regarding an obvious moral and social duty, withdraws the means necessary for the payment of his debts, for the ostensible purpose of advancing the interests of those connected with him by ties of blood or marriage, the transaction speaks for itself; it is properly regarded by the laws as fraudulent, and requires no special marks or badges of a fraudulent purpose. But where there are no interfering claims of creditors, there can be no propriety in restraining the grantor's dominion over his own property, especially when exercised for meritorious purposes, because he may thereafter contract pecuniary engagements beyond his ability to discharge. The presumption therefore against a voluntary conveyance, though fair upon its face, derived from the grantor's indebtedness at the time, I regard as wise and salutary, adapted to the promotion of justice, and conceived in the true spirit of the statute.

I can perceive no objection to this legal presumption in all cases of prior indebtedness; but the weight of it is another matter, depending, it seems to me, upon the extent of that indebtedness. There is high authority for treating the presumption as conclusive in relation to all creditors existing at the time of the voluntary conveyance, without regard to the amount of their demands or the circumstances of the grantor. It was so held by Chancellor Kent in the case of Reade v. Livingston, 3 Johns. Ch. R. 492, in which the authorities are elaborately reviewed, but to my apprehension, not with his usual success. His opinion is supported by that of Mr. Atherley, in his work above referred to, p. 212. The rule would no doubt be a convenient one in its practical application, and cut up by the roots many perplexing controversies. But the objection to it is, that it would not unfrequently be harsh and unreasonable in its operation, converting a laudable into

132 involving innocent children in *the ruin of their parents. Where a parent is in prosperous or unembarrassed circumstances, and makes advancements to his children adapted to their wants and justified by his means, leaving ample funds for the payment of all his just debts, there can be no propriety in treating his conduct as fraudulent, in behalf of creditors who have delayed the prosecution of their demands until those means have become exhausted. The preponderating weight of authority is in favour of this view of the subject. Such is the opinion of Judge Story, after a careful examination of the cases. 1 Story's Eq. 349, &c. It was so held by the supreme court of the United States in the case of Hinde's lessee v. Longworth, 11 Wheat. 199. That decision is in conformity with the doctrine of Lord Mansfield in Cadogan v. Kennett, Cowp. 432. To the same purport is the case of Salmon v. Bennett, 1 Conn. R. 525,—Judge Spencer's opinion in Verplanck v. Sterry, 12 Johns. Rep. 557,—and the case of Jackson v. Town, 4 Cowp. N. Y. Rep. 604, cited 1 Story's Eq. 359. And see Newl. on Contr. 385.

Thus, while I regard the indebtedness of the grantor at the time of a voluntary settlement or conveyance, as raising a legal presumption against its validity, that presumption I consider only prima facie, and not conclusive. It is liable to be repelled by the particular circumstances of the case; as where it appears that the then existing debts were secured by mortgage, Stephens v. Olive, 2 Bro. C. C. 93, or by the settlement or conveyance itself, George v. Milbanke, 9 Ves. 193, or that the grantor was in prosperous and unembarrassed circumstances, and the provision made for his children or family a reasonable one according to his state and condition in life, and leaving enough for the payment of his debts; Hinde's lessee v. Longworth, above cited. On the other hand, the legal presumption may be strengthened by particular circumstances, and rendered conclusive by a degree of indebtedness amounting or approaching to insolvency.

133 *This legal prima facie presumption depends, I think, upon the general nature of the case, as presented by a comparison of the considerations recognized by law, and not upon the particular circumstances, for example, the degree of the grantor's indebtedness, or the extent of his resources. These and others circumstances may be resorted to for the purpose of confirming or repelling the legal presumption, the weight of which must always be left to the sound discretion of the court, and applied with a single eye to the truth and justice of the cause. I am aware that in Holloway v. Millard, 1 Madd. Ch. Rep. 413, (am. edi. p. 225,) sir Thomas Plumer, in speaking of a voluntary conveyance, says, its being voluntary is prima facie evidence, where the grantor is loaded with debt at the time, of an intent to defeat subsequent creditors. But surely, unless the debts be secured to the creditors, such a degree of indebtedness would be conclusive against the fairness of the conveyance; for what conceivable circumstance could in such a state of things repel the presumption of a fraudulent purpose? And in George v. Milbanke, 9 Ves. 194, lord Eldon states the doctrine to be, that in general cases, prima facie, a voluntary settlement will be taken to be fraudulent; but shews that case to be an exception, because the settlement provided for the payment of the grantor's debts, which made it good against subsequent creditors. Nor can I admit that there is any distinction in the application of the presumption to prior or subsequent creditors, as suggested in Reade v. Livingston, by chancellor Kent, who approves of it as to the former, but is disposed to reject it as to the latter; a distinction acted upon by the supreme court of Massachusetts in Bennett v. Bedford Bank, 11 Mass. R. 421, but repudiated by Mr. Atherley in his work on Marriage Settlements, p. 215, 217, 218. For my part, I cannot conceive how, on a question turning upon the same fact, to wit, that of prior indebtedness, a distinction can be drawn between antecedent 134 *and subsequent creditors, in the construction of a statute denouncing the alienation of the grantor as fraudulent against his creditors generally.

The foregoing remarks tend to shew, that though the legal presumption arising from prior indebtedness is highly useful in the application of the statute, yet it would not always be sufficient or safe, without resorting at the same time to the particular circumstances of the case, furnishing, on the one hand, a guide to an innocent and honest purpose on the part of the grantor, or, on the other, marks or badges of a fraudulent intent. It would of course have no application to the case of subsequent creditors, where the grantor was free from indebtedness at the time of the conveyance or settlement. And yet there can be no doubt that the alienation may still be fraudulent within the true intent and meaning of the statute, as springing from a fraudulent purpose directed exclusively against subsequent creditors. The conveyance may be made with a view to future indebtedness, and in order to shield the grantor against its consequences. Stileman v. Ashdown, 2 Atk. 481. Fitzer v. Fitzer, 2 Atk. 511. Richardson v. Smallwood, Jacob's R. 552. Sexton v. Wheaton, 8 Wheat. 246. And where such an intent can be shewn, the conveyance will be void, whether the grantor was indebted or not. Ibid. Salmon v. Bennett, 1 Conn. R. 525. Nor is it necessary that an actual or express intent should be proved; for that would be impracticable in many instances where the conveyance ought not to be established. It may be collected from the circumstances of the case, ibid. Lord Townshend v. Windham, 2 Ves. sen. 1, and the enquiry will be aided by bearing in mind what have usually been regarded by the courts as marks or badges of fraud. Amongst these, are the unreasonableness of the gift, compared with the circumstances of the grantor; his continuing in possession of the property against the terms of the conveyance, exercising *acts of ownership over it, paying the taxes, receiving the rents, or otherwise enjoying the proceeds. Twyne's case, 3 Rep. 83. Stone v. Grubbum, 2 Bulst. 225. 3 Dyer 294. Oakover v. Pettus, Cas. Temp. Finch 270. Bates v. Graves, 2 Ves. jun. 292. Perine v. Dunn, 3 Johns. Ch. R. 516. Salmon v. Bennett, 1 Conn. R. 525. And in estimating the weight of such circumstances, I cannot doubt that the proviso of the statute, in favour of conveyances or assurances upon good consideration and bona fide, ought to have an important influence; for it serves to shew (what is perfectly reasonable in itself) that the legislature intended to avoid all conveyances &c. to the prejudice of creditors, whether prior or subsequent, which were not made in good faith, and therefore all which were incompatible with the avowed or ostensible consideration. And this idea I understand to be intimated by lord Hardwicke in Taylor v. Jones, 2 Atk. 603, when he says, "But the material consideration is whether it" [the conveyance] "be within the proviso of the statute 13 Eliz. for if it is not, the court will not require a strict proof of its being fraudulent."

I have thus, in consequence of the conflict amongst some of the authorities, and the imperfect manner in which some of the decisions have been reported, endeavoured to ascertain the true principles belonging to the subject; and if I have been successful, there will be but little difficulty in the application of them to the case before us.

If the case were free from any special marks or badges of fraud, the deed in question would still appear upon its face to have been a voluntary conveyance in consideration only of natural love and affection; and if it be ascertained that the grantor was indebted at the time, must be liable to the prima facie legal presumption against its validity. But here it has been strongly urged by the appellant's counsel, that the special verdict does not find any indebtedness of the grantor at 136 *the time of the conveyance, but a mere possibility of collateral liability, arising out of his having been surety for a deputy sheriff. I cannot concur in this view of the matter. The finding of the special verdict is, "that the deed under which the plaintiffs claim was executed by Samuel Hutchison for the purpose of avoiding a liability to which he might be subjected in consequence of being the security of Robert Hamilton, deputy sheriff." This, according to my apprehension, ascertains a liability which he had incurred, but to which he had not yet been subjected. The jury do not find merely the fact that the grantor was surety for Hamilton, but find substantially, as I understand them, a liability in consequence of that suretyship. This was a debt; in my opinion, if not within the words, clearly within the spirit of the statute. The language of the statute is, "actions, suits, debts, accounts, damages, penalties, forfeitures," &c. which "shall or might be in any wise disturbed, hindered or defrauded." It embraces all pecuniary damages incurred by reason of the obligation of a contract; whether of an ascertained amount or sounding only in damages; whether as principal or surety; whether actually asserted, or only demandable. The failure of a party entitled to a debt or damages, to prosecute his demand to a recovery, could not alter or affect the intent with which the conveyance was made. A liberal construction in allowing to persons who are or might be injured by fraudulent conveyance, the character of creditors, ought to be and has been given to the statute, which follows and goes beyond the common law in this respect. In Twyne's case, 3 Rep. 82, it is said to have been resolved by all the barons, "that the statute of 13 Eliz. ch. 5, extends not only to creditors, but to all others who had cause of action or suit, or any penalty or forfeiture." In Mountford v. Raine, or Lenthall's case, 2 Keb. 499, there was a bond or recognizance in which Lenthall was 137 bound *for the imprisonment of Drake, and a judgment on a scire facias, awarding execution thereupon against the heir and tertenants, in consequence of an escape of the principal. A voluntary conveyance had been made by Lenthall, fourteen years prior to the recognizance; and Kelynge, chief justice, and Raynsford held, on the trial of an ejectment, that the conveyance was fraudulent, though the plaintiff was but a creditor by way of escape. Twysden, on the contrary, was of opinion that there could be no fraudulent intent at the time of making the conveyance, the party not being any ways indebted, and still but collaterally, which he could not divine at first. The verdict was in conformity with Twysden's opinion: but it will be seen that that opinion was founded upon the fact that the escape was subsequent to the conveyance; for if it had been prior, he must, upon his own principles, have concurred with the other judges. The case therefore establishes, that a liability incurred upon a collateral undertaking, though not yet enforced, gives to the claimant the character of a creditor. In Luckner v. Freeman, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 149, though the court upheld a conveyance intended to secure the payment of honest creditors, made before the trial of a cause founded in maleficio, yet the plaintiff in the suit was let in upon the surplus after the debts were paid. In Jackson ex dem. Van Buren v. Myers, 18 Johns. Rep. 425, it was held that a conveyance made to defeat the recovery, by a third person, of damages in an action then pending for a tort, and before trial and judgment, is fraudulent and void within the New York statute, which conforms to that of 13 Eliz. And in Fox v. Hills, 1 Conn. R. 295, four out of the nine judges were of opinion, that a voluntary conveyance to defeat a cause of action for a tort (though, it would seem, no action was pending) was within their statute against fraudulent alienations, though far less comprehensive than the English statute, the operative 138 words *being merely "debt or duty:" and all concurred in holding it void at common law.

The counsel for the appellants has relied much upon the case of Farley v. Briant, 3 Adolph. & Ell. 839, 30 Eng. C. L. R. 239, in which it was held, upon the construction of the statute 3 & 4 Will. & Mary, against fraudulent devises, that the devisee of a surety who had united with the principal in covenants for the payment of rents, which covenants were not broken in the lifetime of the devisor, was not liable in an action of debt for rents accruing after his death. The statute avoids devises as against bond and other specialty creditors, and gives to the creditor an action of debt upon the bond or specialty, against the heir and devisee of the obligor jointly. In the case of Wilson v. Knubley, 7 East 128, it had been previously held, that an action of covenant not having been given by the statute, such action would not lie against the devisee upon a covenant of seisin contained in a deed of conveyance from the covenantor, to recover damage for the loss and the land, of the expenses of defending an ejectment in which it was recovered. The two cases, taken together, shew that covenant would not lie though there was a breach in the lifetime of the devisor, and that debt would not lie where there was no breach till after his death; but not that debt cannot be maintained where the breach was in the life of the obligor. The remedy given by that statute is a personal action, of a particular form, against the devisee, who was not liable at common law, and an action upon a bond or specialty merely; whereas the statute against fraudulent alienations gives no personal remedy, but declares in the most comprehensive terms, applicable to all damages, as well as debts of whatever nature, (what had been before provided by the common law, at least to a great extent,) that all conveyances &c. made with the 139 proscribed fraudulent intent, shall be void against all *such creditors. The two statutes, it seems to me, are radically different in all respects, and the decisions upon the one can throw no light whatever upon the construction of the other.

I cannot therefore but think, if I am right in my understanding of the finding in the special verdict, that the grantor had incurred a liability at the time of his voluntary conveyance, which created an indebtedness within the true spirit and meaning of the statute, and the principles of the common law: and if so, the extent of that indebtedness is wholly immaterial; for the prima facie legal presumption attaches, and is rendered conclusive by the finding of the jury that the conveyance was made for the purpose of avoiding that liability; which fraudulent intent nullifies the deed in regard to all creditors, whether prior or subsequent. It will hardly be said, that, the jury having only found the fraudulent intent in regard to that liability, the idea of its existence in relation to others is excluded: for a fraudulent intent against one creditor is, as I think I have shewn, fraudulent as to all; and it was not necessary to find that comprehensive intent, which would have rendered the verdict general, instead of special, the province of the latter being to find the material facts of the case, leaving the general conclusion of law, or more properly the general conclusion of both law and fact, to the judgment of the court. 8 Bac. Abr. London edi. of 1832, p. 101. Monkhouse v. Hay, 8 Price 256, 3 Eng. Exch. Rep. 368.

But if it were even conceded that the liability found by the jury does not shew an indebtedness of the grantor at the time of the conveyance, still it shews that the deed was made to defeat a legal and just responsibility, to wit, his suretyship for the deputy sheriff, and was not therefore made bona fide for the advancement of his children. And when we come to look at the particular marks or badges of fraud attending the transaction, *we find emphatically true, what was well said by the counsel for the appellee, that the conveyance could have been made for no honest purpose; and if so, we can conceive no other purpose than to delay, hinder or defraud the grantor's creditor; whether creditors existing at the time, or thereafter arising, I deem wholly immaterial. The facts speak for themselves a language which cannot be misunderstood. A father, in moderate circumstances, and with an increasing family, conveys at one dash to his infant children, four in number, jointly and without discrimination, and with no provision for himself, his wife, or future offspring, his whole property, real and personal, down to his unspecified and unscheduled farming utensils and household furniture, with the grain and the live stock which furnished his bread and his meat; thereby, if to be believed, "dispossessing himself of all his goods, and subjecting himself to his cradle:" continuing, however, in the possession and enjoyment of the whole subject, controlling and using it as his own, paying the taxes, though charged to the grantees, and discrediting the very title which he professed to confer, by offering to sell the realty, and actually selling a portion thereof. If such shallow devices be suffered to cover up a man's property from the pursuit of his creditors, will it not be "not only to the let or hinderance of the due course and execution of justice, but also to the overthrow of all true and plain dealing, bargaining and chevisance between man and man, without the which no commonwealth or civil society can be maintained or continued?"

Upon the whole, I am well satisfied that the judgment of the circuit court is right, so far as relates to the tract of 500 acres: but in regard to the tract of 100 acres, I think it wrong; that portion of the land not having been sold or levied on under the commonwealth's execution, and though conveyed by the sheriff's deed to the purchaser, that conveyance can present

141 *no obstacle to a recovery by the lessors of the plaintiff claiming under their father's deed, they having acquired a title good between the parties, and unimpeachable by the commonwealth or any one claiming under her; she, since the sale of the 500 acres, no longer occupying the relation of creditor, her debt having been fully satisfied by the proceeds of that sale. A difficulty, however, occurs as to the mode of correcting this error. It might be thought, at first view, that the alternative general finding of the jury, for the plaintiff or the defendant as the law of the case might be, being entire, the judgment must conform to the verdict in that respect, or not at all; which would render it necessary to set aside the verdict, and award a venire facias de novo. Such a result is to be deprecated, inasmuch as it would put the parties at sea again before a jury: and some reflection will serve to shew that it would be improper. The courts have always disregarded mere informalities in verdicts, of which numerous examples may be found in 3 Bac. Abr. London edi. of 1832, title Ejectment, F. p. 29. In this case, there can be no doubt that it was the intent of the jury to submit to the court the law of the whole case upon the facts specially found. If the alternative finding of the jury in behalf of the plaintiff had been for the lands in the declaration mentioned, or so much thereof as he is entitled to recover, it is clear there could be no objection to rendering judgment for part only. The omission of such terms I regard as a mere informality, as the jury cannot be supposed to have intended, what would have been obviously improper, to fetter the power of the court in rendering judgment according to the law of the case. The verdict ought therefore to be considered as a finding for the plaintiff of so much of the lands demanded, as in the opinion of the court he was entitled to recover. And my opinion is, that the judgment ought to be reversed with costs, and judgment *rendered in favour of the plaintiff for the tract of 100 acres, one of the messuages demanded, and for the defendant as to the residue.

STANARD, J. The finding of the jury ascertains that the deed from Hutchison to his children was not only voluntary and without valuable consideration, but was made mala fide and covinously. It is not merely constructively fraudulent as being voluntary: it is tainted with actual covin, and according to the letter and spirit of the statute, void as to all creditors. The property conveyed by it was therefore liable to the execution of the commonwealth; and the purchaser under that execution, to the extent of the levy thereof and sale under it, has title paramount to that derived under the fraudulent deed. I think it unnecessary, in this case, to enter at large into the review of the numerous cases which have been so elaborately collected and examined by my brother Baldwin. I content myself with saying, that on other occasions I have examined them with care, and my impression was and still is, that the principle extracted by chancellor Kent, in his elaborate judgment in the case of Reade v. Livingston, 3 Johns. Ch. R. 481,—to wit, that a voluntary conveyance without valuable consideration, though free from actual covin, cannot prevail against the claims for debts existing at the time of such conveyance,—is a sound one.

The claim of the purchaser under the execution is only commensurate with the levy and sale under it. As that levy was on one tract of 500 acres, the sheriff had no authority to sell and convey more, and his deed to the purchaser for the other tract of 100 acres conveyed no title, and the judgment in respect to the tract of 100 acres was erroneous.

The judges unanimously concurred in reversing the judgment of the circuit court, with costs, and entering judgment, as to the tract of 100 acres of land, that the plaintiff recover his term yet to come in the same, and his costs of suit; and as to the tract of 500 acres, that the defendant go thereof without day.

(Absent ALLEN, J.)

Powers of Attorney—Construction of Powers.†—Under a power of attorney, authorizing the attorney to act in every species of business wherein the principal may be concerned or interested in the United States, HELD, notwithstanding the broad terms of the power, the attorney is not authorized to pledge the property of his principal, to secure the individual debt of the attorney.

*For monographic note on Master and Servant, see end of case.

†Powers of Attorney—Notice to Third Person.—Where one deals with an agent under written power he must take notice of his powers, as an act not authorized is not binding on the principal. Dyer v. Duffy, 39 W. Va. 152, 19 S. E. Rep. 541, citing Hewes v. Doddridge, 1 Rob. 143. The principal case is also cited in Stainback v. Read, 11 Gratt. 281. See monographic note on "Master and Servant" at end of case.

On the 17th of September 1833, David T. Hewes of Harrison county made a power of attorney, whereby he appointed William Thomas of Prince William county his agent and attorney in fact, for him the said Hewes and on his behalf, and in his name, to do, transact and perform "all and every thing or things, act or acts, which he may deem proper to be done (always consulting his own judgment in the act or acts to be done and performed) in any and every species of business wherein I (the said Hewes) may be in any wise concerned or interested in the United States." Power was given the attorney to prosecute suits in the name of the principal, to make bargains, contracts or sales in his name, to accommodate, by compromise or otherwise, any question of or concerning property between the principal and persons in the United States, and to do such other and further acts as he might think right and just to do; the principal declaring that

144 he intended to vest his said *agent with unlimited power in the execution or performance of all things or matters wherein he was in any wise interested or concerned in the United States. And the power concluded in these words: "I do hereby declare his every act in that capacity to be legal and valid against myself, my heirs, and every other person or persons whatsoever."

Soon after the execution of this power of attorney, the following bill of sale was made:

"In consideration of Jasper Y. Doddridge and William L. Jackson becoming liable for David T. Hewes as well as myself, I, as agent and attorney of David Hewes, and for myself, do hereby convey to said Doddridge and Jackson one grey mare lately owned by John Davis, and one grey horse lately owned by Jesse Jarvis, to have and to hold the same as their property. Witness my hand and seal, as agent and attorney aforesaid, and for myself, this 9th October 1833.

atty. for D. Hewes, [Seal.]
William Thomas [Seal.]"

An action of detinue being brought by Doddridge and Jackson against Hewes for the horse and mare, the plaintiffs gave in evidence the power of attorney and bill of sale, and proved that since the execution of the latter, and before the institution of this suit, the horse and mare were in possession of the defendant, who claimed the same as his own, and refused to deliver them to the plaintiffs. The defendant then read in evidence a single bill to Waldo P. Goff for 85 dollars, dated the 9th of October 1833, payable three months after date, which was executed by Thomas as principal and the plaintiff Jackson as his surety therein, and offered evidence tending to prove that the bill of sale executed by Thomas to the plaintiffs was intended to indemnify

145 *Jackson as surety to said Goff. And thereupon the said defendant moved the court to instruct the jury, that if, from the whole evidence before them, they were satisfied that the said bill of sale was made and intended to indemnify the surety for said Thomas in the bond to Goff, and that the debt due to Goff was the individual debt of said Thomas, then the plaintiffs could not recover, Thomas not being authorized by the power of attorney to pledge the horses to secure the payment of his individual debt. The court declined giving this instruction, and instructed the jury that the power of attorney invested Thomas with full power and authority to make sale or dispose of the property of Hewes, so long as the said power of attorney was unrevoked and in force; that under that authority it was competent to the attorney to execute the said bill of sale, and to vest thereby a legal estate in the said horse and mare in the plaintiffs; and that the legal rights of the plaintiffs to the said property are not affected by reason of the transfer by the attorney in fact being in consideration of one of the plaintiffs becoming surety for a private debt of the said attorney in fact. To these opinions of the court the defendant excepted.

Verdict and judgment being rendered for the plaintiffs, a supersedeas was awarded the defendant.

The cause was submitted without argument, by William A. Harrison for the plaintiff in error, and George H. Lee for the defendants in error.

STANARD, J. It is necessary to the validity of a title claimed under the act of an agent or attorney, that the act be within the scope of the agency or power. Where one deals with an attorney having his authority in writing, he is informed of the objects and limitations of the power, and good faith forbids his co-operation in any act which on its face applies the power 146 to purposes *in no wise connected with the interests of the principal, and perverts it to objects hostile to those interests: and the law justly denies validity to such acts. In particular agencies, this operates the annulment of the act, though the agent may have had the possession and ostensible ownership of the subject of the contract, and the party dealing with him may not have known that he was not the actual owner. Thus a factor has the possession of the property of his principal, with full power to sell for cash or on credit, and on a credit sale, to transfer or collect the debts. All such acts may be for the benefit of his principal; and the subsequent misuse of the funds that may thus come to his hands in no wise invalidates the sale, transfer or collection. But he cannot pledge the goods, or the note taken on the sale of them, for his own debt, so as to give the pledgee a title paramount to that of his principal. Comyn on Contr. 538, 9. And this, though the pledgee did not know that the party with whom he dealt was not in reality what he ostensibly was, the owner of the goods. Martini v. Coles, 1 Mau. &

Selw. 140. The power of the factor is assimilated to that of an attorney, for the purpose of imposing this limitation on his general and large authority, Kinder v. Shaw, 2 Mass. Rep. 398, and the party dealing with him is subject to the consequence of this limitation, though he knows not that in the particular transaction his title is that of a factor. When the act is done avowedly under a written authority, the party is with more reason bound to shew that it is done in conformity with the objects, and within the expressed or fairly inferred limits, of such authority. Broad as are the terms of the letter of attorney in question, the power given has relation to the business and concerns of the principal, and an act which is not only alien but ostensibly hostile to those interests is not within its scope. Such is the act in question; and if the facts be as the plaintiff in error offered evidence *to prove 147 them, there is a misstatement of the consideration in the bill of sale, which evinces a consciousness in the parties of a want of authority for the real transaction, and an improper attempt to disguise it, by giving it the semblance of an act concerning the business of the principal. I think, therefore, that the court below erred in its opinion, and that the judgment ought to be reversed with costs, the verdict set aside, and a new trial of the issue had, on which the court, if desired, should give the instruction that the plaintiff in error asked for on the former trial, and withhold that which was given on that trial.

The other judges concurring, judgment entered accordingly.

I. WHEN RELATION EXISTS.

As it is essential in order to establish liability against a party for the act or neglect of another that the relation of master and servant should exist, the question as to when the relation exists becomes an important one. It may be stated to be the general rule that where one has voluntarily chosen another to serve him, upon knowledge or belief in his skill or care, and has power to give him orders which he is bound to receive and obey, and has the power to discharge him for misconduct, the relation of master and servant exists between the parties; and whether such servant was appointed by the master directly or intermediately through the intervention of an agent authorized by him to appoint servants for him can make no difference. Muse v. Stern, 82 Va. 33; Emmerson v. Fay, 94 Va. 60, 26 S. E. Rep. 386. On the other hand, where the person, whom it is sought to hold liable as a master, has not exercised this power of selection, and does not possess the power to discharge, the relation of master and servant does not exist between the parties. Thus, in a case where one member of a firm, who individually owned a horse and carriage, sent his servant with it to meet and convey the other partner to the store, and while returning, the driver recklessly drove against a third party, knocking him down and injuring him, it was held that the relation of master and servant did not exist between the person riding in the carriage and the driver, and the mere fact of his presence in the carriage at the time of the injury did not render him liable for the driver's negligence. Muse v. Stern, 82 Va. 33. See also, Fry v. Albemarle Co., 86 Va. 195, 9 S. E. Rep. 1004. See post, this note, "Master's Liability to Third Persons."

II. COMPENSATION OF SERVANT.

Services Rendered by Near Relations—Contract for Wages Must Be Shown.—In all cases where compensation is claimed for services rendered near relatives, as a father, brother, grandfather, etc., the law will not imply a promise, and no recovery can be had unless an express contract or an equivalent thereto is shown. It is not enough to establish a moral obligation to pay for them, but an actual promise must be proved, or facts from which such promise can be reasonably inferred, established by evidence so clear, direct and explicit, as to leave no doubt as to the understanding and intention of the parties. Loose declarations to neighbors or friends, or even to the claimant himself, are not enough, particularly when such relative is deceased. It must be shown that the deceased intended to and did assume a legal obligation to the complainant for such services of such a character that it could be legally enforced against him. Expressions of commendation or gratitude, or of an intention to remember him in his will, cannot, unless brought home to the knowledge of the claimant, and shown to have been the consideration upon which the services were rendered, to the knowledge of the deceased, be made the basis of a contract obligation. An action cannot be predicated upon intention merely. Jackson v. Jackson, 96 Va. 165, 31 S. E. Rep. 78; Williams v. Stonestreet, 3 Rand. 559; Stoneburner v. Motley, 95 Va. 784, 30 S. E. Rep. 364.

Hence, where there is no contract, express or implied, a son-in-law is not entitled to payment for nursing his father-in-law during his last illness, as, considering the relation between parties, no compensation can be expected for the services. Williams v. Stonestreet, 3 Rand. 559.

As between Parent and Child.—As between parent and an adult child, whenever compensation is claimed in any case by either against the other for services rendered, or the like, it must be determined from the particular circumstances of that case whether the claim should be allowed or not. There can be no fixed rule governing all cases. In the absence of direct proof of any express contract, the question always is, can it be reasonably inferred that the pecuniary compensation was contemplated at the time the services were rendered; and that depends upon all the circumstances of the case; the relation of the parties being one. Harshberger v. Alger, 31 Gratt. 52; King v. Malone, 31 Gratt. 158; Thompson v. Halstead, 44 W. Va. 390, 29 S. E. Rep. 991; Jackson v. Jackson, 96 Va. 173, 31 S. E. Rep. 78; Stansbury v. Stansbury, 20 W. Va. 81; Hurst v. Hite, 20 W. Va. 205; Riley v. Riley, 38 W. Va. 290, 18 S. E. Rep. 569.

Seaman Contracting for a Voyage Not Entitled to Wages Unless Voyage Is Completed.—Seamen, who engage for a voyage, are never allowed wages unless the voyage is finished, or prevented by the act of the owners themselves, or the government. Hence a mariner, who quits the ship after capture, without the assent of the owners, or having been forced to do so by the captors, is not entitled to wages to the time of the capture. Cavan v. Martin, 3 Call 228.

Wages Conditional upon an Event within Master's Control.—Where an employee's compensation in addition to his regular salary is conditional on the event only that there are sold specific lands in excess of a certain amount, there is no implied agreement that his employer will put the bonds on the market. Winter v. Southern Loan & Inv. Co., 2 Va. Dec. 456.

Interest Where Compensation Is Measured in Profits.

—Where the servant's compensation is measured by a share in the profits, he is entitled to interest on the compensation remaining in the hands of the master after it is due. Goldsmith v. Latz, 96 Va. 680, 82 S. E. Rep. 488.

Hire of Slaves—Liability of Wages Where Slave Is Sick or Dies.—Where one hires a slave for a year, and the slave is sick, or runs away, the tenant must pay the hire; but if the slave die without any fault on the part of the tenant, the owner, and not the tenant, should lose the hire unless otherwise stipulated. By pursuing this rule, the act of God falls on the owner, on whom it must have fallen if the slave had not been hired. George v. Elliott, 2 H. & M. 5.

Condonation of Servant's Misconduct Entitle Servant to Wages.—Where the servant is guilty of such misconduct as furnishes sufficient ground for dismissal and the master still retains him in his service until the expiration of his term, he will be deemed to have waived or condoned the misconduct and will be compelled to pay the wages agreed upon. Burdine v. Burdine, 98 Va. 515, 86 S. E. Rep. 992.

Account Stated—Estoppel to Deny Correctness.—Where a servant received of the master a statement of the account between them for services, and accepted the same without objection, and continued in his employment for more than a year, the presumption arises that he agreed to the correctness of the account. Goldsmith v. Latz, 96 Va. 680, 82 S. E. Rep. 488.

Statutory Regulations.—In some jurisdictions statutes have been enacted with a view to protect certain classes of employees from the supposed opportunity of their employers to impose upon them and oppress them by paying their wages otherwise than in money, or by selling them supplies at a greater price than charged for like supplies when sold to other persons. But some courts regard such attempts by the legislature to regulate contracts between the employer and employees as infringements of their rights. Thus, in State v. Goodwill, 33 W. Va. 179, 10 S. E. Rep. 285, a statute, declaring that no person engaged in mining or manufacturing should issue for the payment of labor, any order or other paper, unless the same purported to be redeemable at its face value in legal money of the United States, bearing interest at the legal rate, made payable to the employee or bearer, and redeemable within thirty days by the maker thereof, was held unconstitutional and void.

And a statute declaring that it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation engaged in mining or manufacturing and interested in merchandising, to knowingly and willfully sell any merchandise to any employee at a greater per cent. of profit than when selling merchandise or supplies of like quality to other customers buying for cash, and not employed by them, was also held void, the court saying that such an enactment was class legislation and an unjust interference with the rights, privileges, and property of both the employer and the employee. State v. Fire Creek Coal, etc., Co., 33 W. Va. 188, 10 S. E. Rep. 288.

But in Peel Splint Coal Co. v. State, 36 W. Va. 802, 15 S. E. Rep. 1000, 17 L. R. A. 385, an evenly divided court affirmed the judgment of the trial court which held that a statute providing that employers should not pay the wages of their employees in other than lawful money of the United States, did not abridge the privileges and immunities of the citizen or deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law.

III. MASTER'S LIABILITY TO THIRD PERSONS.

1. FOR ACTS OF HIS SERVANTS.

General Principles Governing Liability of Master for Servant's Acts.—The liability of a third person, to the person injured, for the negligence of another, proceeds upon the maxim, qui facit per alium, facit per se, and presupposes the existence of the relation of master and servant between such third person and the person actually guilty of the negligent act. It is founded upon the right which the employer has to select his servants and to discharge them if not competent or skillful, and to direct and control them while in his employ. A servant is regarded as an instrument set in motion by the master, and if any injury occurs to another through the negligence or unskillfulness of such servant, while in the course of his employment, it is deemed reasonable that he who has selected the servant should be answerable for such injury. Hence, in cases of this character when it has once been ascertained in whose employ the servant actually is, it is only necessary to ascertain further that the servant was engaged at the time the act of negligence was committed, in the performance of some duty enjoined upon him by his master, within the scope of employment, to fasten upon the master liability for any injury resulting from the negligent act of the servant. Muse v. Stern, 82 Va. 33; Bibb v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 87 Va. 711, 14 S. E. Rep. 163.

Master Is Liable for Acts Done within Course of His Employment.—That the master is liable for the acts of his servant done within the course of his employment is well settled. It is equally well settled that he is liable for the negligent omissions of the servant, if the omitted duty comes within the scope of the servant's employment. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Anderson, 90 Va. 1, 17 S. E. Rep. 757; Gregory v. Ohio River R. Co., 87 W. Va. 606, 16 S. E. Rep. 819; Virginia, etc., R. Co. v. White, 84 Va. 496, 5 S. E. Rep. 573; Harris v. Nicholas, 5 Munf. 483; Bess v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 35 W. Va. 492, 14 S. E. Rep. 234; Bowen v. Flanagan, 84 Va. 313, 4 S. E. Rep. 724; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Neely, 91 Va. 539, 22 S. E. Rep. 367. Thus, where the conductor of a railroad train illegally requires a passenger to identify himself in an unreasonable manner, and in a way other than that required by the rules of the company and indorsed on the back of the ticket, and upon failure of the passenger to so identify himself ejects him from the train, the carrier is liable in damages. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Anderson, 90 Va. 1, 17 S. E. Rep. 757; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Neely, 91 Va. 539, 22 S. E. Rep. 367. And in a case in which the plaintiff, who was in the exercise of due care, was injured owing to a servant's negligence in leaving a mule unattended in a public street, it was held that the master was liable for the injury. Bowen v. Flanagan, 84 Va. 313, 4 S. E. Rep. 724.

Servant Does Not Have to Be Following Instructions.—The test of the liability of the principal or master for the torts of his agent or servant in all cases, is whether the latter was at the time acting within the scope of his authority in the business of the principal or master, and not whether the act was done in accordance with his instructions. For if such act is done within the scope of his authority, and while engaged in his employer's business, the latter is bound for it. Gregory v. Ohio River R. Co., 37 W. Va. 606, 16 S. E. Rep. 819. In this case, indeed, it was said by the court that perhaps the most numerous instances in which the master has been held liable for the acts of his servant were those in which the servant was departing from orders.

Willful and Malicious Acts of Servant.—A general rule of master and servant is that the master is liable for the acts of the servant, though willful and malicious, if done in the course of his employment and within the scope of his authority. Bess v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 35 W. Va. 492, 14 S. E. Rep. 234. But for willful and unauthorized trespasses of the servant not within the scope of his employment, the master is not liable. Harris v. Nicholas, 5 Munf. 483.

Master Liable for Servant's Negligent Acts.—Where a servant, acting within the course of his employment fails to exercise such care as a reasonably prudent man would exercise under like circumstances, in consequence of which injury results to a third party, the master is liable in damages. Bowen v. Flanagan, 84 Va. 313, 4 S. E. Rep. 724.

Not Liable for Acts beyond Course of Employment.—Where a person, to whom a railroad company owes no duty, is injured by one of its servants, the company is not liable to the party injured unless the servant was acting within the scope of his employment at the time the injury was inflicted. Thus, where a servant of the carrier willfully ejected a trespasser from a freight train while in motion, which resulted in injury to the party ejected, it was held that in order to hold the carrier liable it was necessary to show that the act was done in the course of the employee's business, and within the scope of his authority. Bess v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 35 W. Va. 492, 14 S. E. Rep. 234.

2. FOR ACTS OF INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR.

Who Are Independent Contractors.—An independent contractor is one who, in the course of an independent occupation, prosecutes and directs the work himself, using his own method to accomplish it, and representing the will of his employer only as to the result of his work. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Stevens, 97 Va. 631, 34 S. E. Rep. 525. The mere fact that the employer reserves the privilege of inspecting and supervising the work of the contractor, during the progress of its construction, does not destroy or impair his character as an independent contractor. Bibb v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 87 Va. 711, 14 S. E. Rep. 163.

In Emmerson v. Fay, 94 Va. 60, 26 S. E. Rep. 386, the court, in discussing the question, said: "As a general rule, where a person is employed to perform a certain work, which requires the exercise of skill and judgment as a mechanic, and the execution of which is, because of his superior skill, left to his discretion, without restriction upon the means to be employed in doing the work, and he employs his own labor, which is subject alone to his control and direction, the work being executed according to his own ideas or in accordance with plans furnished him by the person for whom the work is done, such a person is not a servant under the control of the master, but is an independent contractor, and the fact that his compensation is to be measured by a per diem to himself and those employed by him does not affect the independent character of his employment, nor does the circumstance that his employer is to furnish the materials to be used in doing the work alter his status as an independent contractor, and create the relation of master and servant."

What Constitutes an Independent Contractor is a Mixed Question of Law and Fact.—What constitutes an independent contractor is a question for the court, but whether or not a particular person is, under the evidence, an independent contractor is a question for the jury. Emmerson v. Fay, 94 Va. 60, 26 S. E. Rep. 386.

General Rule—Master Not Liable for Acts of Independent Contractor.—It may be stated as the general rule that no person other than the one immediately or actually guilty of the wrongful act is liable therefor, except upon the ground that the relation of principal and agent, or master and servant, existed between the person or corporation sought to be made liable and the person who did the act, or who was guilty of the negligence that caused the injury. In other words the principle of respondet superior does not extend to cases of independent contracts where the party for whom the work is to be done is not the immediate superior of those guilty of the wrongful act, and has no choice in the selection of the workmen, and no control over the manner of doing the work. Wilson v. City of Wheeling, 19 W. Va. 323, 42 Am. Rep. 780; Emmerson v. Fay, 94 Va. 60, 26 S. E. Rep. 386; Bibb v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 87 Va. 711, 14 S. E. Rep. 163; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Stevens, 97 Va. 631, 34 S. E. Rep. 525.

Master Liable in Some Cases.—While the general rule, as stated above, is that the employer is not liable to third parties for the acts of an independent contractor, still there are cases where, because of the dangers incident to the performance of the work, the law holds the employer liable for the acts of an independent contractor. In other words, there are some duties imposed upon the master by law which cannot be delegated to an independent contractor so as to escape liability for their non-performance or for the negligence of the independent contractor in performing them. Wilson v. City of Wheeling, 19 W. Va. 323, 42 Am. Rep. 780; Bibb v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 87 Va. 711, 14 S. E. Rep. 163; Stevenson v. Wallace, 27 Gratt. 77; City of Richmond v. Long, 17 Gratt. 375; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Moore, 94 Va. 493, 27 S. E. Rep. 70; Virginia, etc., R. Co. v. Sanger, 15 Gratt. 230; Carrico v. W. Va., etc., R. Co., 35 W. Va. 399, 14 S. E. Rep. 15; Carrico v. W. Va., etc., R. Co., 39 W. Va. 94, 19 S. E. Rep. 573.

Where Work is Inherently Dangerous.—One of the cases where the general rule does not apply is where the contract directly requires the performance of a work intrinsically dangerous, however skillfully performed. In such case the party authorizing the work is justly regarded as the author of the mischief resulting from it, whether he does the work himself or lets it out by contract. Thus, where a city undertakes the improvement of a street, by grading or otherwise, the authorities are bound to take care that the manner of doing the work does not endanger the safety of the public. The city is in all cases responsible for such dangers as are incident to, and consequent upon, the nature of the work itself; while its liability for those dangers which result from the improper execution of the work, may be limited by the terms of the contract under which it is performed. Wilson v. City of Wheeling, 19 W. Va. 323, 42 Am. Rep. 780.

But where a passenger is injured by reason of the track or roadbed undergoing repairs, the fact that the work is being done by an independent contractor, is not of itself sufficient to relieve the company from liability. But it is for the jury to inquire whether there was not danger in the work, arising from the mode and manner in which it was done; whether the company did not know, or by the exercise of proper diligence might not have ascertained, the existence of such danger; and whether they had used due care and foresight in guarding against it; and if they failed in this, the company is responsible to the passenger for the injury sustained. Virginia, etc., R. Co. v. Sanger, 15 Gratt. 230; Carrico v. W. Va., etc., R. Co., 35 W. Va. 399, 14 S. E. Rep. 15; Carrico v. W. Va., etc., R. Co., 39 W. Va. 94, 19 S. E. Rep. 573.

Where Employer Invites Persons on His Premises.—Another case to which the general rule is inapplicable is where a person goes upon the premises of another by invitation. In such case the latter owes him the duty to see that he is not injured while on the premises, either by himself, or through the act of an independent contractor. Thus, in a case in which a party attending a balloon ascension on the premises of another, was injured through the negligence of the balloon man, he being an independent contractor, the owner of the premises was held liable for the injury. Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Moore, 94 Va. 493, 27 S. E. Rep. 70.

III. THE NONASSIGNABLE DUTIES OF THE MASTER.

1. STATEMENT AND NATURE OF DUTIES.

a. GENERAL STATEMENT OF DUTIES.—The duties owed by the master to the servant which are personal to him and cannot be assigned are: (1) The duty to use ordinary care to provide a reasonably safe place in which the servant is to work. (2) The duty to use ordinary care to provide reasonably safe machinery and appliances for the performance of the work required of the servant. (3) The duty to use ordinary care in inspecting the place and the machinery and appliances from time to time so as to keep them in a reasonably safe condition. (4) The duty to exercise ordinary care to provide a sufficient force of competent servants for the doing of the work. (5) The duty to adopt reasonable rules for the regulation and conduct of the work in which the servant is engaged, and to exercise ordinary care in bringing them to the knowledge of the servant and seeing that they are enforced. (6) The duty to exercise ordinary care in superintending the work, and in warning and instructing the servant of dangers which are unknown to him. Core v. Ohio River R. Co., 38 W. Va. 456, 18 S. E. Rep. 596; Riley v. Railway Co., 27 W. Va. 145; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Ampey, 93 Va. 108, 25 S. E. Rep. 226; Cooper v. Railroad Co., 24 W. Va. 37; Jackson v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 43 W. Va. 380, 27 S. E. Rep. 278, 31 S. E. Rep. 258, 46 L. R. A. 337, and note. See the cases cited under the headings which follow.

b. PERSONAL CHARACTER OF DUTIES.—When it is said that these duties of the master are personal to him and are nonassignable, it is not meant that they are such as in the nature of things cannot be performed by an agent, but only that they are duties imposed upon the master by law for the due performance of which he is personally responsible. If he fails to exercise due care in the performance of these duties and the servant is injured in consequence thereof, he is liable; and if he delegates the performance of those duties to an agent, and the agent is guilty of negligence, the master still remains liable, as the negligence of the agent is the negligence of the master. Richmond Locomotive Works v. Ford, 94 Va. 627, 27 S. E. Rep. 509; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Houchins, 95 Va. 398, 28 S. E. Rep. 578.

In a recent and leading case upon this subject the court said: "The doing of these things is a duty of the master to the servant for the latter's safety. The master can either perform these duties personally, or he may delegate their performance to some one else, whom the books call 'vice principal,' because he stands, as to these duties, in the place of his master; but if either fails in the performance of duty in any of these respects, and damage results to a servant, the master must answer. If, however, the damaging negligent act is not one of the things which rest on the master as a duty to the servant, it is the act, purely, of a fellow servant, and the injured servant must look to him, not to the master. These duties falling on the master to perform are called in the law-books 'nonassignable duties,' because he owes them to the servant, and he cannot assign them to another to perform, and exempt himself from liability for their misperformance. These duties are sometimes spoken of as duties in construction, preparation, and preservation, as contrasted with mere work of operation. For instance, the construction of the railroad or other work, the preparation of machinery and implements to be used in the business, the preservation of the track or working place, or machinery and appliances, in proper, safe condition, and the selection of proper servants to work. The master having well done his duty in these things, their handling and use in the prosecution of the work designed is a work of mere operation, and this work the servants must perform well, in the interest of their master and fellow servants; and if one fails to do so, and injures a fellow servant, the master is not liable, since he cannot always stand by and watch the servant in his every act in the carrying on or operation of the business, and the law, of necessity, permits him to commit this work of mere operation to other hands." Jackson v. Norfolk, etc., W. R. Co., 43 W. Va. 380, 27 S. E. Rep. 278, 31 S. E. Rep. 258, 46 L. R. A. 337, and note. For a full discussion, see the headings which follow; and see monographic note on "Fellow Servants."

2. DUTY TO PROVIDE SAFE PLACE.

Statement of Duty.—It is the duty of the master to exercise ordinary care and diligence to provide a reasonably safe place in which the servant is to work, considering the character of the work to be done. If the master is guilty of neglect in performing this duty, and, in consequence thereof, a servant, without default on his part, receives an injury, in the course of his employment, the master is liable in damages. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Cromer, 99 Va. 763, 40 S. E. Rep. 54; Richmond Locomotive Works v. Ford, 94 Va. 627, 27 S. E. Rep. 509; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Norment, 84 Va. 167, 4 S. E. Rep. 211; Richlands Iron Co. v. Elkins, 90 Va. 249, 17 S. E. Rep. 890; Daniel v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 36 W. Va. 397, 15 S. E. Rep. 162, 32 Am. St. Rep. 870; Berns v. Coal Co., 27 W. Va. 285; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Williams, 86 Va. 165, 9 S. E. Rep. 990; Richmond Granite Co. v. Bailey, 92 Va. 554, 24 S. E. Rep. 232; Goodman v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 81 Va. 576; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Stevens, 97 Va. 631, 38 S. E. Rep. 525; Graham v. Coal Co., 38 W. Va. 273, 18 S. E. Rep. 584; Haffner v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 96 Va. 523, 31 S. E. Rep. 899; Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Hafner, 90 Va. 621, 19 S. E. Rep. 166; Russell Creek Coal Co. v.

Wells, 96 Va. 416, 31 S. E. Rep. 614; Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. Rep. 809; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Ward, 90 Va. 687, 19 S. E. Rep. 849; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Poole (Va.), 40 S. E. Rep. 627; Seldomridge v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 46 W. Va. 569, 33 S. E. Rep. 293; Robinson v. Dininny, 96 Va. 41, 30 S. E. Rep. 442; Riley v. Railway Co., 27 W. Va. 146; Robinson v. West Virginia, etc., R. Co., 40 W. Va. 583, 21 S. E. Rep. 727; Cooper v. Railroad Co., 24 W. Va. 37; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Nunnally, 88 Va. 546, 14 S. E. Rep. 307.

Duty a Continuing One.—Not only is it the duty of the master to provide a safe place in the first instance, but it is incumbent upon him to exercise ordinary care in keeping it in a reasonably safe condition. Hence, if the place provided by the master is reasonably safe in the first instance, and is afterwards rendered unsafe by the negligent manner in which the boss or foreman of a gang of hands directs the work to be done, in the doing of which an injury is inflicted, the master is liable for such injury. Richmond Locomotive Works v. Ford, 94 Va. 627, 27 S. E. Rep. 509; Russell Creek Coal Co. v. Wells, 96 Va. 416, 31 S. E. Rep. 614.

Degree of Care Required of Master.—The master is only held to the exercise of ordinary care in performing his duty to provide a safe place for his servants to work. And, as in such matters, even the skillful and experienced will frequently differ in their choice of instrumentalities and methods of doing the work, the master should not be adjudged negligent for not conforming to some other method believed by some to be less perilous than the one adopted by him. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Cromer, 99 Va. 762, 40 S. E. Rep. 54; Graham v. Coal Co., 38 W. Va. 273, 18 S. E. Rep. 584; Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Hafner, 90 Va. 621, 19 S. E. Rep. 166; Haffner v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 96 Va. 528, 31 S. E. Rep. 809; Russell Creek Coal Co. v. Wells, 96 Va. 416, 31 S. E. Rep. 614; Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. Rep. 809; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Ward, 90 Va. 687, 19 S. E. Rep. 849; Goodman v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 81 Va. 576; Berns v. Coal Co., 27 W. Va. 285; Richlands Iron Co. v. Elkins, 90 Va. 249, 17 S. E. Rep. 890; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Norment, 84 Va. 167, 4 S. E. Rep. 211; Richmond Locomotive Works v. Ford, 94 Va. 627, 27 S. E. Rep. 509; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Stevens, 97 Va. 631, 34 S. E. Rep. 525; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Poole (Va.), 40 S. E. Rep. 627; Seldomridge v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 46 W. Va. 569, 33 S. E. Rep. 293.

Thus, in one case it was said that, "The owner of a coal mine is not required to resort to the most expensive methods for keeping his mines freed from fire-damp in order to escape injury to his servants working in the mines caused by the explosion of the fire-damp. If he has reasonably safe methods in use for the proper ventilation of the mine, and uses reasonable care to keep the mine properly ventilated and the fire-damp expelled therefrom, he will not be responsible." Berns v. Coal Co., 27 W. Va. 285; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Ormsby, 27 Gratt. 355; Richlands Iron Co. v. Elkins, 90 Va. 249, 17 S. E. Rep. 890; Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. Rep. 809; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Stevens, 97 Va. 632, 34 S. E. Rep. 525; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Houchins, 95 Va. 308, 28 S. E. Rep. 578; Riley v. Railway Co., 27 W. Va. 145; Hoffman v. Dickinson, 31 W. Va. 142, 6 S. E. Rep. 53; Stewart v. Ohio River R. Co., 40 W. Va. 188, 20 S. E. Rep. 922; Oliver v. Railroad Co., 42 W. Va. 702, 26 S. E. Rep. 444; McDonald v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 95 Va. 98, 27 S. E. Rep. 821; Berns v. Coal Co., 27

W. Va. 285; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Williams, 89 Va. 165, 15 S. E. Rep. 522.

Servant May Rely on Master's Performance of Duty.—In the absence of notice to the contrary, the servant is warranted in assuming that the master has performed his duty. Richlands Iron Co. v. Elkins, 90 Va. 249, 17 S. E. Rep. 890. And this rule applies where the master has delegated the performance of the duty to a superior servant. Hence, a servant has the right to presume that a foreman of the company, whose duty it is to ascertain the running of the trains on the track and to take precaution to prevent collision, has performed the duty required of him and is not guilty of negligence. Thus, where a servant voluntarily got upon a hand car in foggy weather, and no flag was sent out in advance, and no precaution taken to prevent a collision, this being the duty of the foreman as required by the rules of the company, it was held that as the servant had not been informed of the negligence of the foreman in performing his duty, the conduct of the servant was a voluntary assumption of risk of collision only with trains which the foreman could not have ascertained would have been on the track, had he used due diligence to obtain information, and that the company was liable to the servant for an injury received by a collision with an extra train which could have been discovered by the foreman if he had exercised due diligence. Criswell v. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co., 30 W. Va. 798, 6 S. E. Rep. 31.

Master Not Liable for Negligence of Third Parties.—While the master must use ordinary care in the construction and maintenance of a safe place in which the servant is to work, he is not liable for defects not arising from his own negligence, and which could not have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary care. Thus a railroad company is not liable for injuries sustained by an employee by the sliding out or giving way of the foundation on which an embankment rests, where it was made by a different company a long time before the accident, and there is no obvious defect in its construction. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Poole (Va.), 40 S. E. Rep. 627.

Effect of Servant's Assent to Work in Place Provided.—The assent by the servant to occupy the place prepared for him, and to incur the dangers to which he will be exposed thereby, he having sufficient intelligence and knowledge to enable him to comprehend them, discharges the master from the liability to make the place more safe, even if the same can be done with reasonable care and expense. Having consented to serve in the way and manner in which the business was being conducted, he has no proper grounds of complaint, even if reasonable precautions have not been taken. Seldomridge v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 46 W. Va. 569, 33 S. E. Rep. 293. See post, "Assumption of Risks by Servants."

Departure by Servant from Safe Place without Reason.—If a servant who has been assigned a safe place to work, voluntarily leaves it, without any reasonable and proper cause for so doing, and in consequence thereof, is injured, he has no remedy against the master. But it has been held that it is not unreasonable for a servant, in cold weather, to go to a fire, where dynamite is being thawed, to warm his hands; and where he and other hands resorted to the fire for that purpose with the knowledge of and without objection from the master, and an injury resulted therefrom, this was held not to be such contributory negligence on the part of the servants as to preclude their recovery.

Place Rendered Unsafe by Act of God.—Where the place in which the servant is engaged to work is rendered dangerous and unsafe by reason of the act of God, the master is not liable for injuries resulting to the servant therefrom. Thus in a case in which an engineman was injured owing to the roadbed having become washed away by violent rains, the company having used due diligence in inspecting the roadbed, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover. Binns v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 88 Va. 891, 14 S. E. Rep. 701.

Application of Rule to Mines.—It is the duty of the operator of every coal mine to provide ample means of ventilation, and to cause air to be circulated through the headings and working places, so as to dilute, render harmless, and carry off dangerous and noxious gases. It is also his duty to employ a competent fire boss to examine with safety lamps, immediately before each shift, working places and other places where gas is liable to exist. It is also his duty to employ a competent mining boss to keep careful watch over the ventilating apparatus and the air ways, traveling ways, pumps and drainage, and to see that proper break-throughs are made, as required by law, and that all loose coal, slate, or rock overhead in the working places and along the haulways be removed or carefully secured, so as to prevent danger to the persons employed in the mine, and to provide props and timbers for the mine, and perform other duties required of him by law. Omission of these duties is negligence in the operator, and renders him liable to his employee for injuries resulting. Graham v. Newburg, etc., Coal Co., 88 W. Va. 273, 18 S. E. Rep. 584. See also, Berns v. Coal Co., 27 W. Va. 285.

Working between Cars.—A railroad company is guilty of negligence, and liable to its employee injured thereby, when it puts him to work overhauling or repairing a car, where it is necessary for him to be between two cars, and it causes another car to be shifted on the same track and driven against that on which he is at work, without giving any previous warning. Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Norment, 84 Va. 167, 4 S. E. Rep. 211.

Leaving Dangerous Machinery Uncovered.—Where an employer left a large rapidly revolving cogwheel unprotected, so that tongs carrying a large mass of iron were liable to be caught and taken into it and the pieces thrown all about the room with such force as to kill any person with whom they came in contact, after having been warned by a skillful workman to encase it, he was held liable for an injury to an employee resulting from the tongs catching in the cogs. Richlands Iron Co. v. Elkins, 90 Va. 249, 17 S. E. Rep. 890.

Overhead Bridges.—It seems to be a settled principle of law that it is negligence for a railroad company to operate its railroad with an overhead bridge too low for its employees, whose duty require their presence on top of the cars, to pass under when standing on the cars in the discharge of their duties. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Marpole, 97 Va. 594, 34 S. E. Rep. 462; Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Hafner, 90 Va. 621, 19 S. E. Rep. 166; Haffner v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 96 Va. 528, 31 S. E. Rep. 899; Clark v. Railroad Co., 78 Va. 709, 49 Am. Rep. 894; Williamson v. Newport News, etc., Co., 34 W. Va. 657, 12 S. E. Rep. 824; Nelson v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 88 Va. 971, 14 S. E. Rep. 888.

Railroad Tracks Must Be Free from Obstructions.—

Where a railroad company fails to keep its track free from obstructions, or allows structures to remain dangerously near the same, it is liable to the servant for an injury received in consequence of such neglect. Accordingly the company was held liable where a brakeman, unfamiliar with the fact that a stump was dangerously near the track, was ordered to see if the wheels were sliding, and, who, while looking with his head outside the train, was struck by the stump, the existence of which was known to the employee of the company who gave the order unaccompanied by any special warning. Riley v. West Virginia, etc., R. Co., 27 W. Va. 145. See also, Daniel v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 36 W. Va. 397, 15 S. E. Rep. 162, 32 Am. St. Rep. 870.

Delegation of Duty to Independent Contractor.—Since the master, in performing his nonassignable duties, is only held to the exercise of reasonable care, he may, it is held, delegate the performance of one of these duties to an independent contractor, where the delegation of it is consistent with his exercise of reasonable care. Thus, in Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Stevens, 97 Va. 631, 34 S. E. Rep. 525, a railroad company, who had exercised reasonable care in providing a safe place for its servants to work by delegating the performance of the duty to a competent independent contractor, was held not responsible for an injury received by one of its servants through the negligence of the contractor. See criticisms of this case in 5 Va. Law Reg. 633; 6 Va. Law Reg. 637.

Declaration Need Not Aver Servant's Ignorance of Danger.—In an action by the servant for injuries received by working in a dangerous place, the declaration need not aver the servant's ignorance of the danger to which he was exposed. Richmond Granite Co. v. Bailey, 92 Va. 554, 24 S. E. Rep. 232.

3. DUTY TO PROVIDE SAFE MACHINERY AND APPLIANCES.

a. STATEMENT OF RULE.—The master is bound to exercise ordinary care for the safety of those in his service in providing them with machinery and appliances reasonably safe and suitable for their use; and where the servant is injured through a defect existing in the machinery or appliances, which was known to the master, or ought to have been known to him, and which was unknown to the servant, the master is liable for the injury. Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Norment, 84 Va. 167, 4 S. E. Rep. 211; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Burnett, 88 Va. 538, 14 S. E. Rep. 372; Goodman v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 81 Va. 576; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Williams, 86 Va. 165, 9 S. E. Rep. 990; Richlands Iron Co. v. Elkins, 90 Va. 249, 17 S. E. Rep. 890; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. George, 88 Va. 223, 13 S. E. Rep. 429; *Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Co. v. Ward, 90 Va. 687, 19 S. E. Rep. 849; Meyers v. Falk, 99 Va. 385, 38 S. E. Rep. 178; Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. Rep. 869; Riverside Cotton Mills v. Green, 98 Va. 58, 34 S. E. Rep. 698; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Risdon, 87 Va. 335, 12 S. E. Rep. 786; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Nuckols, 91 Va. 207, 21 S. E. Rep. 342; Robinson v. West Virginia, etc., R. Co., 40 W. Va. 583, 21 S. E. Rep. 727; Ayers v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 84 Va. 679, 5 S. E. Rep. 582; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. McDonald, 88 Va. 352, 13 S. E. Rep. 706; Seldomridge v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 46 W. Va. 569, 33 S. E. Rep. 393; McKelvey v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 85 W. Va. 500, 14 S. E. Rep. 261; Richmond Locomotive Works v. Ford, 94 Va. 627, 27 S. E. Rep. 509; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Houchins, 95 Va. 398, 28 S. E. Rep. 578; Johnson v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 36 W. Va. 73, 14 S. E. Rep. 432; Hoffman v. Dickinson, 81 W. Va. 142, 6 S. E. Rep. 53; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Stevens, 97 Va. 631, 34 S. E. Rep. 525; McDonald v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 95 Va. 98, 27 S. E. Rep. 821.

b. DUTY A CONTINUING ONE.—The master's duty in regard to machinery and appliances is not discharged simply by purchasing or providing reasonably safe instrumentalities at the time of the commencement of the servant's term, but his duty in this respect is a continuing one. That is, it is his duty to use reasonable care in providing safe machinery and appliances in the first instance, and, in addition to this, to see that they are maintained in a reasonably safe condition. Cooper v. Railroad Co., 24 W. Va. 37; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Nunnally, 88 Va. 546, 14 S. E. Rep. 367.

c. RIGHT OF SERVANT TO RELY ON PERFORMANCE OF DUTY.—The duty of furnishing safe and suitable machinery and appliances being one imposed upon the master by law, the servant is entitled to presume that the master has performed the duty as required by law, and that he has used due care in seeing that the instrumentalities are in a reasonably safe and proper condition. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Nunnally, 88 Va. 546, 14 S. E. Rep. 367; Ayers v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 84 Va. 679, 5 S. E. Rep. 582; Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Lee, 84 Va. 642, 5 S. E. Rep. 579; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Williams, 86 Va. 165, 9 S. E. Rep. 990; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Burnett, 88 Va. 538, 14 S. E. Rep. 372; Beard v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 90 Va. 351, 18 S. E. Rep. 559.

d. DEGREE OF CARE REQUIRED OF MASTER.

Ordinary Care.—In the performance of his duty to furnish adequately safe and suitable machinery and appliances, the law does not hold the master to the exercise of extraordinary care, but it is well settled that he is only required to use "ordinary care." Darracott v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 83 Va. 288, 2 S. E. Rep. 511; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Stevens, 97 Va. 631, 34 S. E. Rep. 525; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Jackson, 85 Va.

489, 8 S. E. Rep. 370; Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. Rep. 869; Berns v. Coal Co., 27 W. Va. 285; Johnson v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 36 W. Va. 73, 14 S. E. Rep. 432; South West Imp. Co. v. Smith, 85 Va. 306, 7 S. E. Rep. 365; Riverside Cotton Mills v. Green, 98 Va. 58, 34 S. E. Rep. 693; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Risdon, 87 Va. 335, 12 S. E. Rep. 786; Richlands Iron Co. v. Elkins, 90 Va. 249, 17 S. E. Rep. 890; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Ampey, 93 Va. 108, 25 S. E. Rep. 226; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Jackson, 1 Va. Dec. 680; Riley v. West Virginia, etc., R. Co., 27 W. Va. 145; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Norment, 84 Va. 167, 4 S. E. Rep. 211; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Gilman, 88 Va. 239, 13 S. E. Rep. 475; Goodman v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 81 Va. 580; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Burnett, 88 Va. 538, 14 S. E. Rep. 372; Virginia, etc., Wheel Co. v. Chalkley, 98 Va. 62, 34 S. E. Rep. 976; Southern R. Co. v. Mauzy, 98 Va. 692, 37 S. E. Rep. 285; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Cromer, 99 Va. 763, 40 S. E. Rep. 54; Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Lash, 2 Va. Dec. 343; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. George, 88 Va. 223, 13 S. E. Rep. 429; Harris v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 2 Va. Dec. 248.

Thus, in Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Jackson, 85 Va. 489, 8 S. E. Rep. 370, it was held that a count averring that defendant was bound to furnish a "push pole, constructed in the best and safest manner, and of the best material," was faulty, it being defendant's duty only to use "ordinary care" in providing suitable appliances.

Extraordinary Care Not Required.—It has been held in numerous cases that the master is not bound to use more than ordinary care, no matter how hazardous the business in which the servant is employed may be. Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Risdon, 87 Va. 335, 12 S. E. Rep. 786; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Cromer, 99 Va. 763, 40 S. E. Rep. 54; Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. Rep. 869; Berns v. Coal Co., 27 W. Va. 285; Darracott v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 83 Va. 288, 2 S. E. Rep. 511; Virginia, etc., Wheel Co. v. Chalkley, 98 Va. 62, 34 S. E. Rep. 976. For example, it has been held that the measure of care imposed upon the master for the safety of his servant in providing means for thawing dynamite, is that ordinary care which reasonable and prudent men would and do exercise under like circumstances. Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. Rep. 869; Schwartz v. Shull, 45 W. Va. 405, 31 S. E. Rep. 914.

What is Ordinary Care.—Whether or not the master has exercised ordinary care in a particular case must be determined with reference to the facts of that case. "Ordinary care" is such care as a reasonable and prudent man would exercise under like circumstances. South West Imp. Co. v. Smith, 85 Va. 306, 7 S. E. Rep. 365; Darracott v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 83 Va. 288, 2 S. E. Rep. 511; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Risdon, 87 Va. 335, 12 S. E. Rep. 786; Richlands Iron Co. v. Elkins, 90 Va. 249, 17 S. E. Rep. 890; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Cromer, 99 Va. 763, 40 S. E. Rep. 54.

Sufficiency of Allegations of Want of Care.—A declaration which distinctly alleges negligence, and that the company did not provide safe appliances, though it does not allege that it did not use "due, reasonable, and ordinary care to provide proper appliances" is not demurrable. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Jackson, 1 Va. Dec. 680.

And a declaration alleging that it is the duty of a railroad company to keep its brakes and other appliances "in sufficient repair," is not demurrable as charging a higher duty than the law imposes. Goodman v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 81 Va. 580; Rich-

e. NECESSITY OF FURNISHING ABSOLUTELY SAFE APPLIANCES.—It is not the duty of the master to provide machinery and appliances which are absolutely safe. His duty is performed by providing machinery and appliances which are reasonably suited for the performance of the work in hand. Southern Ry. Co. v. Mauzy, 98 Va. 692, 37 S. E. Rep. 285; Seldomridge v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 46 W. Va. 569, 33 S. E. Rep. 293; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Risdon, 87 Va. 335, 12 S. E. Rep. 786; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Cromer, 99 Va. 763, 40 S. E. Rep. 54; Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. Rep. 869; Berns v. Coal Co., 27 W. Va. 285; Darracott v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 83 Va. 288, 2 S. E. Rep. 511; Riverside Cotton Mills v. Green, 98 Va. 58, 34 S. E. Rep. 963.

f. NECESSITY OF FURNISHING BEST APPLIANCES OBTAINABLE.—Neither is it the duty of the master to furnish the best machinery and appliances which may be obtainable; for his duty is only to furnish such instrumentalities as a reasonable and prudent man would furnish under like circumstances, and it is well known that reasonable and prudent men do not in all cases provide the best instrumentalities which can be obtained. Therefore if the machinery and appliances which the master has are such as are commonly used, and can be used by the servant without danger, provided he exercises reasonable care, this is all that can be required. Berns v. Gaston Gas Coal Co., 27 W. Va. 285; Riverside Cotton Mills v. Green, 98 Va. 58, 34 S. E. Rep. 963; Seldomridge v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 46 W. Va. 569, 33 S. E. Rep. 293; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Risdon, 87 Va. 335, 12 S. E. Rep. 786; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Cromer, 99 Va. 763, 40 S. E. Rep. 54; Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. Rep. 869; Darracott v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 83 Va. 288, 2 S. E. Rep. 511. The master performs his duty when he furnishes appliances of ordinary character and reasonable safety, for in regard to the style of the implements or nature of the mode of performance of any work, "reasonably safe," means safe according to the usage, habits, and ordinary risks of the business. The master is not liable for the consequences of danger but his liability rests upon negligence; and the test of negligence in methods, machinery and appliances is the ordinary usage of the business. Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. Rep. 869; Riverside Cotton Mills v. Green, 98 Va. 58, 34 S. E. Rep. 963.

g. NECESSITY OF FURNISHING LATEST INVENTIONS.—That the master is not bound to provide the latest inventions or the most newly-discovered appliances in order to exempt himself from liability for injury to the servant is held in numerous cases. And he may have machinery and appliances in operation which are shown to be less safe than others in use, without being liable to his servants for failure to adopt the improvement, provided that the servant is not deceived as to the degree of danger which he incurs. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Cromer, 99 Va. 763, 40 S. E. Rep. 54; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Risdon, 87 Va. 335, 12 S. E. Rep. 786; Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. Rep. 869; Berns v. Gaston Gas Coal Co., 27 W. Va. 285; Darracott v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 83 Va. 288, 2 S. E. Rep. 511.

Thus, where the plaintiff's intestate and a fellow servant, employees of defendant railroad company, in obeying an order, adjusted a "push pole" from the corner of a tender to the corner of a car on a parallel track, for the purpose of pushing the car, but as the engine started one end of the pole slipped, throwing intestate under the wheels, whereby he was killed, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover on the ground that the defendant was negligent in not supplying the corner of the tender and car with "sockets" in which to place the pole, when the plaintiff's evidence showed that such "sockets" were a new invention, not in general use. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Jackson, 85 Va. 489, 8 S. E. Rep. 370.

h. KNOWLEDGE OF DEFECTS BY MASTER OR SERVANT.—The servant cannot recover for an injury suffered in the course of his employment, from a defect in the machinery or appliances used, unless the master knew, or could have known by the exercise of ordinary care, of the existence of the defect, and the servant was ignorant and had not equal means of knowledge. Ignorance or want of equal means of knowledge by the servant is essential, for if the servant knows of the unsafe condition of the appliances and proceeds with the work, especially in the absence of any opportunity on the part of the master to know of such unsafe condition, he thereby assumes the risk of such defects. Hoffman v. Dickinson, 31 W. Va. 142, 6 S. E. Rep. 53; White v. Newport News, etc., Co., 95 Va. 355, 28 S. E. Rep. 577; Humphreys v. Newport News, etc., Co., 33 W. Va. 135, 10 S. E. Rep. 39; Richlands Iron Co. v. Elkins, 90 Va. 249, 17 S. E. Rep. 890; Riley v. Railway Co., 27 W. Va. 146; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Ampey, 93 Va. 108, 25 S. E. Rep. 226; Johnson v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 86 W. Va. 73, 14 S. E. Rep. 432; Virginia, etc., Wheel Co. v. Chalkley, 98 Va. 62, 34 S. E. Rep. 976; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Burnett, 88 Va. 538, 14 S. E. Rep. 372; Skidmore v. W. Va., etc., R. Co., 41 W. Va. 293, 23 S. E. Rep. 713. But see § 162, art. 12, Va. Const. 1902.

Sufficiency of an Instruction Omitting Elements of Servant's Knowledge.—Applying this rule it has been held that an instruction, that if the locomotive engine of the defendant was in a defective condition, and the defendant knew it, and by conduct, actions, or words, lulled its engineer into a feeling of security, whereby he was killed, the company was liable, was erroneous, because it omitted altogether the element of the engineer's ignorance of the defective and dangerous condition of the locomotive. McKelvey v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 35 W. Va. 500, 14 S. E. Rep. 261.

Sufficiency of Declaration Omitting to Charge Knowledge of Master and Ignorance of Servant.—But a declaration, in an action by a servant against the master for an injury, which properly charges the master with negligence, although it does not allege knowledge by the master of the defect in the machinery, which caused the injury, or that he ought to have known of such defect, and does not allege ignorance of such defect in the plaintiff, is sufficient. Hoffman v. Dickinson, 31 W. Va. 142, 6 S. E. Rep. 53.

Servant with Knowledge of Defects Lulled into Security by Master.—Where the servant knows of defects in the machinery, appliances, or his working place, and is lulled into a sense of security by words, acts or conduct of his employer, and continues in the service, and is injured by reason of such defects, he is not precluded thereby from recovery of damages from his employer, provided the danger is not so plain and obvious that a prudent, careful man, anxious for his own safety, would not risk it. Graham v. Newburg, etc., Coal Co., 38 W. Va. 273, 18 S. E. Rep. 584.

i. DEFECTS MUST BE PROXIMATE CAUSE OF INJURY.—Where the master has failed to use due care in providing and maintaining safe and suitable machinery and appliances, and a servant is injured and brings a suit for damages, basing his claim upon this neglect of the master, it is essential to his recovery to show that the master's failure to provide the proper instrumentalities was the proximate cause of the injury. Thus, where the proximate cause of the servant's injury is the negligence of a fellow servant, and defects existing in the machinery and appliances are only the remote and secondary cause of the accident, there can be no recovery. Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Tribble, 97 Va. 496, 24 S. E. Rep. 278; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Brown, 91 Va. 608, 22 S. E. Rep. 496. See monographic note on "Fellow Servants."

J. APPLICATION OF RULES TO PARTICULAR APPLIANCES.

Ladders on Railroad Cars for the Passage of Servants.

—It is the duty of the railroad company to provide a safe mode for its servants to pass backwards and forwards on the train while performing their duties. Thus, where a conductor, whose duty it was to pass up and down the train, was injured by the breaking of a ladder, which was out of repair and over which it was necessary for him to pass in the discharge of his duties, the company was held liable. Goodman v. Richmond, etc., Co., 81 Va. 576.

Bumpers, Deadblocks, etc., on Railroad Cars.—So it is the duty of a railroad company to use reasonable care to see that the couplings, deadblocks, and bumpers on its cars are in good condition, and where it neglects this duty it is responsible for an injury received by a servant, in the course of his employment, while in the exercise of due care. Thus in Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. George, 88 Va. 223, 13 S. E. Rep. 429, a brakeman, in attempting, on a dark night, to climb down the ladder on the front of a freight car next to the engine, was crushed by the engine's suddenly coming back up on him while feeling with his foot for the bottom rung of the ladder, which was missing—a fact of which he was ignorant. The bumper on the car was broken, which made it possible for the engine and car to come together and cause the injury. It was held that it was the company's duty to furnish proper cars and to keep them in good order; and that no negligence could be imputed to the plaintiff in this case, because the train having been made up in the night, under the supervision of the regular inspector, the plaintiff had no opportunity to discover the defect; and that therefore the railroad company was liable. Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. George, 88 Va. 223, 13 S. E. Rep. 429.

Cars of Unequal Heights—Mismatched Couplings—Not Per Se Negligence.—The use of cars of unequal heights and mismatched couplings in the same train is not negligence per se, and not, as a matter of law, a violation of the company's duty to furnish safe machinery. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Brown, 91 Va. 608, 22 S. E. Rep. 496.

Defective Cars Belonging to Other Companies.—Where an injury results to the servant of a carrier from the defective condition of cars in its use, but owned by another company, the carrier cannot escape liability for the injury on the ground that the cars do not belong to them, as, in such case, the owner of the cars will be deemed to be the agent of the carrier, and it will be held to the same liability as if it had owned the cars. New York, etc., R. Co. v. Cromwell, 98 Va. 227, 35 S. E. Rep. 444.

Defective Chain.—Where the plaintiff, a brakeman, was injured by the breaking of a defective chain, which caused the train to run over the end of a wharf, it was held that the defendant company was liable. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Gilman, 88 Va. 239, 13 S. E. Rep. 475. See also, Hoffman v. Dickinson, 31 W. Va. 142, 6 S. E. Rep. 53.

4. DUTY AS TO INSPECTION.

Rule Stated.—The duty of inspecting the place of work and the appliances and machinery to see that they are maintained in good condition and repair, is also one of the nonassignable duties. They must be continuously inspected by persons competent to perform that duty; and the negligence of the person engaged in performing this duty is the negligence of the master. Cooper v. Railroad Co., 24 W. Va. 87; Riley v. West Virginia, etc., R. Co., 27 W. Va. 145; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Houchins, 95 Va. 398, 28 S. E. Rep. 578; Madden v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 28 W. Va. 610, 57 Am. Rep. 606; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Nuckols, 91 Va. 207, 27 S. E. Rep. 342; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Nunnally, 88 Va. 546, 14 S. E. Rep. 367. Thus, it has been held that it is the duty of a railroad company not only to furnish a reasonably well constructed railway and tracks for the use of its employees, but it must also exercise continued supervision over the same and keep them in good and safe repair and condition. Riley v. West Virginia, etc., R. Co., 27 W. Va. 145. So where a brakeman was injured by the breaking loose of a hand hold attached to a car which it was necessary for him to take hold of in the performance of his duty, and the defect was one that could have been discovered by careful inspection of the car, the company was held liable for the injury, though the proximate cause of the injury was the negligence of the inspector charged with the duty of inspecting the appliances. Cooper v. Railroad Co., 24 W. Va. 87.

Facts Charging Master with Duty to Inspect.—Where facts exist which are sufficient to cause a man of ordinary prudence and caution to believe that the instrumentalities are in such condition that their continued use will cause them to break or give away, and endanger the life of the servants, the master is liable if he does not forthwith use reasonable diligence and care to discover and repair the defect. Thus where the plaintiff, a fireman, was injured in an accident due to the failure of the company to suitably inspect the coupling pin after it had been subjected to a strain which was likely to have injured it, and which ought to have suggested to the company the propriety of an inspection, the company was held liable for the injury. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Nunnally, 88 Va. 546, 14 S. E. Rep. 367.

In a somewhat similar case a servant had his leg broken by reason of a chain which was worked with a ratchet breaking. The evidence showed that while the plaintiff was working the ratchet, the noise made by the chain was heard. The work was stopped, and again the same noise was heard, and the ratchet again stopped. The plaintiff was afraid that the chain would break and injure him, but the defendant being present assured him that there was no danger and ordered him to continue work. The court held that when the defendant saw that the men were fearing the chain would break, it was his duty, before ordering them to proceed, to examine it, to see that it was safe, and as he did not examine it his liability depended upon whether or not an examination by him would have disclosed defects which ought to have been known to him, and which he could have avoided by proper care and caution. Hoffman v. Dickinson, 31 W. Va. 142, 6 S. E. Rep. 53.

5. DUTY TO PROVIDE SUFFICIENT FORCE OF COMPETENT SERVANTS.

Statement of Rule.—It is the duty of the master to exercise reasonable care, prudence and discretion in employing and retaining a sufficient force of careful, responsible and trustworthy servants. He must, on engaging a servant, make reasonable investigation into his character, habits of life, and fitness for the discharge of the duties to be assigned to him. If the master is negligent in performing this duty he will be held liable for injuries to his servants occasioned by the negligence, incapacity, or intemperance of their fellow servants. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Donnelly, 88 Va. 853, 14 S. E. Rep. 692; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Thomas, 90 Va. 205, 17 S. E. Rep. 884, 44 Am. St. Rep. 906; Dingee v. Unrue, 98 Va. 247, 35 S. E. Rep. 794; Madden v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 28 W. Va. 610, 57 Am. Rep. 695; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Ampey, 93 Va. 108, 25 S. E. Rep. 226; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Nuckols, 91 Va. 207, 27 S. E. Rep. 342; Jones v. Old Dominion Cotton Mills, 82 Va. 140; South West Imp. Co. v. Smith, 85 Va. 306, 7 S. E. Rep. 365; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Houchins, 95 Va. 398, 28 S. E. Rep. 578; Core v. Ohio River R. Co., 88 W. Va. 456, 18 S. E. Rep. 596; Williams v. Thacker Coal Co., 44 W. Va. 599, 30 S. E. Rep. 107; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Graham, 96 Va. 430, 31 S. E. Rep. 604.

Duty to Provide a Sufficient Force of Servants.—The general rule, which exempts the master from liability to his servants for injuries received by them in the course of the employment, does not apply where he undertakes to run dangerous machinery with insufficient help, in consequence of which the servant is injured; for such conduct on the part of the master is negligence, and constitutes a recognized exception to the general rule. South West Imp. Co. v. Smith, 85 Va. 306, 7 S. E. Rep. 365. For example, the plaintiff, a boy thirteen years of age, was in the service of the defendant corporation, being engaged in the weaving department of its cotton mills, "to sweep the floor, carry water, and fill the buckets with quills." The dangerous machinery of the weaving department was at the time being operated with insufficient help, and an employee of the defendant, acting as its agent, called on the plaintiff for help, and ordered him into a position of danger, the result of which was irreparable injury to him. The defendant corporation was held liable in damages for the injury thus sustained by the plaintiff. Jones v. Old Dominion Cotton Mills, 82 Va. 140.

Application of Rule to Railroads.—It is the duty of a railroad company to see that the persons in charge of their engines and trains are competent to fill their respective positions. Accordingly it is held that where an engineer, without authority so to do, places an inexperienced and incompetent fireman in charge of an engine, the company is liable for unavoidable injuries that result to other employees by such fireman's unskillful management of the engine, for the reason that it is a breach of the duty the company owes to its employees to exercise ordinary care in providing and retaining competent servants. Core v. Ohio River R. Co., 88 W. Va. 456, 18 S. E. Rep. 596.

Same—Proof of Engineer's Incompetency.—But, when an action is founded on the incompetency of a fireman temporarily in charge of an engine, the plaintiff must prove that the fireman was so inexperienced in the management of the engine that it was not an exercise of ordinary care to place him in charge thereof, he not being reasonably safe and fit for the employment; that he was guilty of mismanagement of the engine by reason of his experience and unskillfulness; and that such mismanagement was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. Core v. Ohio River R. Co., 88 W. Va. 456, 18 S. E. Rep. 596.

Operators of Mines Must Employ Competent "Boss"—West Virginia Statutory Provision.—Under the W. Va. Code of 1891, sec. 11, p. 995, it is the duty of an operator or agent of a coal mine to employ a competent mine boss, and, having employed him according to the provision of this section, his duty to his employees in relation to those duties which the statute prescribes may be performed by the mine boss is performed, and the operator or agent is not liable for injuries arising from the negligence of the mine boss, as he is a fellow servant of the other employees. William v. Thacker Coal, etc., Co., 44 W. Va. 599, 30 S. E. Rep. 107.

Jury May Be Instructed as to This Duty.—Where there is any evidence tending to show that the master has failed to exercise due care in the selection of servants and foreman it is proper to instruct the jury with regard to the master's duty in this respect. Dingee v. Unrue, 98 Va. 247, 35 S. E. Rep. 794.

6. DUTY TO PROVIDE RULES FOR CONDUCT OF BUSINESS.

Duty to Adopt Rules.—It is the duty of a master who is engaged in a complex and dangerous business which requires definite rules for the protection and safety of his servants, to adopt rules for that purpose, and a failure to do so is personal negligence, which renders him responsible for all injuries to his servants resulting therefrom. Moore Lime Co. v. Richardson, 95 Va. 326, 28 S. E. Rep. 334; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Donnelly, 88 Va. 853, 14 S. E. Rep. 692; Richmond Granite Co. v. Bailey, 92 Va. 554, 24 S. E. Rep. 232; Madden v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 28 W. Va. 610, 57 Am. Rep. 695; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Houchins, 95 Va. 398, 28 S. E. Rep. 578; Richlands Iron Co. v. Elkins, 90 Va. 249, 17 S. E. Rep. 890.

But the mere failure of the master to enact rules for the performance of simple duties, the danger attending the discharge of which is obvious, does not constitute negligence, unless, from the nature of the work in which the servants are employed, the master, in the exercise of reasonable care, should have foreseen and anticipated the necessity for such rules. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Graham, 96 Va. 430, 31 S. E. Rep. 604; Moore Lime Co. v. Richardson, 95 Va. 326, 28 S. E. Rep. 334. Thus, it has been held that the occasional moving of cars by hand on a railroad siding is not a work of such nature as to require a promulgation of rules for the government of servants engaged therein. Moore Lime Co. v. Richardson, 95 Va. 326, 28 S. E. Rep. 334.

Duty to Exercise Reasonable Care in Bringing Rules to the Knowledge of Servants.—Not only is it the duty of a master, who is engaged in a complex and dangerous business, to adopt rules for the protection and safety of his servants engaged therein, but he must also exercise reasonable care and diligence in bringing them to the knowledge of the servants, and in seeing that they are enforced. But in bringing the rules to the notice of the servants, and in enforcing them, he is only bound to exercise reasonable care, and his duty in this respect is performed by the selection of competent servants to receive and transmit the orders, and negligence by them in performing this duty is a risk of the employment taken by the co-employee when he enters the service. Oliver v. Ohio River R. Co., 42 W. Va. 703, 26 S. E. Rep. 444;

Rules Do Not Bind Servant Unless He Has Knowledge of Them.—Rules of master do not bind the servant like public law binds every man, but they must be brought to the servant's knowledge in order to bind him. Gregory v. Ohio River R. Co., 37 W. Va. 606, 16 S. E. Rep. 819; Criswell v. Railroad Co., 30 W. Va. 798, 6 S. E. Rep. 31.

Rules for Guidance of Superior Servants.—Where the master prescribes rules for the guidance of his superior servants and the rules are disregarded by the superior servants, the master is liable for injuries to servants of an inferior grade occasioned thereby. Thus where a railroad company prescribed rules for the guidance of its foreman, so as to reduce the danger of collisions on its road, and a collision occurred by reason of the failure of the foreman to observe such rules, the company was held liable to a servant for injuries resulting from such neglect. Criswell v. Pittsburg, etc., R. Co., 30 W. Va. 798, 6 S. E. Rep. 31. See monographic note on "Fellow Servants."

Breach of Rules by Servant Amounts to Contributory Negligence.—Where a servant is injured while acting in direct contravention of a reasonable rule made by the master for the safety of his servants, of which rule he has notice, and which he has promised to obey, this is such contributory negligence as bars his recovery for the injury. Overby v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 37 W. Va. 524, 16 S. E. Rep. 813. For a full discussion, see post, "Contributory Negligence of Servant—Disregard of Rules."

7. DUTY TO WARN AND INSTRUCT SERVANT.

General Rule.—The master must use reasonable care and diligence to warn his servants against such accidents and casualties as may be reasonably foreseen. It is also his duty to instruct young or inexperienced servants as to the dangers incident to the employment so that the servant may avoid being injured by the exercise of ordinary care. The master, however, owes no duty to the servant to warn and instruct him of dangers which are so open and obvious as to be apparent to any reasonable man, for the servant assumes the risk of them at the time of entering into the employment. Richmond Granite Co. v. Bailey, 92 Va. 554, 24 S. E. Rep. 232; Daniel v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 36 W. Va. 397, 15 S. E. Rep. 162, 33 Am. St. Rep. 870; Moore Lime Co. v. Richardson, 95 Va. 326, 28 S. E. Rep. 334; Stewart v. Ohio River R. Co., 40 W. Va. 188, 20 S. E. Rep. 922; Michael v. Roanoke Machine Works, 90 Va. 492, 19 S. E. Rep. 261, 44 Am. St. Rep. 927; Richmond Locomotive Works v. Ford, 94 Va. 627, 27 S. E. Rep. 509.

As to Known Dangers.—A servant who has been engaged for a number of years in the work of the master, and who has full knowledge of its danger, is not entitled, while engaged in his usual employment, to warning of dangers reasonably to be apprehended, nor is it the duty of the master to warn the servant against dangers which are open and obvious. Hence the mere failure of the foreman and fellow servant of a gang of hands engaged in moving cars on a siding to give warning of the approach from behind of a car by which a member of the gang is injured, is not negligence for which the master is liable, although it has been customary for the foreman to give such warning under like circumstances. Moore Lime Co. v. Richardson, 95 Va. 326, 28 S. E. Rep. 334; Stewart v. Ohio River R. Co., 40 W. Va. 188, 20 S. E. Rep. 922.

Duty to Inexperienced Servants.—It is the duty of the master to inform an inexperienced servant of dangers ordinarily incident to the service, and if he fails to do so, and the servant has no opportunity to learn of them, he will not be held to assume risks not obvious to one of his age, experience and judgment. But this rule only applies where the danger is known, or ought to be known, to the master, and of which the servant, on account of his youth or inexperience, is ignorant, and which he cannot reasonably be expected to discover by the exercise of ordinary care. Richmond Locomotive Works v. Ford, 94 Va. 627, 27 S. E. Rep. 509; Michael v. Roanoke Machine Works, 90 Va. 492, 19 S. E. Rep. 261, 44 Am. St. Rep. 927; Dingee v. Unrue, 98 Va. 247, 35 S. E. Rep. 794. Thus where a servant is ordered to temporarily work in another department of the master's general business where the work is of such a different character that it cannot be said to be within the scope of his employment, he does not, by obeying such orders, necessarily assume the risk incident to the work. Michael v. Roanoke Machine Works, 90 Va. 492, 19 S. E. Rep. 261, 44 Am. St. Rep. 927.

Duty to Warn Servant Engaged in Engrossing Duties.—A servant has a right to assume, when placed in a situation of danger where engrossing duties are required of him, that the master will not, without proper warning, submit him to other perils unknown to him, and from which the work exacted necessarily distracts his attention. The failure of the master to so warn the servant is negligence for which he is liable in case injury results to the servant while thus engaged. Michael v. Roanoke Machine Works, 90 Va. 492, 19 S. E. Rep. 261, 44 Am. St. Rep. 927.

Warning of Danger Must Be Given in the Usual Manner.—Where it is the duty of the master to warn the servant, the servant has the right to expect that the warning shall come from the usual source and in the usual manner, and a warning given in an unusual manner and coming from an unusual and unexpected source will not charge him unless it is actually heard by him. Thus, where a servant, in the exercise of due care, received an injury by being struck by a rope, one end of which was attached to a car and the other to an engine, and which suddenly became taut by the application of steam, it appeared that a foreman, who was not a fellow servant with the injured servant, instead of waiting for the servant to receive the usual notification of the starting of the engine, himself called to the servant that the engine was about to start, and ordered the engineer to start the engine at once. It also appeared that owing to the confusion of starting and to the fact that the notice came from an unusual and unexpected source, it was unheard by the servant. It was held that the failure to give the servant the usual notice was negligence for which the company was liable. Richmond Granite Co. v. Bailey, 92 Va. 554, 24 S. E. Rep. 232.

Duty to Instruct.—The master must not only give the servant warning of danger, but he must also give him such instruction as will enable him to avoid injury, unless both the danger and means of avoiding it, while he is performing the service required, are apparent. But he is not bound to anticipate extraordinary, unusual or improbable occurrences which involve inattention on the part of the servant. Stewart v. Ohio River R. Co., 40 W. Va. 188, 20 S. E. Rep. 922; Daniel v. Chesapeake, etc.,

R. Co., 36 W. Va. 397, 15 S. E. Rep. 162, 32 Am. St. Rep. 870.

V. ASSUMPTION OF RISKS BY SERVANT.

1. RISKS ORDINARILY INCIDENT TO SERVICE.

General Rule.—A servant entering into the employment of a master assumes such risks as are ordinarily incident to the employment from causes open and obvious, the dangerous character of which he has had opportunity to observe, and he must exercise reasonable care and caution for his own safety while engaged in the master's service. McDonald v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 95 Va. 98, 27 S. E. Rep. 821; Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. Rep. 869; Turner v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 40 W. Va. 675, 23 S. E. Rep. 83; Michael v. Roanoke Machine Works, 90 Va. 492, 19 S. E. Rep. 261, 44 Am. St. Rep. 927; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Gilman, 88 Va. 239, 13 S. E. Rep. 475; Berns v. Gaston Gas Coal Co., 27 W. Va. 285; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Cottrell, 83 Va. 512, 3 S. E. Rep. 123; Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Lee, 84 Va. 642, 5 S. E. Rep. 579; Moon v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 78 Va. 745; Southwest Imp. Co. v. Andrew, 86 Va. 270, 9 S. E. Rep. 1015; Stewart v. Ohio River R. Co., 40 W. Va. 188, 20 S. E. Rep. 922; Robinson v. Dininny, 96 Va. 41, 30 S. E. Rep. 442; Hoffman v. Dickinson, 81 W. Va. 142, 6 S. E. Rep. 53; Daniel v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 36 W. Va. 397, 15 S. E. Rep. 162, 32 Am. St. Rep. 870; Robinson v. West Virginia, etc., R. Co., 40 W. Va. 583, 21 S. E. Rep. 727; Clark v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 78 Va. 709; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Risdon, 87 Va. 335, 12 S. E. Rep. 786; McVey v. St. Clair Co., 49 W. Va. 412, 38 S. E. Rep. 648; Seldomridge v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 46 W. Va. 569, 33 S. E. Rep. 298; Oliver v. Ohio River R. Co., 42 W. Va. 703, 26 S. E. Rep. 444; Moore Lime Co. v. Richardson, 95 Va. 326, 28 S. E. Rep. 334; Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. McKenzie, 81 Va. 71; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Nuckols, 91 Va. 207, 21 S. E. Rep. 342; Knight v. Cooper, 36 W. Va. 232, 14 S. E. Rep. 999; Davis v. Nuttallsburg Coal, etc., Co., 84 W. Va. 500, 12 S. E. Rep. 539; Richlands Iron Co. v. Elkins, 90 Va. 249, 17 S. E. Rep. 890; Skidmore v. West Virginia, etc., R. Co., 41 W. Va. 293, 23 S. E. Rep. 713; Riley v. Railway Co., 27 W. Va. 146; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Jackson, 85 Va. 489, 8 S. E. Rep. 370; Russell Creek Coal Co. v. Wells, 96 Va. 416, 31 S. E. Rep. 614; Wooddell v. Improvement Co., 38 W. Va. 23, 17 S. E. Rep. 386; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Brown, 91 Va. 668, 22 S. E. Rep. 496; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Tribble, 97 Va. 495, 24 S. E. Rep. 278.

In a recent case the court drew a distinction between the risks incident to the service and the risks ordinarily incident to it, saying that the servant assumes the latter but not the former. Moore Lime Co. v. Richardson, 95 Va. 326, 28 S. E. Rep. 334.

Risk of Negligence of Fellow Servants.—One of the risks assumed by the servant when entering into the service is the risk of danger arising from the negligence of his fellow servants. In other words, the master is exempt from liability to his servants for injuries arising from the negligence or default of their fellow servants. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. McKenzie, 81 Va. 71; Daniel v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 36 W. Va. 397, 15 S. E. Rep. 162, 32 Am. St. Rep. 870; Southwest Imp. Co. v. Smith, 85 Va. 306, 7 S. E. Rep. 365; McVey v. St. Clair Co., 49 W. Va. 412, 38 S. E. Rep. 648. See monographic note on "Fellow Servants."

Risks Outside Scope of Employment Not Assumed.—The servant assumes only such risks as are within or naturally incident to the service, and, if he is ordered to temporary work in another department of the master's business where the work is of such a different character that it cannot be said to be within the scope of the employment, he does not, by obeying such orders, necessarily assume the risk incident to the work. Michael v. Roanoke Machine Works, 90 Va. 492, 19 S. E. Rep. 261, 44 Am. St. Rep. 927; Shugart v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 2 Va. Dec. 146; Harris v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 2 Va. Dec. 248. See post, this note, "Contributory Negligence of Servant."

Application of Rule to Infant Servants.—The fact that the servant is an infant is immaterial if he has sufficient understanding to fully appreciate the nature and extent of the risk, and the master has not neglected to take due precaution to inform him of the dangers. The question as to the capacity of the servant to understand the nature of the risks taken, and the question whether the master neglected to take due precaution to inform him of the dangers, are questions of fact for the jury, as to which there need be no averment in the declaration. Southwest Imp. Co. v. Smith, 85 Va. 306, 7 S. E. Rep. 365; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Cottrell, 83 Va. 512, 3 S. E. Rep. 123.

2. PATENT AND OBVIOUS DEFECTS AND DANGERS.

a. GENERAL RULE.—As the law presumes notice of those perils which are open and obvious, and which the employee has the opportunity to ascertain, a servant, when he enters the service of the master, besides assuming all the risks ordinarily incident to the service, is also held to assume, as a general rule, all risks from causes which are known to him, or should be readily discernible by a person of his age and capacity in the exercise of ordinary care. Southern Ry. Co. v. Mauzy, 98 Va. 692, 37 S. E. Rep. 285; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Jackson, 85 Va. 489, 8 S. E. Rep. 370; Stewart v. Ohio River R. Co., 40 W. Va. 188, 20 S. E. Rep. 922; Reese v. Wheeling, etc., R. Co., 42 W. Va. 333, 26 S. E. Rep. 204; Sexton v. Turner, 89 Va. 341, 15 S. E. Rep. 862.

b. IN PLACE OF WORK.

General Rule.—A servant who knows the unsafe condition of the place in which he is working is not compelled to continue the work, but if he does continue it, without exercising ordinary prudence and care for his safety, he must be held to assume not only the risks ordinarily incident to the service when he entered upon it, but such as became known to him during the progress of the work, or which were readily discernible to a person of his age and capacity in the exercise of ordinary care. The servant is under as great obligation to provide for his own safety from such dangers as are known to him or are discernible by ordinary men on his part, as the master is to provide for him, and the negligence of the master does not excuse the servant for the failure to exercise such care, if such failure was the cause of the injury. Russell Creek Coal Co. v. Wells, 96 Va. 416, 31 S. E. Rep. 614; Berns v. Coal Co., 27 W. Va. 285; Robinson v. Dininny, 96 Va. 41, 30 S. E. Rep. 442.

Overhead Bridges and Tunnels.—A servant accepting service on a railway with knowledge of the character and position of structures from which he is liable to receive injury, cannot call upon his employer to make alterations to secure his greater safety, nor to respond in damages for injuries received from his want of care while passing under or through such structures. Thus where a bridge or tunnel through which a brakeman must pass is too low to permit his passage in safety while standing upright on the car, and he is warned of this fact at the time of or before entering into the service of the company, he cannot recover damages because of injuries inflicted upon him by such bridge or tunnel by his coming in contact with it while standing upright on the car. Williamson v. Newport News, etc., Co., 34 W. Va. 657, 12 S. E. Rep. 824. See also, Clark v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 78 Va. 709; Nelson v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 88 Va. 971, 14 S. E. Rep. 838; Haffner v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 96 Va. 528, 31 S. E. Rep. 899; Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Hafner, 90 Va. 621, 19 S. E. Rep. 166; Sheeler v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 81 Va. 188; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Marpole, 97 Va. 594, 34 S. E. Rep. 462. See ante, this note, "Contributory Negligence of Servant."

Dangers in Mining.—Where the plaintiff, a minor, was injured in performing work which he had sought because of the greater ease and profit incident to it, though knowing at the time that its performance was attended with extraordinary dangers, it was held that he had assumed these extraordinary risks at the time of accepting the work and the master was not liable for the injury. Knight v. Cooper, 36 W. Va. 232, 14 S. E. Rep. 999.

C. IN MACHINERY AND APPLIANCES.

The Rule Stated.—A servant cannot recover of the master damages for an injury resulting from defective machinery and appliances where the defect is open and obvious and known to the servant, and he with such knowledge continues to use such machinery and appliances for a long period of time without notice to the master or objections of any kind. Riverside Cotton Mills v. Green, 98 Va. 58, 34 S. E. Rep. 963; McDonald v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 95 Va. 98, 27 S. E. Rep. 821; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. McDonald, 88 Va. 352, 13 S. E. Rep. 706; Darracott v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 83 Va. 288, 2 S. E. Rep. 511; Hoffman v. Dickinson, 31 W. Va. 142, 6 S. E. Rep. 53; Seldomridge v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 46 W. Va. 569, 23 S. E. Rep. 293; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Jackson, 85 Va. 489, 8 S. E. Rep. 370.

But the servant does not assume the extraordinary risk arising from defective machinery unless he has knowledge thereof and then chooses to remain in the employment. Richlands Iron Co. v. Elkins, 90 Va. 249, 17 S. E. Rep. 890.

Dangers Must Be Such as Would Convince an Ordinary Man That an Accident Would Probably Ensnare.—While the general rule of law is that an employee, knowing of defects in machinery, appliances, or in his working place, and still continuing in service, assumes the risk, and cannot recover from his employer damages for injury arising from such defects, yet the rule is not without exception. Mere continuance in service with such knowledge is not sufficient to charge the servant with having assumed the risk. He need not stop in every instance of knowledge of a defect, but may run some risk by continuing service, provided the defects be not plainly dangerous, or be not such as ought to induce a prudent, careful man to believe that accident would likely ensue, and that, looking to his safety, he should not continue the work. Graham v. Newburg, etc., Coal Co., 38 W. Va. 273, 18 S. E. Rep. 584.

Brakeman Assumes Risk of Dangerous Couplings.—A brakeman, entering the service of a railroad company, assumes the risk of accident arising from the use of dangerous appliances which he knew to be in use by the company at the time when he accepted service. Thus where a brakeman, who had an opportunity to know the character of couplings used by the company by whom he was employed, was injured in coupling cars with the "three link couplings,"—a coupling the making of which is attended with more than ordinary danger,—it was held that the company was not liable. Darracott v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 83 Va. 288, 2 S. E. Rep. 511. See also, Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Cottrell, 88 Va. 512, 3 S. E. Rep. 123.

In an action against a railroad company to recover for the death of a brakeman, killed while attempting to couple cars with mismatched couplers, it appeared that on entering into the service of the company, the deceased had been informed that mismatched couplers were used by the company, and had been told of the danger in making couplings with them, and had been instructed how to make them safely; that he continued to use such couplers in the service of the company for nearly a year, making no remonstrance or complaint. It was held that he must be taken to have assumed the risk and the company was not responsible. McDonald v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 95 Va. 98, 27 S. E. Rep. 821, 8 Am. & Eng. R. Cas., N. S., 552; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. McDonald, 88 Va. 352, 13 S. E. Rep. 706.

d. IN METHODS OF WORK.—The servant assumes the risk or hazard of the business as the master conducts it, and if he knows the method of the service, and still remains in the service, he cannot recover, although there may be a safer way or method of doing the same business. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Briggs, 1 Va. Dec. 757; Improvement Co. v. Andrew, 86 Va. 270, 9 S. E. Rep. 1015; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Norment, 84 Va. 167, 4 S. E. Rep. 211. Thus in a case in which the method of doing the work was inhuman, and there was a safer and better way to do it, and it was folly in the servant to engage in it, yet as the danger was open and obvious, there could, it was held, be no recovery against the master for injuries to the servant. Robinson v. Dininny, 96 Va. 41, 30 S. E. Rep. 442; Skidmore v. West Virginia, etc., R. Co., 41 W. Va. 293, 23 S. E. Rep. 713; Oliver v. Ohio River R. Co., 42 W. Va. 708, 26 S. E. Rep. 444; Woodell v. West Virginia Imp. Co., 38 W. Va. 23, 17 S. E. Rep. 386.

3. LATENT DEFECTS AND DANGERS.

Unknown to Master.—Where the danger consists in a latent defect not apparent by the use of ordinary diligence on the part of the master, and the servant has the same chance of ascertaining the defect as the master, no liability attaches to the master for an injury to the servant resulting therefrom. Skidmore v. West Virginia, etc., R. Co., 41 W. Va. 293, 23 S. E. Rep. 713.

Known to Master.—But where there are latent defects and hazards incident to the occupation, of which the master knows or ought to know, it is his duty to warn the servants of them, and, failing to do so, he is liable to him for any injury that he may sustain in consequence of such neglect; and this rule applies even where the danger or hazard is patent, if, through youth, inexperience, or other cause, a servant is incompetent to fully understand and appreciate the nature of the hazard. Turner v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 40 W. Va. 675, 22 S. E. Rep. 83.

4. RISKS ARISING FROM MASTER'S NEGLIGENCE.—When the servant shows that his injury was in consequence of an increased risk, and one not ordinarily incident to his employment, but growing out of the master's negligence, the burden of proof is upon the master that the servant knew of and understood the increased danger. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Ward, 90 Va. 687, 19 S. E. Rep. 849.

5. REMAINING IN SERVICE UPON PROMISE TO REPAIR.

Express Promise to Repair.—Where the servant makes complaint of the defective appliance, and the master, in response thereto, promises to remedy the defect, the servant may continue in the employment for such time as is reasonably sufficient for the purpose of repairing, without thereby assuming the risk of injury, or waiving his right of action in case he is injured, except where the danger is so palpable, immediate, and constant that no one but a reckless person would expose himself to it, even after receiving such promise or assurance. Virginia, etc., Wheel Co. v. Chalkley, 98 Va. 62, 34 S. E. Rep. 976, 5 Va. Law Reg. 763, and note; McKelvey v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 35 W. Va. 500, 14 S. E. Rep. 261.

Where Servant Has Reasonable Grounds to Believe That Repairs Will Be Made.—And, if the servant, even though he knew of the existence of the defects at the time of entering into the employment, has reasonable grounds to believe that the master has cured or will immediately cure the same, he is not guilty of negligence in remaining in the service and may recover for the injury caused by such negligence of the master. Berns v. Gaston Gas Coal Co., 27 W. Va. 285.

VI. CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE OF SERVANT.

1. SERVANT MUST EXERCISE ORDINARY CARE.—That a person who, by his own default, has brought upon himself a loss or injury, can claim no compensation for it from another, is a principle of universal application. In the law of master and servant it is well settled that if the servant is injured, and his own negligence is the proximate cause of his injury, he cannot recover of the master, no matter how negligent the master may have been. The servant is bound to exercise reasonable or ordinary care to protect himself from dangers which are known or discernible to him, and negligence on the part of the master does not excuse the servant from failure to exercise such care. Russell Creek Coal Co. v. Wells, 96 Va. 416, 31 S. E. Rep. 614; McDonald v. Railroad Co., 95 Va. 106, 27 S. E. Rep. 821; Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. Rep. 869; Robinson v. Dininny, 96 Va. 41, 30 S. E. Rep. 442; Johnson v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 38 W. Va. 206, 18 S. E. Rep. 573; Seldomridge v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 46 W. Va. 569, 33 S. E. Rep. 293; Knight v. Cooper, 36 W. Va. 232, 14 S. E. Rep. 999; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Cromer, 99 Va. 763, 40 S. E. Rep. 54; Robinson v. West Virginia, etc., R. Co., 40 W. Va. 583, 21 S. E. Rep. 737; Darracott v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 88 Va. 288, 2 S. E. Rep. 511.

So where the injury is caused by the mutual fault of both parties, but it would not have happened except for the culpable negligence of the injured party, concurring with that of the other party, there can be no recovery of damages by the party injured, unless the injury could have been avoided after the defendant had notice of the negligence of the plaintiff, or was wanton or malicious. Eastburn v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 34 W. Va. 681, 12 S. E. Rep. 819; McCreery v. Ohio River R. Co., 49 W. Va. 301, 38 S. E. Rep. 534.

The servant, however, is only bound to exercise ordinary care; that is, he is only required to do that which a man of ordinary prudence would have done under like circumstances. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Ampey, 93 Va. 108, 25 S. E. Rep. 226.

Application of Rule to Infants.—Where an infant servant, who is properly chargeable with contributory negligence, by reason of his maturity and experience, is guilty of negligence which contributes to the injury received by him, the master is not responsible. McDaniel v. Lynchburg Cotton Mills Co., 99 Va. 146, 37 S. E. Rep. 781. An infant employee, however, has a right to rely upon the superior skill and knowledge of the foreman having authority over him, and if, in obedience to such foreman's direction, he runs into unknown dangers, against which it is the duty of the foreman to warn him, but which duty the foreman negligently fails to perform, he cannot be held to be guilty of contributory negligence or to have assumed the risk of such dangers. Turner v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 40 W. Va. 675, 23 S. E. Rep. 83.

2. RIGHT TO RELY ON ASSURANCES OF SAFETY.—Where a servant is told by the master that the machinery and appliances are in a safe and proper condition, the servant has the right to rely upon this assurance. Thus, in a case in which the servants, believing that the machinery was out of order and about to break, stopped work, and were assured by the master that there was no danger, and told to go ahead with the work, it was held that the master was liable. Hoffman v. Dickinson, 31 W. Va. 142, 6 S. E. Rep. 53. See also, Graham v. Newburg, etc., Coal Co., 38 W. Va. 273, 18 S. E. Rep. 584.

3. NEGLIGENCE MUST BE PROXIMATE CAUSE OF INJURY.

Plaintiff's Negligence Must Be Last Negligent Act.—If an injury has resulted from a certain wrongful act or omission, but only through or by means of some intervening cause, from which last cause the injury follows as a direct and immediate consequence, the law will refer the damages to the last or proximate cause, and refuse to trace it to that which is remote. Therefore in order for the negligence of the plaintiff to bar his recovery it must be shown that his was the last negligent act contributing to the injury. Schwartz v. Shull, 45 W. Va. 405, 31 S. E. Rep. 914; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Brown, 91 Va. 668, 22 S. E. Rep. 496; Cawley v. Winifrede R. Co., 31 W. Va. 116, 5 S. E. Rep. 318; Darracott v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 88 Va. 288, 2 S. E. Rep. 511; Sexton v. Turner, 89 Va. 341, 15 S. E. Rep. 862; McCreery v. Ohio River R. Co., 49 W. Va. 301, 38 S. E. Rep. 534; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Tribble, 97 Va. 495, 24 S. E. Rep. 278.

Hence though an employee of a railway corporation is not, at the time of the collision and of his injury thereby, at his post of duty, or at the place where the rules of the company require him to be, and his conduct contributes to the accident, yet if such conduct was not the direct, immediate, and proximate cause of the accident, and it could have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, which the company and its vice principal failed to exert, then it is answerable to the injured servant. Daniel v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 36 W. Va. 397, 15 S. E. Rep. 162, 33 Am. St. Rep. 870.

Negligence Must Contribute to but Need Not Be Sole Cause of Injury.—The negligence of the plaintiff, in order to bar his recovery, must contribute directly to the injury; but it is not essential to the defence of contributory negligence that the plaintiff's fault should have been, in any degree, the cause of the event by which he was injured. It is enough to defeat him, if the injury might have been avoided by his exercise of ordinary care. The question to be determined in every case is not whether the negligence caused but whether it contributed to the injury of which he complains. This it may do by exposing him to the risk of injury, quite as effectually as if he committed the very act which injured him. Neither is it necessary that the plaintiff's negligence should have contributed to the injury in any greater degree than the negligence of the defendant. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Cromer, 99 Va. 763, 40 S. E. Rep. 54.

Previous Negligence of Plaintiff Does Not Bar Recovery.—When at the time an injury is inflicted it might have been avoided by reasonable care on the part of the defendant, the plaintiff can recover damages notwithstanding his previous negligence. Virginia, etc., R. Co. v. White, 84 Va. 498, 10 Am. St. Rep. 874, 5 S. E. Rep. 573.

4. WORKING WITH KNOWLEDGE OF DEFECTS AND DANGERS.

The Rule.—Where the servant engages in a service with knowledge of defects existing in the instrumentalities of work, or where he willfully encounters other dangers which are known to him, or are notorious, the master is not responsible for any injury occasioned thereby. Hoffman v. Dickinson, 31 W. Va. 142, 6 S. E. Rep. 53; Turner v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 40 W. Va. 675, 22 S. E. Rep. 83; Stewart v. Ohio River R. Co., 40 W. Va. 188, 20 S. E. Rep. 922; Humphreys v. Newport News, etc., Co., 33 W. Va. 135, 10 S. E. Rep. 39; Seldomridge v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 46 W. Va. 509, 33 S. E. Rep. 293; Reese v. Wheeling, etc., R. Co., 42 W. Va. 333, 26 S. E. Rep. 304; Davis v. Nuttallsburg Coal, etc., Co., 34 W. Va. 500, 12 S. E. Rep. 539; Knight v. Cooper, 36 W. Va. 232, 14 S. E. Rep. 999; Richmond Granite Co. v. Bailey, 92 Va. 554, 24 S. E. Rep. 232; Piedmont, etc., Ill. Co. v. Patteson, 84 Va. 747, 6 S. E. Rep. 4; Southern, etc., Co. v. Clements, 98 Va. 1, 34 S. E. Rep. 951; Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Lash, 2 Va. Dec. 342; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Emmert, 83 Va. 640, 3 S. E. Rep. 145; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. McDonald, 88 Va. 352, 18 S. E. Rep. 706; Massie v. Peel Splint Coal Co., 41 W. Va. 620, 24 S. E. Rep. 644.

Application of Rule.

Low Bridges.—While, as seen above, it is negligence for a railroad company to operate its road with bridges so low as not to permit their employees to pass under them while standing upon the top of the cars, yet it is well settled that employees who have notice of the dangerous character of these bridges, must exercise reasonable care on their part to avoid injury, and a failure on their part to exercise ordinary care, resulting in an injury to them, is contributory negligence which bars a recovery. Thus where a brakeman, who had been warned of the dangerous character of low bridges on the road, and who had passed under them on several occasions during the daytime, was injured while standing on top of a freight car which passed under the bridge at night, it was held that there could be no recovery, as the plaintiff's negligence had contributed to his injury. Clark v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 78 Va. 709, 40 Am. Rep. 394. See also, Williamson v. Newport News, etc., Co., 34 W. Va. 657, 12 S. E. Rep. 824; Nelson v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 88 Va. 971, 14 S. E. Rep. 838; Haffner v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 96 Va. 523, 31 S. E. Rep. 899; Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Hafner, 90 Va. 631, 19 S. E. Rep. 166.

In Sheeler v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 81 Va. 188, 59 Am. Rep. 654, a fireman, without orders and in violation of the rules of the company, opened an ashpan, whereby fire was communicated to waste in a journal box. Then without orders or necessity he stood outside of the engine on the steps of the engine and tender, and endeavored to extinguish the fire with a hose, and while so employed was struck by the side of a bridge, the dangerous character of which was well known to him, and killed. It was held that the company was not liable.

The fact that the employee does not know of his exact locality or the proximity of the bridge, by reason of darkness, fog, or other natural or artificial causes incident to his employment, is immaterial. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Marpole, 97 Va. 594, 34 S. E. Rep. 462.

Using Improper Appliances without Warning Master.—A servant who knows that unsuitable appliances are being used to do the master's work, or that the appliances have not been properly adjusted, and also knows that his foreman or master is ignorant of the fact, is guilty of inexcusable negligence where he proceeds with the work without informing them thereof. Thus, where the plaintiff, an intelligent and experienced employee, who knowingly assisted in making an improper adjustment of appliances, when suitable appliances for the safe and proper adjustment had been furnished by the master and were in easy reach, and it was shown that he was further negligent in not warning the foreman of the dangerous character of the appliances, it was held that the company was not liable, for an injury received by the plaintiff while making the adjustment of the appliances by order of the foreman, who was ignorant of their defective condition. White v. Newport News, etc., R. Co., 95 Va. 355, 28 S. E. Rep. 577.

Defective Condition of Bumpers on Railroad Cars.—Where a servant, engaged in coupling cars, was injured by reason of the alleged defective condition of the bumper or drawhead, which he had recently used, and whose condition it was part of his duty to observe, it was held that he was negligent and could not recover. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Emmert, 83 Va. 640, 3 S. E. Rep. 145.

Coupling Cars of Unequal Heights.—Where a brakeman, knowing that cars were of unequal height and that crooked links were used to couple them, went in between a car that was approaching by his own signal, and a stationary car, and used a straight link to make the coupling, thereby allowing the bumper of the former to pass under the bumper of the latter, by which means he was caught between them and injured, it was held that the employer was not liable. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Emmert, 83 Va. 640, 3 S. E. Rep. 145.

Going between Cars to Couple Them Where Couplings Are Mismatched.—In Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. McDonald, 88 Va. 352, 18 S. E. Rep. 706, a brakeman knowing that the couplings were mismatched, placed a pin in a moving car, and remained between the two cars to shake the pin in position, when he might safely have made the coupling by placing the pin in the standing car, and letting it be shaken into position by the concussion. It was held that he was guilty of such negligence as barred a recovery against the company.

Using Rope Known to Be in Unsafe Condition.—In Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Sparrow, 98 Va. 630, 37 S. E. Rep. 302, the court, while conceding that the servant in this case lost his life by the use of a defective rope at a ferry, of which defect the master had notice, and which it was his duty to replace, held that as the servant had better knowledge of the condition of the rope than the master, and the defect being open and obvious, the contributory negligence on his part in continuing to use it barred his recovery.

Climbing a Telegraph Pole Known to Be Dangerous.—The plaintiff, an employee of a telephone company, was directed by the latter's foreman to climb a pole, which had been previously condemned and marked, as were all poles needing repairs. The plaintiff knew of the mark on the pole, but it appeared safe until he had cut the last wire, when it fell, causing the injury complained of. It was held that the question whether or not the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence was for the jury. Southern Bell Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Clements, 98 Va. 1, 34 S. E. Rep. 951.

Electric Wires Improperly Insulated.—In an action against an electric light company for killing a servant, it was proved that he was sent to look for a break in the circuit while the current was on, and took with him a defective shunt-cord. He found the break, and in trying to turn on the current, grasped the cord at the defective end, and, at the same time, put his other hand on the naked end of the live wire, whereby the current passed through and killed him. Had he grasped the wire above the exposed end he would not have been injured, notwithstanding the fact that the shunt-cord was defective in not being insulated throughout its entire length. It was held that the evidence failing to show negligence on the defendant's part unmixed with the servant's contributory negligence was not sufficient to sustain a verdict for the plaintiff. Piedmont, etc., Co. v. Patteson, 84 Va. 747, 6 S. E. Rep. 4.

Marks on Cars Insufficient to Charge Servant with Notice of Defects.—Chalk marks, meaning "out of order," placed on cars to inform the road from which they were received that the cars were out of order when received, and that the defendant company was, therefore, not liable for their repair, are not, as a matter of law, notice to a brakeman that the bumpers are defective, so as to prevent a recovery for his death caused by coupling the cars. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Lash, 2 Va. Dec. 342.

5. DISREGARD OF RULES.

General Rule.—Where the master has adopted reasonable rules for the conduct of his business, and has exercised due care in bringing them to the knowledge of the servant and seeing that they are properly enforced, he is not liable to a servant for an injury received in consequence of his disobedience of the rules, as disobedience under such circumstances amounts to contributory negligence on the part of the servant, and bars his recovery. But, in order for the servant's disobedience of the rules to amount to such contributory negligence as to bar his recovery, it is well settled that the breach of the rules must have been the proximate cause of the injury. Darracott v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 88 Va. 288, 2 S. E. Rep. 511, 5 Am. St. Rep. 266; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Pannill, 89 Va. 552, 16 S. E. Rep. 748; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Briggs, 1 Va. Dec. 757; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Dudley, 90 Va. 304, 18 S. E. Rep. 274; Shenandoah, etc., R. Co. v. Lucado, 86 Va. 390, 10 S. E. Rep. 422; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Lindamood, 1 Va. Dec. 748; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Donnelly, 88 Va. 853, 14 S. E. Rep. 692; Eastburn v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 34 W. Va. 681, 12 S. E. Rep. 819; Overby v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 37 W. Va. 524, 16 S. E. Rep. 813; Davis v. Nuttallsburg Coal, etc., Co., 34 W. Va. 500, 12 S. E. Rep. 539; Robinson v. West Virginia, etc., R. Co., 40 W. Va. 583, 21 S. E. Rep. 727; Norfolk, etc., R.

Co. v. Houchins, 95 Va. 308, 28 S. E. Rep. 578; Beall v. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co., 38 W. Va. 525, 18 S. E. Rep. 729; Johnson v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 38 W. Va. 206, 18 S. E. Rep. 578; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Marpole, 97 Va. 594, 34 S. E. Rep. 402; Sheeler v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 81 Va. 188, 59 Am. Rep. 654; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Tribble, 97 Va. 495, 24 S. E. Rep. 278.

Rule Where Compliance with Rules Impracticable.—But the general rule does not apply where the master is guilty of negligence, and the servant is ordered to perform work in regard to which rules have been promulgated by the master, and it is impracticable to comply with the rules, as in such case, the master is liable for an injury sustained by the servant while performing the service. Accordingly it has been held that a brakeman, injured through the negligence of the company while coupling cars under orders, has a right of action against the company, though the coupling is made by hand, contrary to the rules of the company, it being impracticable to use a stick as required by the rules. Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Rudd, 88 Va. 648, 14 S. E. Rep. 861.

Specific Instances of Violation of Rules.

Getting on and off Train While in Motion.—Where a rule of the railroad company forbade their servants from getting on and off trains when in motion, a servant who was injured while getting off a moving engine by tripping over wires which were exposed, failed in an action against the company. Overby v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 37 W. Va. 524, 16 S. E. Rep. 813.

And so where a section hand was killed in attempting to mount a passing engine, contrary to the rules of the company of which he had notice, it was held that the company was not liable; and it was immaterial whether or not his getting on the engine was objected to by those in charge of it. Shenandoah Valley R. Co. v. Lucado, 86 Va. 390, 10 S. E. Rep. 422.

Coupling Cars by Hand.—Where the rules of the company require couplings to be made with a stick when practicable, the company is not liable for injuries received by brakeman while making the coupling without a stick, if the stick can be used to advantage. Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Pannill, 89 Va. 552, 16 S. E. Rep. 748; Darracott v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 88 Va. 288, 2 S. E. Rep. 511; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Briggs, 1 Va. Dec. 757.

Coupling Cars While in Motion.—And where a brakeman is injured while violating a rule of the company which forbids the coupling of cars while in motion, he cannot recover. Johnson v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 38 W. Va. 206, 18 S. E. Rep. 578; Darracott v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 88 Va. 288, 2 S. E. Rep. 511.

Running Cars down Grade without an Engine.—Where, contrary to the rules of the company, a conductor allowed cars to be shifted and run down grade without an engine to control them, and while he was between the cars a brakeman, without objection from the conductor, caused another car to run down the same way, which, by reason of defective brakes, became unmanageable and ran into the first-named cars with such violence as to cause injury to the conductor, it was held that the conductor could not recover. Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Dudley, 90 Va. 304, 18 S. E. Rep. 274.

Failure to Report Defects in Appliances—Using Defective Appliances.—Where a rule of the company required brakemen to know for themselves that the brakes and appliances were in proper condition, and, in case they needed repairs, either to make the repairs themselves or report the defect to the proper parties, and a brakeman was injured while attempting to apply the brakes, knowing that a defect existed in them which he had not attempted to repair or report to the proper parties, it was held that the company was not liable for the injury, as the brakeman's negligence in disobeying the rules of the company contributed to his injury. Beall v. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co., 38 W. Va. 526, 18 S. E. Rep. 729.

Failure to Apply Brakes Where Train Separates.—Where the rules of a company provided that upon a train parting, the flagman should immediately apply the brakes and stop the cars, and the engineman should keep the front part of the train in motion until the detached portion was stopped, it appeared that after a train parted a distance of at least four or five miles was covered before the rear portion of the train, moving with its own momentum, overtook and collided with the front portion. It was held, in an action by a brakeman for injuries received in the collision, that the train being equipped with sufficient brakes to stop it, the proximate cause of the collision was the negligent failure of the plaintiff and his fellow servants to apply the brakes, and that therefore the company was not liable. Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Tribble, 97 Va. 495, 24 S. E. Rep. 278.

Failure to Inspect Cars Picked up in Transit.—Conductors who are required by the rules of the company to inspect all cars picked up in transit, cannot recover for injuries received by them by reason of failure to inspect such cars. Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Dudley, 90 Va. 304, 18 S. E. Rep. 274. See ante, this note, "Duty to Provide Rules for Conduct of Business."

6 DISREGARD OF WARNINGS OR SIGNALS.—Where a servant disregards warnings or signals, given by the master to prevent injury to the servant, the master is not responsible. Thus, in Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Williams, 89 Va. 165, 15 S. E. Rep. 522, the plaintiff, an engineman, started his train from a station and ran about seven hundred yards, attaining the speed of about twenty or twenty-five miles an hour, when he saw freight cars about forty yards ahead, which had been stored on the siding and had gotten loose and moved down on the main track. The freight cars had displaced the switch so as to expose the danger signal which the plaintiff might have seen, as well as the cars, in ample time, if he had exercised reasonable care. Besides, he was approaching a bridge in the course of construction at a forbidden rate of speed. It was held that he was not entitled to recover for injuries received by jumping from his engine.

7. VOLUNTARY ASSUMPTION OF DANGEROUS POSITION.

General Rule.—Where the servant suffers an injury which is due to his voluntary assumption of a position of danger, which is not necessary to the performance of the work in hand, this is such contributory negligence on his part as to bar his recovery. And a servant who is injured in consequence of attempting to do a harmless act at an obviously dangerous place, when he could have readily waited until he reached a place of safety, cannot recover therefor of the master. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Mann, 99 Va. 180, 27 S. E. Rep. 849; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. DeButts, 90 Va. 405, 18 S. E. Rep. 337; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Cottrell, 83 Va. 512, 3 S. E. Rep. 123; Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Lee, 84 Va. 443, 5 S. E. Rep. 579; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Graham, 96 Va. 430, 31 S. E. Rep. 604; Harris v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 2 Va. Dec. 248; Reese v. Wheeling, etc., R. Co., 42 W. Va. 333, 26 S. E. Rep. 204; Young v. West Virginia, etc., R. Co., 42 W. Va. 112, 24 S. E. Rep. 615; Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martiz, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. Rep. 869.

Applications of Rule.

Going under Car to Fix Brake.—Where a railroad employee went under a car to replace a brake, knowing that no one on the attached engine or elsewhere had been charged with any particular duty to look out and warn him of approaching danger, it was held that his failure to notify the engineer of going under the car was such negligence as to prevent his recovery for injuries received by the starting of the train, which was preceded by ringing the bell several times. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Graham, 96 Va. 430, 31 S. E. Rep. 604.

Riding on Truck.—In Reese v. Wheeling, etc., R. Co., 42 W. Va. 333, 26 S. E. Rep. 204, an employee of a railroad company who was being carried on a construction train from his work to his home, without any agreement or compensation therefor, voluntarily took a position standing on a small truck, which was being pushed forward by the engine, contrary to repeated warning of those in charge of the train as to the danger of so doing. It was held, in an action brought for an injury received while so riding, that, if riding in that position was the proximate cause of the injury, the railroad company was not responsible.

Assumption of Negligent Position in Making Coupling.—Where a brakeman, in attempting to withdraw the coupling pin and uncouple a car from the engine and tender, stood with one foot on the bumper of each car, and, with a lantern in his left hand, leaned forward, and reached with his right to withdraw the coupling pin, which had already been withdrawn by a fellow brakeman, and the cars separating caused him to fall between them, and to be run over and injured, it was held that he must be regarded as negligent, and his negligence must be considered the proximate cause of the injury. Young v. West Virginia, etc., R. Co., 42 W. Va. 112, 24 S. E. Rep. 615.

Going between Moving Cars to Make Coupling.—In Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Cottrell, 83 Va. 512, 3 S. E. Rep. 123, the plaintiff, a brakeman, seeing that cars were coming too fast for safe coupling signaled them to stop. He saw that they did not obey the signal, but when they were near him he stepped in to make the coupling, and was injured. It was held that when he saw that none of his signals had been obeyed that it was negligence in him to attempt to make a coupling, and the injury being an immediate result of his own act there could be no recovery.

Dangerous Position in Adjusting Brakes.—The plaintiff, a brakeman, while engaged in side tracking a flat car, the train having backed into the siding, cut the car loose and signaled the train to leave it. The car not clearing the main track he signaled the train to return and push it further, and after signaling, put one foot between the iron rails loaded on the car and the end of the car, and the other outside so as to set the brake. The train returning very fast struck the car and pushed the rails forward so as to crush his foot. It was held that the plaintiff's negligent acts were the proximate cause of the injury, and barred his recovery. Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. DeButts, 90 Va. 405, 18 S. E. Rep. 337.

8. ACTING IN OBEDIENCE TO ORDERS.

Does Not Amount to Negligence Unless Prudent Man Would Not Obey the Order.—Where the master orders a servant into a situation of danger, and he obeys, and is thereby injured, the law will not deny him a remedy against the master on the ground of contributory negligence, unless the danger was so glaring that no prudent man would have entered into it, even when, like the servant, he was not entirely free to choose. The same rule applies where the person injured is ordered into a service of peculiar danger, such as he did not undertake to perform, by another servant standing towards him in the relation of superior or vice principal and if he obeys such order and is injured he may recover damages; the law will not declare his act of obedience negligence per se, but will leave it to the jury to say whether he ought to obey or not. For instance, a laborer, who does not know of an unusual and increased danger known to his employer, but who goes into a ditch and digs it to twice its usual depth under peremptory orders from his master or vice principal, does not assume the risk of injuries received from a caving in of the sides of the ditch, and may recover from his negligent employer. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Ward, 90 Va. 687, 19 S. E. Rep. 849.

Using Defective Appliances under Orders.—As a general rule if the employee, without specific command as to time and manner, uses an obviously defective implement, the defect alike open to the observation and within the comprehension of both employer and employee, both stand upon common ground, and no recovery can be had for the resulting injury to either; but when the servant acts under the order of his master, and is injured, the rule is different, for then it cannot be said, with any degree of reason, that the master and servant stand on equal footing, even though they may have equal knowledge of the danger. The servant occupies a position of subordination and may rely upon the skill and knowledge of his master, and is not free to act on his own suspicions. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Ward, 90 Va. 687, 19 S. E. Rep. 849.

Using Dangerous Machinery under Orders upon Agreement by Master to Use Extraordinary Care.—Where a servant, in obedience to the requirement of the master, incurs the risks of machinery which is dangerous, but it is reasonably probable that danger may be avoided if extraordinary care and skill be used, and the servant uses such care and skill as the exigencies of the situation seem reasonable to demand and yet injury results, the master is liable. Thus in Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Ampey, 93 Va. 108, 25 S. E. Rep. 226, the plaintiff, a brakeman, after making several attempts to couple cars with a stick, as required by rules of the company, informed the conductor that owing to the defective condition of the couplers he was unable to make the coupling with a stick. He was then ordered by the conductor to couple the cars with his hand. The plaintiff replied that the coupling could be made by hand without danger if the train was moved back slowly and with great care. The plaintiff returned to make the coupling with his hand, and was injured by reason of the train coming back with its usual speed, in response to the ordinary signal by the conductor, instead of coming back slowly and gently as the brakeman had stipulated should be done. The company was held liable. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Ampey, 93 Va. 108, 25 S. E. Rep. 226.

9. ACTING IN DISOBEDIENCE OF ORDERS.

Bars Right of Action for Injuries.—A servant cannot recover if his injury was received as the direct result of his own disobedience of orders. Knight v. Cooper, 36 W. Va. 232, 14 S. E. Rep. 999; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Risdon, 87 Va. 335, 12 S. E. Rep. 786;

Robinson v. West Virginia, etc., R. Co., 40 W. Va. 583, 21 S. E. Rep. 727. See also, Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Williams, 89 Va. 165, 15 S. E. Rep. 522.

Engineer Running Train on Curve at Forbidden Rate of Speed.—So where an engineer running his train on a curve at a rate of speed prohibited by the company, was killed by the engine leaving the track, it was held that the company was not liable for the injury; and the question whether or not the company had used due care in constructing the curve—due care in such case requiring the outer track to be higher than the inner—was immaterial. Robinson v. West Virginia, etc., R. Co., 40 W. Va. 583, 21 S. E. Rep. 727.

Disobedience of Orders in Coupling Cars.—In an action by a brakeman to recover for personal injuries it was proven that on the night of the accident, the yardmaster ordered him to uncouple cars, which were standing still, and then ride them back on a switch, but, instead of obeying orders, he signaled the engineer to back, and stepping between the moving cars to couple them, he got his foot caught in the frog and was run over and killed. The proximate cause of the injury, it was held, was the servant's disobedience of the orders, which was contributory negligence precluding a recovery. Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Risdon, 87 Va. 335, 12 S. E. Rep. 786.

10. ASSUMING EXTRAORDINARY RISKS TO SAVE LIFE.—When one risks his life or places himself in a position of danger in an effort to save the life of another, or to protect another who is exposed to a sudden peril, or in danger of great bodily harm, such risk for such a purpose is not negligence; but the question whether the person is in such a position of danger as to bring the case within this principle is for the jury. Johnson v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 86 Va. 975, 11 S. E. Rep. 829.

11. ACTING IN EMERGENCIES.

General Rule.—In judging of the care exercised by the plaintiff, reasonable allowance is always made for the circumstances of the case; and if the plaintiff is suddenly put into peril, without having sufficient time to consider all the circumstances, he is excusable for omitting some precautions, or making an unwise choice, under this disturbing influence, although, if his mind had been clear, he ought to have done otherwise, especially if his peril is caused by the defendant's fault. If one is placed by the negligence of another in such a position that he is compelled to choose instantly, in the face of a grave and apparent peril, between two hazards, and he makes such a choice as a person of ordinary prudence, placed in such a position, might make, the fact that, if he had chosen the other hazard, he would have escaped injury, is of no importance. Haney v. Pittsburg, etc., R. Co., 38 W. Va. 570, 18 S. E. Rep. 748; S. W. Imp. Co. v. Smith, 85 Va. 306, 7 S. E. Rep. 365; Dingee v. Unrue, 98 Va. 247, 35 S. E. Rep. 794; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Brown, 89 Va. 749, 17 S. E. Rep. 132.

Loss of Presence of Mind through Negligence of Master.—Where the servant loses his presence of mind because placed in sudden imminent peril by the negligence of the master, the master is liable though the servant fails to avail himself of any means of escape. But this rule is not applicable of course in a case where the servant is ordered to leave the place in which he is working before he is confronted with the peril and disobeys the order, when by obeying the same by reasonable promptitude he might have escaped the injury. Dingee v. Unrue, 98 Va.

Signal to Apply Brakes Not Sufficient to Render Brakeman Irresponsible.—The mere signal to put on brakes when approaching an over-head bridge which is very low does not constitute such an emergency as to render a brakeman irresponsible for his acts. Haffner v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 96 Va. 528, 31 S. E. Rep. 899.

12. ACTING OUTSIDE SCOPE OF EMPLOYMENT.—Where a servant receives an injury while performing work which is not within the regular scope of his employment, though it is in the supposed furtherance of his master's business, the master is not liable in damages. Thus where a fireman was killed while attempting to couple cars, it was held that in order to recover, it was necessary for the plaintiff to show that his intestate, in acting thus out of the scope of his employment, was doing so by the command of a superior; and that a failure to show this affirmatively was sufficient to defeat a recovery. Shugart v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 2 Va. Dec. 146. See also, Harris v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 2 Va. Dec. 248; Michael v. Roanoke Machine Works, 90 Va. 492, 19 S. E. Rep. 261. See ante, this note, "Assumption of Risks by Servant."

VII. DAMAGES RECOVERABLE BY SERVANT FOR INJURIES.

Elements of Damages.—The expenses of the plaintiff's cure, the value of his time lost during his cure, and a fair compensation for his physical and mental suffering caused by the injury, are elements of damage for which compensation must be made as well as for any permanent reduction of his power to earn money. Riley v. Railway Co., 27 W. Va. 146. That, in an action to recover damages for personal injuries, the jury may take into consideration the mental anguish, as well as the physical pain, resulting from such injuries is well settled. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Marpole, 97 Va. 594, 34 S. E. Rep. 462, and Southern Bell Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Clements, 98 Va. 1, 34 S. E. Rep. 51.

Punitive Damages against Corporations.—The rule laid down by the federal courts is that a corporation is not liable in punitive damages for injuries committed by its servants, merely because the servant's illegal conduct was wanton and oppressive; but in order to recover punitive damages in such cases it is necessary to show that the company had knowledge that the servant was incompetent, or that the company participated in, approved, or ratified his act. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Prentice, 147 U. S. 101. The state courts, on the other hand, maintain the doctrine that a corporation, like a natural person, is liable in punitive damages for the malicious and wanton wrongs of its servants done in the course of their employment. Spellman v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 28 Am. St. Rep. 858, and note.

Though the question has not been squarely presented in Virginia the leaning of the court seems to favor the rule of the federal courts. Thus in Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Neely, 91 Va. 539, 22 S. E. Rep. 367, the court said that an instruction that punitive damages might be recovered if the servant's act was wanton and oppressive, and if the company, after knowledge thereof, participated in or ratified it, expressly or by implication, correctly propounded an abstract principle of law, but that there was no evidence upon which to base such an instruction—the wrong complained of being the result of an innocent mistake. And in Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Anderson, 90

Va. 1, 17 S. E. Rep. 757, a railroad company was held liable in punitive damages to a passenger, wrongfully ejected by the conductor, but on the ground that the company subsequently ratified the conductor's act. See also, dictum in Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Lipscomb, 90 Va. 137, 17 S. E. Rep. 809, adopting the federal court rule.

In a West Virginia case it was said that. "The better and more reasonable doctrine seems to be, that a railway company is not to be held liable in exemplary damages for injuries caused by the negligence of its servants, unless it be shown that the servant's act was willful, and was either authorized or ratified by the company; but such authorization or ratification can be evidenced either by an express order to do the act, or an express approval of its commission, or by an antecedent retention of a servant of known incompetency, or by a subsequent retention or promotion of the negligent servant." Downey v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 28 W. Va. 732; Ricketts v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 33 W. Va. 433, 10 S. E. Rep. 801, 25 Am. St. Rep. 901.

VIII. EVIDENCE IN ACTIONS BY SERVANT AGAINST MASTER.

Evidence of Subsequent Repairs to Appliances.—In an action by a servant for personal injuries arising from the master's negligence in the maintenance of suitable machinery, evidence that subsequently to the injury the master made repairs upon the alleged defective appliance is not admissible to prove its defective condition. Virginia, etc., Wheel Co. v. Chalkley, 98 Va. 62, 34 S. E. Rep. 976, 5 Va. Law Reg. 763, and note.

Evidence of Incompetency of Servants.—Where a declaration avers that one of the acts of negligence of an employer resulting in injury to the servant was the employment and retention in service of an incompetent foreman, evidence of such incompetency is admissible. Dingee v. Unrue, 98 Va. 247, 35 S. E. Rep. 794.

A master's knowledge of the incompetency of a servant may be established by showing either actual knowledge, or such frequent acts of incompetency on the part of the servant that the law will presume knowledge. Meyers v. Falk, 99 Va. 385, 38 S. E. Rep. 178.

Servants as Witnesses.—A servant is a competent witness to prove that the master exercised a degree of care required of him by law, but the jury, in considering the weight to be given to the evidence of such witnesses may consider the question as to whether they were or were not influenced by the relation which exists between them and the master. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Poole (Va.), 40 S. E. Rep. 627.

In an action by a servant for personal injuries, it is error to allow other employees to testify what they did after the time of the injury and their reasons therefor. Richmond Locomotive Works v. Ford, 94 Va. 627, 27 S. E. Rep. 509.

Evidence to Show That Defendant Used as Much Care as Other Employers.—In an action by a servant against a railroad company for injuries received through the negligence of the company, evidence tending to show that the defendant conducted its road as well as other railroads are conducted is inadmissible. Riley v. Railway Co., 27 W. Va. 146.

IX. BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. OF NEGLIGENCE OF MASTER.—The burden of proving negligence, in an action by the servant for damages for personal injuries, is upon the servant; and, in addition to negligence, it is encumbent upon him to show that the negligence complained of was the proximate cause of the injury. The mere fact of injury received raises no presumption of negligence on the part of the master. Massie v. Peel Splint Coal Co., 41 W. Va. 620, 24 S. E. Rep. 644; Stewart v. Ohio River R. Co., 40 W. Va. 188, 20 S. E. Rep. 922; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Brown, 91 Va. 668, 22 S. E. Rep. 496; Ketterman v. Dry Fork R. Co., 48 W. Va. 606, 37 S. E. Rep. 683; Dingee v. Unrue, 98 Va. 247, 35 S. E. Rep. 794; Knight v. Cooper, 36 W. Va. 232, 14 S. E. Rep. 999; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Cromer, 99 Va. 763, 40 S. E. Rep. 54.

From the mere fact that an injury results to a servant from a latent defect in the machinery or appliances of the business, no presumption of negligence on the master's part arises. But there must be evidence of negligence connecting him with the injury. The servant takes upon himself the burden of showing that the master had notice of the defect complained of, or that in the exercise of that ordinary care which he is bound to observe, he would have known it, and that the servant was ignorant of such defect, and had not equal means of knowledge. Johnson v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 36 W. Va. 73, 14 S. E. Rep. 432; Hoffman v. Dickinson, 31 W. Va. 142, 6 S. E. Rep. 53; Humphreys v. Newport News, etc., Co., 33 W. Va. 135, 10 S. E. Rep. 39; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Poole (Va.), 40 S. E. Rep. 627.

2. OF CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE OF SERVANT.—In an action for damages occasioned by the negligence or misconduct of the defendant, it is not necessary for the plaintiff to allege and prove the exercise of due care on his part to entitle him to recover. If the defendant relies upon contributory negligence of the plaintiff to defeat the action, he must prove it, unless, indeed, the fact is discovered by the evidence of the plaintiff, or may be fairly inferred from all the circumstances. South-west Imp. Co. v. Andrew, 86 Va. 270, 9 S. E. Rep. 1015; Comer v. Consol. Coal, etc., Co., 34 W. Va. 533, 12 S. E. Rep. 476; Flannegan v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 40 W. Va. 436, 21 S. E. Rep. 1028; Riley v. Railroad Company, 27 W. Va. 146; Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. McKenzie, 81 Va. 78.

X. DISCHARGE OF SERVANT.

Master May Discharge Servant if He Does Not Possess Reasonable Skill.—A master may discharge the servant if he does not do the work he was employed to do in a reasonably skillful manner. But reasonable skill is all that is required, unless the servant professes a higher degree of skill, and contracts to perform the work in the best manner. Crescent Horse-Shoe Co. v. Eynon, 95 Va. 151, 27 S. E. Rep. 935.

Master May Discharge Where Servant Cannot Perform Work Engaged to Do.—In every case of a contract of employment where the parties know each other, and the purpose of each other, at the time of entering into it, and the terms of the contract are not to the contrary, the servant only engages to perform such service as he can perform. If a person engages to do service which he cannot perform his incompetence is cause for discharge. Rhoades v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 49 W. Va. 494, 39 S. E. Rep. 209.

Breach of Contract by Servant is Good Ground of Discharge.—So where the servant breaks his contract with the master this is sufficient ground for his discharge. The law only requires that there should be an actual breach of the express or implied conditions of the contract in order to justify the discharge, and, if such cause in fact exist, the master may avail himself of such breach in an action brought against him for damages resulting from the alleged wrongful dismissal. Crescent Horse-Shoe Co. v. Eynon, 95 Va. 151, 27 S. E. Rep. 935.

Discharge Justified if Sufficient Grounds Exist.—Where a sufficient cause exists for the discharge of the servant, though not the inducing motive for the discharge, nor even known to the master, it will justify the discharge, and the master may avail himself of it in defense of an action for damages for an alleged wrongful dismissal, but an instruction to that effect should not be given when all existing causes were known to the master at the time of the discharge, as the instruction is then without evidence to support it. Crescent Horse-Shoe Co. v. Eynon, 95 Va. 151, 27 S. E. Rep. 935.

Insufficient Grounds of Discharge.—On the other hand, a servant may recover if he is discharged without sufficient cause regardless of the motive which induced the master to discharge him. Crescent Horse-Shoe Co. v. Eynon, 95 Va. 151, 27 S. E. Rep. 935.

Question Whether Servant Was Discharged or Voluntarily Gave up Employment is for the Jury.—The question whether a servant was discharged by the master or voluntarily abandoned the service without sufficient cause, is for the jury. And if there is evidence tending to establish either of these, and an instruction is asked which correctly propounds the law on such view, it is error to refuse it. Goldsmith v. Latz, 96 Va. 680, 32 S. E. Rep. 483.

Damages for Wrongful Discharge.—Where the servant sues for damages for breach of the contract of service, the jury cannot take into consideration other elements of damages than those which were caused by the dismissal. Crescent Horse-Shoe Co. v. Eynon, 95 Va. 151, 27 S. E. Rep. 935; Willoughby v. Thomas, 24 Gratt. 521.

Where, in an action of trespass on the case by the servant against the master for a wrongful discharge, the declaration makes no averment of malice or of special damage beyond loss of employment and wages, evidence of special damage to the character of the servant by reason of the discharge, is irrelevant and inadmissible. Lee v. Hill, 84 Va. 919, 6 S. E. Rep. 473.

Same—Where the Servant Releases Claims against Master in Consideration of the Employment.—Where the servant releases his claim for damages for injuries in consideration of agreement by the master to furnish employment in the future, and the servant is discharged without cause, he may treat the contract as absolutely broken by the master, and in an action thereon recover the full value of the contract to him at the time of the breach, including all that he would have received in the future as well as in the past, if the contract had been kept, less any sum he may have earned already, or might thereafter earn in other service, as well as the amount of any loss the defendant sustained by the loss of his service without the master's fault. Rhoades v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 49 W. Va. 494, 39 S. E. Rep. 209.

Burden of Proving Grounds of Discharge.—Where the master agrees to employ the servant in consideration of his releasing a claim for personal injuries, and the servant is discharged by the master, in an action by the servant to recover damages for the breach of his contract the burden of proof is upon the master to show that there was good ground for the discharge. Rhoades v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 40 W. Va. 494, 39 S. E. Rep. 209.

August 1842, Lewisburg.

(Absent ALLEN and BALDWIN, J.*)

Mortgages—Deed Absolute on Face Deemed a Mortgage.†—Where a deed for land is absolute on its face, and, at the time it is made, a written agreement is entered into by the parties, shewing that the object of the deed is to secure to the grantee money, and indemnify him against liabilities, such deed is only a mortgage, and the right of redemption by the mortgagor is incident to it.

Same—Same—Vendee of Land—Rescission.—The grantee in a deed for land, which is absolute on its face, but in truth a mortgage, having conveyed the land to a purchaser from him for valuable consideration, without notice of the equity; and the purchaser, upon obtaining knowledge of it, having filed a bill against his vendor for a rescission of the contract, in which suit the mortgagor is a party, and unites in the prayer for rescission; HELD, such rescission will be decreed, unless there be some other party who has a right to object.

Same—Same—Assignee of Purchase Money;—Onus Probandi.—The grantee in a deed for land, which is

*The former had been consulted by the appellee Strider. The latter was counsel for the appellee Auld.

†Deed of Trust Considered a Mortgage.—In Spencer v. Lee, 19 W. Va. 192, it is said: "The death of the cestui que trust and the qualification of the trustee as his executor rendered it improper for him to sell. He could no longer act with that impartial disinterestedness required of a trustee. He had become a party himself. He had ceased to be a trustee and had become a mortgagee with the right of redemption in the mortgagor or his heir. In Chowning v. Cox, 1 Rand. 306, it was held, 'where a conveyance of real estate is made to a creditor in trust to satisfy his own debt, such conveyance is not to be considered as a deed of trust but as a mortgage, to which the right of redemption is incident.' Vide also Taylor's Adm'r v. Chowning, 8 Leigh 654; Breckenridge v. Auld, 1 Rob. 154; Floyd v. Harrison, 2 Rob. 178, 183, 185, 188; 2 Min. Inst. 290."

The principal case is cited in this connection in Floyd v. Harrison, 2 Rob. 183, 190.

See monographic note on "Mortgages" appended Forkner v. Stuart, 6 Gratt. 197; and monographic note on "Deeds" appended to Flott v. Com., 12 Gratt. 504.

Deeds of Trust—Outstanding Title—Duty of Trustee.—It was held in Rossett v. Fisher, 11 Gratt. 492, that where real estate is conveyed in trust to secure debts, and the grantor in the deed has at the time but an equitable title, but is entitled to have the legal title, it is an abuse of his power by the trustee to sell the property before getting the legal title. The court said, at page 502: "Whatever might have been the rights of a bona fide purchaser without notice at such a sale, as to which I express no opinion, I think that the creditor being the purchaser under the circumstances before stated, the debtor has lost none of his rights by the sale, but is entitled to have it set aside and the property resold, if necessary, for the purposes of the trust. See Gibson v. Jones, 5 Leigh 370; Breckenridge v. Auld, 1 Rob. 148; Dabney v. Green, 4 H. & M. 101; Lord Cranmouth v. Johnston, 3 Ves. Jr. R. 170."

‡Assignments—Consideration.—In Hopkins v. Richardson, 9 Gratt. 492, the court said: "It is doubtless absolute on its face, but in truth a mortgage, having sold the land, and taken from the purchaser bonds for the purchase money, and a deed of trust to secure the same, and having then transferred the bonds to one who claims to be the assignee thereof for valuable consideration, but appears to have taken the assignment under circumstances calculated to throw strong suspicion on the transaction; HELD, it is incumbent on the assignee to prove that the assignment was for value.

Costs;—Appellate Court—Coappellées—Apportionment.—The court of appeals reversing a decree, and there being three appellees, one of whom gets by the decision here what was sought by his bill and denied by the court below, and another of whom prevails here to the same extent that he prevailed in the court below, decreed that the third appellee pay to the appellant his costs.

On the 17th of August 1826, James W. Breckenridge and Eliza his wife, of the county of Prince George in the state of Maryland, made a deed to Colin Auld of the county of Alexandria in the district of Columbia, *which stated on the face thereof, that Breckenridge and wife, for the consideration of 20,000 dollars, conveyed to Auld three pieces of land in the county of Mason in the state of Virginia, forming part of a tract called Graham's station.

On the same day, a memorandum was signed by Breckenridge and Auld, stating, that although that conveyance was made, it was understood that Auld was to account to Breckenridge for whatever the land might ultimately produce, after deducting any claims which Auld might have against Breckenridge, or against the estate of Bailey E. Clarke deceased, of which Breckenridge and his wife were executors, or whatever loss or damage might arise to Auld in consequence of his undertaking for Breckenridge and obligation to Abraham Clarke.

The conveyance was admitted to record in the county court of Mason (without the memorandum) on the 18th of September 1826, upon the certificates of two justices of the peace, of the acknowledgment of Breckenridge, and the acknowledgment and privy examination of his wife.

About three years after the conveyance, Auld advertised the land for sale. His advertisement appeared in some of the papers of the district of Columbia. And Breckenridge was at the time in the district, and knew of the advertisement.

On the 1st of September 1831, Auld made a correct, as argued by the counsel for the defendant in error, that the assignment of a chose in action not assignable at common law, does not make the assignor liable without a valuable consideration for the assignment; and that the assignment being in writing does not necessarily import that it was for a valuable consideration. Hall v. Smith, 3 Munf. 550; Wood v. Duval, 9 Leigh 6; Breckenridge v. Auld, 1 Rob. R. 148."

See monographic note on "Assignments" appended to Ragsdale v. Hagy, 9 Gratt. 409.

deed to Henry Strider, of the county of Jefferson in Virginia, whereby he conveyed to Strider two parcels of the Graham's station tract (being all that remained unsold by Auld) for the consideration of 10,000 dollars. On the same day, Strider made a deed of trust to Richard H. Claggett, reciting his purchase from Auld; stating that he had executed to Auld the following bonds, to wit, five bonds for 1000 dollars each, payable on the first day of April 1832, 1833, 1834, 1835 and 1836 150 respectively, *two bonds for 2000 dollars each, payable on the first day of April 1837, and 1838 respectively, and one bond for 1000 dollars, payable on the first day of April 1839; and conveying to Claggett in trust, to secure the payment of the said bonds, the same property which had been conveyed by Auld to Strider. Both of these deeds were admitted to record; the deed to Strider on the 20th of September 1831, and his deed of trust on the 15th of November 1831.

Previously to the conveyance from Auld to Strider, Auld had been discharged from the liabilities against which the deed from Breckenridge and wife was intended to indemnify him, and Breckenridge had demanded a reconveyance of the land, on the allegation that there was no indebtedness from him to Auld. But Strider had not, at the date of his purchase, any knowledge of the secret equity of Breckenridge, or of any adversary claim whatever. Auld had held the land for years, and was in the actual possession thereof, claiming to be the owner, and exercising acts of ownership. And Strider contracted with Auld in the belief that he was the true and sole owner. Strider broke up his establishment in Jefferson county, removed to his new purchase, took possession of the land, and held it for nearly three years, before he heard of the claims of Breckenridge. During this time, he put upon the land valuable and permanent improvements. But he had paid no part of his purchase money, when he first received notice of Breckenridge's claims.

Before this notice was received by Strider, the matters in controversy between Auld and Breckenridge had, in March 1833, been submitted to arbitration. The adjustment was found to be one of great difficulty, requiring long and laborious investigation. The arbitrators had various meetings, and did not make up their award until the 29th of January 1834; when they adjudged that Auld should convey the land to Breckenridge.
151 and *that the latter should, on receiving the conveyance, pay to the former the sum of 3347 dollars 31 cents, which they found due to him.

About the time of this award, an assignment was made by Auld to John Ramsay, of the bonds executed by Strider to Auld. Strider was informed of the assignment by a letter from Auld bearing date the 30th of January 1834, and by a letter from Ramsay bearing date the 3d of February 1834.

In July 1834, Strider filed a bill in the circuit court of Mason, setting forth the nature of Breckenridge's title; stating, that he (Strider) considered his contract with Auld a beneficial one, but that he regarded the title of Breckenridge as superior to that which he had acquired; and concluding with a prayer for a rescission of the contract between himself and Auld. To this bill, Breckenridge, Auld and Ramsay were made defendants: and they all answered.

The rescission of the contract between Strider and Auld promoted the object of Breckenridge, who by a cross bill, as well as by his answer to the original bill, sought a decree compelling the other parties to convey the land to him. Such rescission was, however, objected to by Ramsay, who claimed to be the assignee for valuable consideration, of the bonds executed by Strider to Auld.

It was expressly charged in the bill, that the assignment was made without consideration; and though the charge was denied by both Auld and Ramsay, neither of them exhibited any satisfactory proof of the consideration. All that was shewn was, that Auld had given bond in the office of the register of wills for Alexandria county, as guardian of John Ramsay and four other orphan children of John Ramsay deceased, in the penalty of 80,000 dollars. Whether any settlement of Auld's accounts as guardian had ever taken place, or what was the amount of his indebtedness, or whether he was 152 *indebted at all, nowhere appeared.

Yet Ramsay stated, that the motive which induced him to take the assignment, was his desire to get from Auld's hands the debt due from Auld on account of his father's estate.

Both Auld and Ramsay alleged that the assignment was made on the first of January 1834. But there was no proof to support this allegation. Neither of them alleged that any step was taken to inform Strider of the assignment until after the award. It appeared by the depositions of the arbitrators, that although Strider was no party to the submission, yet the sale to him was a subject investigated by them. They were satisfied that the land was worth much more than it was sold for to Strider; that it was worth 13,000 dollars. And this induced them to provide in the award, that in case Auld should not restore the land to Breckenridge at the time prescribed by them, then he should pay to Breckenridge, in lieu thereof, the sum of 13,000 dollars, subject to a deduction of the before mentioned sum of 3347 dollars 31 cents.

Pending the cause, a judgment was obtained by Ramsay on one of Strider's bonds, and an injunction was awarded to restrain Ramsay from proceeding on that judgment, and on the other bonds.

The circuit court of Mason, by two decrees of the 23d of January and 19th of April 1839, decreed, 1st.

That Strider be quieted in his title and possession of the land, subject to the deed of trust executed by him to secure the payment of the purchase money. 2. That the injunction be dissolved as to the judgment, and as to so much of the bonds first becoming due, as, with the judgment, would amount to 3347 dollars 31 cents with interest thereon from the 1st of January 1834, deducting therefrom the costs incurred by Breckenridge in the prosecution of his cross bill, which Auld was decreed to pay. 3. That Ramsay should file with the clerk the residue of the 153 bonds, and that Strider pay the *same to Breckenridge, without any damages by reason of the injunction.

On the petition of Breckenridge, an appeal was allowed him.

The cause was argued in August 1841, by the attorney general for the appellant, by Peyton for Ramsay, and by Cook for Strider. The argument not being concluded before the term ended, written notes of argument were delivered to the judges in vacation, by Baldwin for the appellee Auld, and Johnson for the appellant. It is unnecessary to report the argument in detail.

The question of law mainly discussed was, whether, notwithstanding the sale made by Auld of the land conveyed to him by the deed of the 17th August 1826, Breckenridge retained, as between Auld and himself, a right of redemption? The counsel for the appellees endeavored to distinguish the case from that of Chowning v. Cox &c., 1 Rand. 306. But supposing the cases not to be distinguishable in principle, they said that Chowning v. Cox &c. had been decided without reference to the late decisions in England, or to those in New York, and was clearly inconsistent with them. Those decisions, they contended, have established the proposition that a power of sale given to a mortgagee, in default of payment, by way of substitute for the decree of foreclosure, may be exercised by the mortgagee so as to bar the equity of redemption. They referred to 2 Rob. Pract. 61. 2 Story's Eq. 295, § 1027. and note. 4 Kent's Comm. 146. 1 Sugden on Vendors 157, 8.—where the doctrine and cases are stated.

CABELL, P. The deed from Breckenridge to Auld for Graham's station, executed on the 17th of August 1826, although absolute on its face, was in fact nothing more than a mortgage; for the written agreement entered into by the parties on the same day, 154 gives the *true character of the deed, by shewing that its sole object was to secure to Auld any moneys which Breckenridge then owed him, or might thereafter owe him, and to indemnify him against certain liabilities to which he was exposed on his account.

The deed being only a mortgage, the right of redemption by Breckenridge was incident to it; and Auld could not, by the mere authority derived from the deed, and without resort to a court of equity, sell the land so as to bar the rights of Breckenridge. Chowning v. Cox &c., 1 Rand. 306. The sale of the land by Auld to Strider, by the deed of the first of September 1831, was therefore, as between Auld and Breckenridge, a mere nullity; especially when we consider that Breckenridge had previously discharged him from the liabilities against which the deed was mainly intended as an indemnity, and had demanded a reconveyance of the land, on the allegation that there was no indebtedness from him to Auld. A sale of the land under such circumstances, and without disclosing to Strider, the vendee, the pretensions of Breckenridge, was doubly fraudulent. If, therefore, there were no other parties to this controversy but Auld and Breckenridge, it is manifest that Breckenridge would be entitled to his land, on his paying to Auld the money which he owed him.

But there is a third party to the controversy. Strider has obtained the legal title to the land; and although that title was fraudulently conveyed to him by Auld, yet Strider did not participate in the fraud. He saw Auld in the actual possession of the land, which he had held for many years, claiming to be the owner thereof, and exercising all the acts of ownership, under an absolute deed in fee simple from Breckenridge, spread upon the records of the courts of the county where the land lay. Auld had even advertised the land for sale in the public newspapers published at no great distance from the residence 155 of the parties, without remonstrance *or opposition on the part of Breckenridge. It is not pretended that Strider, at the date of his purchase, had any knowledge of the secret equity of Breckenridge, or of any adversary claim whatever. On the contrary, he had good reason to regard Auld as the true and sole owner; and he contracted with him in the belief that he was so; he received his conveyance, gave his bonds for the purchase money, broke up his old establishment, removed to his new purchase, took possession of the land, and held it for nearly three years, before he heard of the claims of Breckenridge; during which time, he put upon the land valuable and permanent improvements. It is true that he had paid no part of his purchase money, before the time when he received notice of Breckenridge's claims; and it was strongly contended in the argument, that this circumstance is sufficient to deprive him of the right to insist on the benefit of his purchase. I do not think it necessary to decide this point in this case; for if, in consequence of this notice, Strider had no right to insist on his purchase, then there would be nothing to prevent the court from deciding the cause as to Breckenridge and Auld, upon the principles of equity applicable to them. And if, on the contrary, he had a right, notwithstanding this notice, to insist on his purchase, it is very clear that he had the right to waive or abandon the purchase, provided his doing so would not impair or injure the rights of others. He might pursue this course, even if his right to insist on his purchase were clear and undoubted; much more might he do so, if it were attended with doubt and uncertainty. He has filed his bill, stating what he considers the superior title of Breckenridge, and praying the rescission of the contract, although he thinks that contract was a beneficial one. Who is to object to this course? Not Breckenridge; for it is that which he desires, and to which he claims to be 156 entitled. Not Auld; for his interest is *not affected by it; and if it were, the fraud of which he has been guilty must close his mouth against any such objections. If, therefore, Breckenridge, Auld and Strider were the only parties to this controversy, the claims of Breckenridge must prevail.

But there is yet a fourth party, Ramsay, whose pretensions remain to be examined. He claims to be the assignee, for valuable consideration, of the bonds executed by Strider to Auld for the purchase money of the land in controversy. To make this claim available, he must not only allege, but he must prove, that he was an assignee for value; for, as the bonds were invalid and worthless in the hands of Auld, they will be equally so in the hands of his assignee without value. And it may also be added, that even if full value were paid for them, they will be unavailable in the hands of Ramsay, if he had notice of the claims of Breckenridge.

It is certain that these bonds were assigned to Ramsay under circumstances calculated to throw strong suspicion on the transaction.

The matters in controversy between Auld and Breckenridge had been submitted to arbitration, as far back as March 1833. The adjustment was found to be one of great difficulty, requiring long and laborious investigation. The arbitrators had various meetings from time to time, and did not make up their award until the 29th of January 1834, when they adjudged that Auld should convey the land to Breckenridge, and that the latter should, on receiving the conveyance, pay to the former the sum of 3347 dollars 31 cents, which they found due to him. Both Auld and Ramsay say that the assignment of the bonds was made on the first of January 1834. But there is no proof to support the allegation. They do not pretend that any step was taken to inform Strider of the transfer of his bonds, until after the award; Auld's letter, which gives the information, bearing date on 157 the 30th of January, and Ramsay's *on the 3d of February. If the assignment was in fact made on the 1st of January, this delay in making so important a communication would manifest a degree of negligence and imprudence which we are unprepared, by any thing in the record, to attribute to Mr. Auld; whilst the almost simultaneous communication by both Auld and Ramsay, so immediately after the award, excites a strong suspicion that the assignment itself followed the award, and was induced by a knowledge of its contents; and consequently, that Ramsay had notice of the claims of Breckenridge. This suspicion becomes still stronger, by the notoriety which the record shews was given to the subjects investigated by the arbitrators; one of which was the sale of the land to Strider, although he was no party to the submission. Besides, it seems almost inconceivable that any man should take an assignment of bonds for such an amount, and payable at such remote periods, without an enquiry into the consideration for which they were originally given; especially where the parties to the transaction occupied towards each other the intimate relations existing between Auld and Ramsay. But be this as it may, the conduct of Auld in assigning these bonds, at any time, while his right to them was involved in the questions then pending before the arbitrators, was grossly fraudulent; and as it is expressly charged in the bill that the assignment was made without consideration, it was incumbent on Ramsay to adduce satisfactory proof of the consideration, if any. No such proof is exhibited. We have nothing but his own assertion and that of Auld, added to the fact that Auld had qualified as the guardian of Ramsay and his four sisters, and had given a bond as guardian of them all, in the penalty of 80,000 dollars. But whether any settlement of his accounts had ever taken place, or what was the amount of his indebtedness, or whether he was indebted at all, nowhere appears.

158 *Nothing is more improbable than the story told by Ramsay, as to the motive which induced him to take the assignment of these bonds. He says it was his desire to get from Auld's hands the debt due from him on account of his father's estate. Then why not get it directly from Auld himself, who lived in his immediate neighborhood, and who is not alleged to be insolvent, or even in embarrassed circumstances? Why take bonds on a stranger, living hundreds of miles from him? And above all, why take, in discharge of a present debt which he wished to collect, bonds, some of which had to run four years before they came to maturity? Upon the whole, I am of opinion that he has shewn no title to the bonds as against Strider or Breckenridge, and that his pretensions to enforce the collection thereof are without any just foundation.

The other judges concurred with the president in the following decree:

The court is of opinion that the sale by Auld to Strider of the land in controversy be rescinded, and that Strider do surrender to Breckenridge the full possession of the said land, with all its appurtenances, on or before the first day of January next; and that in the mean time he do permit him, his servants &c to have free ingress and egress into and from the said land, for the purpose of seeding the usual fall crops. That an account be taken of the rents and profits of the said land while in the possession of the said Strider, and also of the permanent improvements put thereon by him, until the present time; distinguishing those permanent improvements made before, and those made since, the institution of the suit by Strider. That Strider do pay to Breckenridge the amount of the said rents and profits, subject, however, to a credit for so much of the value of all the said improvements, as may not exceed the 159 amount of all the rents and profits; but that Breckenridge *shall not be liable for any excess of the value of the improvements above the amount of all the rents and profits, unless the value of the improvements put upon the land before the institution of the suit, shall exceed the amount of all the rents and profits during the whole time that Strider has held the said land; in which case he shall be chargeable with such excess, as a lien on the said land. That the injunction restraining Ramsay from enforcing his judgment at law, and from enforcing the collection of the bonds executed by Strider to

Auld, and by him assigned to Ramsay, be perpetuated; and that Ramsay surrender the said bonds to Strider, to be cancelled.

But although Ramsay has shewn no cause, as between him and Breckenridge and Strider, to enforce the collection of the bonds assigned to him by Auld, yet as Auld admits that the said bonds were assigned by him for valuable and full consideration, the court is of opinion that that admission gives to Ramsay a just claim against Auld, and intitles Ramsay to receive from Breckenridge the sum of 3347 dollars 31 cents, found due from Breckenridge to Auld by the award of the arbitrators in the proceedings mentioned, with interest thereon from the first day of January in the year of 1835; and that the said sum, with interest as aforesaid, is chargeable as a lien on the said lands herein before directed to be surrendered to the said Breckenridge: that Breckenridge be directed to pay to Ramsay the said sum of 3347 dollars 31 cents with interest as aforesaid, on or before the expiration of sixty days from and after the time when he shall receive possession of the land as aforesaid; and that in default of said payment, the said land shall be sold, in whole or in part, as may be deemed most expedient, to pay such portion or part of the said sum of money and interest as aforesaid, as may remain unpaid, and the costs of the sale,—on a 160 credit of nine months for *one third part thereof, of twelve months for another third part, and of eighteen months for the residue.

It is therefore adjudged, ordered and decreed, that the decrees be reversed, with costs to the appellant Breckenridge, to be paid by the executor of Auld out of assets of his testator in his hands to be administered, if so much thereof he hath; the other appellees not being subjected to costs in this court, because the appellee Strider gets by the decree of this court a rescission of the contract of purchase, which he sought in the court below, and which was denied by the decree of that court; and because the appellee Ramsay prevails in this court, to the extent that he prevailed in the court below. And the cause is remanded to the circuit court, to be further proceeded in according to the principles before declared.

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Laches—Case at Bar.—Upon a bill in equity to charge property which has passed into the hands of third persons without notice of the complainant's claim, the court being called upon to investigate transactions which occurred thirty years before the institution of the suit, and, from the lapse of time and the obscurity of the transactions, it being impossible to arrive at the truth of the case, HELD, the bill ought to be dismissed.

son entitled to have an assignment of a title bond and the possession of property upon paying a certain sum, transfers his right, and his assignee pays that sum, and assigns his right to another, who obtains title to the property according to the bond; after which the person first mentioned files a bill, alleging that his transfer was in consideration of money which has never been paid him, and claiming that the lien of a vendor for purchase money exists in his favour, upon the property in the hands of the subsequent holders, who purchased, as he alleges, with notice. HELD, no such lien exists.

This case was stated by Allen, J., at the time of delivering his opinion, to be as follows:

In the year 1792, Stephen Jett, the owner of the equitable title to certain lots in the town of Christiansburg, Montgomery county, (the legal title to which was to pass through the trustees of the town, and was then outstanding in the original patentee or his representatives,) executed to William and Gilbert Christian his title bond, by which he bound himself to make or cause to be made to them a conveyance for three fourths of two lots, as soon as the trustees could make a title to the original purchasers, and also bound himself to deliver possession to the Christians, within a few weeks. Though Gilbert Christian was mentioned as a joint purchaser with William, it seems to have been determined in a subsequent controversy, that William was entitled to the 162 whole benefit *of the contract. William Christian appears to have obtained possession of the property, and leased it to one Bratton. On the first of November 1794, whilst the property was held by the tenant of Christian, articles of agreement were entered into between Christian and Booth, by which Christian sold the property to Booth for £250. to be paid in property at a future day, and bound himself to give security, upon the payment of the purchase money, for the making of a conveyance as soon as a title could be procured from the trustees. The agreement further provided that Booth should get possession as soon as Bratton's lease expired, and be entitled to any rent which might be due from Bratton at the end of his term. This contract was not complied with. Booth did not deliver the property to be paid, by the day agreed on, and Christian did not give security for the title. Some payments were made, and on the 9th of April 1795, another arrangement was entered into between the parties. By this it was agreed, that upon full payment of the balance of the purchase money, or immediately afterwards, Christian should assign to Booth the title bond of Jett; but Booth was not to have possession until a lease to one Miller (probably a purchaser from Bratton) had terminated. And upon Christian's compliance with his agreement, he was to be exonerated from all further responsibility.

At this stage of the transaction, Booth was not entitled to possession of the lost, or to a conveyance for them, or even to the equitable right held under Jett. The possession was held by the tenant of Christian, and until Booth paid Christian the balance of the purchase money, he had no right to call for an assignment of the title bond. His interest consisted of an executory contract, which authorized him, upon the payment of the purchase money, to demand a transfer of a title bond. He never did pay the balance of the purchase money; the bond was not assigned to 163 him, nor did he acquire *possession of the lots. The extent of his interest was never enlarged.

Whilst his claim remained in this condition, on the 25th of March 1797, he sold it to Isaac Rentfro, and bound himself to give up to Rentfro all the bonds and receipts relative thereto, and to make him all the right he had received or should receive by virtue of his purchase from Christian, for a sum to be adjudged by certain persons named. On the same day, Rentfro, by a distinct article (which recites that he had purchased of Booth the lots which Booth bought of Christian, the price of which was to be ascertained by valuers) bound himself to pay the sum to be ascertained as aforesaid, after deducting what might be due to Christian, in good land in Tennessee, by the 29th of December next ensuing the date of the contract. Rentfro never got possession of the property: it was still held by Bratton or Miller, under the lease. On the 17th day of April 1797, Rentfro sold his interest in the subject to John and Roswell Johnston, and bound himself to give them possession as soon as it could be obtained from Bratton, and to make them such right as the holders of the legal title should make to other purchasers, or give them Jett's title bond for such right. The Johnstons paid the purchase money agreed to be paid by them to Rentfro, obtained possession of the lots, and, on the 17th of July 1802, procured from Jett an order on the trustees for a deed. After continuing in possession several years, they sold to Page, the present owner, who afterwards obtained a deed from the trustees; having previously been in possession, and paid to the Johnstons the whole of the purchase money. He has held possession ever since.

The lots seem never to have been valued under the contract between Booth and Rentfro; at least there is no evidence of such valuation in this record. Booth, however, went to Tennessee to get the land which Rentfro was to pay; from 164 which it may be inferred that *some valuation was made, or that the parties had agreed on a price; since it would have been useless to go for the land, until the price of the lots had been ascertained. Why the land was not paid, does not distinctly appear, nor is it material to enquire. It is certain, from the admissions of all parties, that no land was paid. Rentfro, in his answer to a bill filed by one Glenn, asserting a claim under Gilbert Christian to a moiety of the property, says that the contract was changed; that instead of the Tennessee lands, he conveyed to Christian 100 acres of land in Montgomery county, in discharge of some claim which Christian held on Booth; and there still being a balance due from him to Booth, the latter directed him to pay it over to Christian, which he did. This answer, filed in another case, is no evidence of the facts set out in it; but it serves to explain the testimony of William Christian, who says he received from Rentfro 100 acres of land and 40 dollars in money, for Booth. Another witness, John Gardner (one of the trustees) says, that Rentfro insisted he had paid for the lots, and Booth that he had not. And one of the subscribing witnesses states, he has every reason to believe that Rentfro did pay, as he was not to get possession until he paid; that possession was transferred to the Johnstons, his vendees, at his request, and the witness never heard any thing else than that he had paid. Rentfro seems to have been a man in good circumstances, and in 1798 he sold his property, or a portion of it, and removed to Kentucky, where he died in good circumstances in 1817. Booth was a poor man, and he absconded from his creditors and removed to Kanawha county, where he died in 1801, leaving a widow (who died about four months after him) and several children, the eldest about 12 years, the youngest 13 months old. In 1827, administration on Booth's estate was granted by the county court of Montgomery; and in the 165 month of August 1827, *the administrator filed this bill, alleging that the purchase money was never paid by Rentfro; that the subsequent holders were purchasers with notice; and that the property in their hands was subject to the vendor's lien for the purchase money.

The cause came on to be heard before the circuit court of Montgomery, the 26th day of May 1836, on the bill, the answers of Page and of John and Roswell Johnston, an order of publication against Rentfro's heirs, which appeared to have been duly executed, the depositions of witnesses, and the exhibits. Whereupon the court was of opinion, that Page was not a purchaser without notice, and therefore that the lots in his possession were liable for the purchase money and interest, due from Rentfro to Booth's administrator; and the price of the said lots at the time of the sale by Booth to Rentfro, not having been fixed and ascertained by the persons to whom it was referred, and they having since died or removed, the court decreed that a commissioner take an account, ascertaining and stating the value of the said lots at the time of the sale thereof by Booth to Rentfro, and how much of the purchase money, if any, had been paid, and the balance due, with interest thereon from the 25th of December 1797.

From this decree an appeal was allowed, on the petition of Page and John and Roswell Johnston.

The cause was argued by Preston and C. Johnston for the appellants, and by M'Comas and the attorney general for the appellees.

ALLEN, J. The first objection which presents itself is the staleness of the demand, and the impossibility of doing justice at this distance of time. The court is called upon to investigate, by the dim lights furnished by this record, transactions which occurred thirty years 166 *before the institution of this suit.

The cases on this subject are fully reviewed and commented on in Carr's adm'r &c. v. Chapman's legatees, 5 Leigh 164, and Hayes & al. v. Goode & al., 7 Leigh 452. The presumption of satisfaction is not the only consideration which operates on the court in refusing to entertain such a bill. In Hercy v. Dinwoody, 2 Ves. jun. 87, it was contended that the case was not open to the presumption of satisfaction, because, the matter being in suit, the defendants could not discharge themselves by a payment or settlement in pais. The master of the rolls admitted this, but said—"For the reasons given in Deloraine v. Brown, 3 Bro. C. C. 633, independent of the question of satisfaction, but on account of the very neglect, and the mischief and disturbance that may arise to families," (and I may add, to subsequent purchasers,) "though the presumption of satisfaction is not so strong, yet the laches and neglect may make it a matter of public policy that the party guilty of it shall abide the consequence." Here the property has passed into the hands of third persons, who have paid their purchase money; and whatever may have been the fact, there is certainly no proof that they had actual notice of this claim when the deed was procured from the trustees. The aid of a court of equity is now invoked against them, at a time when the truth is no longer attainable. Was there ever a valuation? From Booth's trip to Tennessee to receive the land, the inference is strong that there had been: but we have no evidence of it. Was the contract changed, as Rentfro alleges? The evidence of Christian, that he received from Rentfro 100 acres of land and 40 dollars, for Booth, would seem to shew that it had been. But what that contract was, and whether it had been complied with (as Rentfro, according to the testimony of Gardner, asserted, though Booth denied it,) we know not, and, from the proofs in the record, cannot ascertain.

167 dark, and no advance *can be made without the hazard of injustice. It may be the misfortune of those asserting this claim, that such obscurity involves the transaction. But even if they were exempt from the imputation of laches, it would not be the province of a court of equity to relieve them at the risque of doing injustice to fair purchasers. Booth however, if his claim was a valid one, had ample opportunities to assert it during his lifetime. He failed to do so; permitted his vendee to remove from the country full-handed, though his own embarrassments should have urged him to enforce his claim, if in truth it had not been adjusted; and he himself subsequently absconded from his creditors, without giving them (so far as we see) any intimation of his claim as a means of satisfying their demands. Under these circumstances, he could not be exempted from the imputation of culpable neglect. I think that on this ground alone,—the impossibility, from the lapse of time and the obscurity of the transactions, of arriving at the truth of the case, the court should have dismissed the bill.

I am equally satisfied that if the claim had been asserted in proper time, the vendor's lien did not attach. What did Booth dispose of? Not the property: to that he had no claim. Under his contract of the 9th of April 1795, he might have become entitled to an assignment on Jett's title bond, and to the possession of the property, upon the payment of the balance of the purchase money to Christian. But he never paid that balance; it was not paid until the contract was made with Rentfro; and upon its being paid by Rentfro, Christian assigned to his vendees, the Johnstons. Suppose, upon the payment of this balance by Rentfro, Christian had refused to surrender or as in Jett's title bond; what would have been the remedy? Rentfro could have sued at law for the breach of contract in failing to assign the title bond: he had his election to adopt that course, and it would have been out of Booth's 168 power to control him. What *then becomes of the supposed lien for purchase money? It will not be pretended that it would attach on the personal subject. The contract transferred a right of action, and nothing more.

It has been contended, in argument, that there was an express contract for the lien, and that this is proved by the statement of Taylor, in the suit of Glenn against Christian. To that suit Booth was no party. The record would be no evidence against him, and cannot be used for him. But even if the statement were evidence, it proves no such contract. That is inferred from the fact that the papers were deposited with Taylor. But that deposit, I feel satisfied, had reference alone to the transactions between Christian and Booth. They had attempted to settle and ascertain the balance due. By the agreement of the 9th of April 1795, Christian was not to assign until he was paid; and the papers were no doubt deposited with a view to the delivery when he should be paid. And accordingly, when Rentfro did pay the balance, Christian transferred his interest held under Jett's title bond, to Rentfro's vendees.

I think the decree should be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

The other judges concurred on both grounds. Decree therefore reversed, and bill dismissed.

Principal and Surety—Who Is a Cosurety Entitled to Contribution.‡—A joint and several single bill being executed in the country by a principal and seven sureties, to enable the principal to borrow money from a bank, and the principal, upon coming to town, finding that the rules of the bank require a town surety, application is made by him to a citizen to become such surety. This citizen having adopted a rule not to put his name on bank paper for any person, but being willing to accommodate the principal, applies to a friend to become bound on the paper, with an assurance that if the principal does not pay it off when it becomes due, he will pay it off for him. Under this assurance, that friend puts his name on the paper as a co-obligor with the other sureties, without their knowledge. And thereupon the paper is discounted by the bank. The principal makes default when the bill becomes due, and soon afterwards the citizen pays it off. HELD by two judges (BROOKE and STANARD) that the citizen is to be considered one of the eight sureties, having become such in the name of his friend, and that he is entitled to contribution from all except that friend: dissentiente CABELL, P.

In the interval between the commencement of the suit and the amendment of the bill, the absent defendant returned to the commonwealth, and conveyed the land to a purchaser for valuable consideration. HELD, no lien is created upon the land in the hands of the purchaser by these proceedings; not by the proceedings in the name of the nominal surety, because, no payment having been made by him, no decree could be rendered in his favour; and not by the proceedings in the name of the surety who paid, because the conveyance to the purchaser was before those proceedings.

This suit was commenced in the superior court of chancery formerly holden at 170 Clarksburg. The subpoena *was issued the 23d of July 1822, returnable to August rules; at which time the bill was filed in the name of William Vause. It set forth, that Jacob Heiskell of Harrison county was indebted to the Northwestern bank of Virginia in the sum of 600 dollars, and by the request of Heiskell the following persons, to wit, Jedediah W. Goff, David Newton, John Davisson, Christian Geigley, William Lake junior, Jacob Coplin, Absalom Robinson and the complainant, became the sureties of Heiskell for the payment of the debt at the end of 60 days, and joined him in executing a joint and several single bill for such payment: that payment not being made by any of the other obligors, and the complainant being called on by the officers of the bank, he, to save his credit, and to save himself from a suit, was forced to pay and did pay to the bank the said sum of 600 dollars, with a further sum of 19 dollars 20 cents for interest chargeable thereon: that Heiskell and Newton are insolvent, and Robertson resides without the commonwealth, and has no moneys, credits or personal property within the same, but is seized of a tract of land in the county of Harrison, which ought to be made liable for his share of the debt. Heiskell and the cosureties with the complainant were made defendants. And the prayer was, that such of them as were able might be compelled to pay their proportions, by dividing the loss arising from the insolvency of the others; and for general relief.

There was no endorsement on the subpoena explaining the object of the suit. Affidavit being made, at August rules 1822, of the nonresidence of Robinson, an order of publication was then entered, requiring him to appear on the first day of the following term; which order was duly published. And Robinson failing to appear at October term 1822, an order was then entered, stating that the court would proceed to take such proof in support of the bill as the plaintiff should offer.

171 *The other defendants answered the bill. Heiskell admitted that he executed the obligation, and received the amount from the bank; but he did not admit that the complainant paid the debt, and he called for proof thereof. He stated that he (Heiskell) had paid into the bank, on account of the obligation, 400 dollars, for which he ought to have credit. Goff, Geigley, and Coplin admitted the execution of the obligation, and that they were sureties therein, but stated that they did not know whether the same had been paid or not. Newton, Davisson and Lake admitted the execution by them of the obligation, but called for proof that the complainant had paid the same.

The obligation was filed as an exhibit with the bill, with an endorsement thereon in these words: "N. W. Bank of Virg'a. Received the amount of the within bond from Noah Zane, Heiskell having failed to pay it. T. Woods cash'r."

On the 25th of October 1823, leave was given the plaintiff to amend his bill. An amended bill was filed in the names of William Vause and Noah Zane, stating Zane to be admitted a party complainant in the cause, and setting forth, that when the obligation became payable to the bank, Zane, who had agreed with Vause to stand in his shoes and situation in all respects as regarded said obligation, paid the full amount thereof to the bank, so as to prevent a suit thereon. And the complainants prayed that the money might be refunded to them for the benefit of Zane. Whether this amended bill was filed soon after the 25th of October 1823, or not until after the order of the 18th of May 1826, herein after mentioned, did not clearly appear from the transcript of the record sent to the court of appeals. It was copied immediately after the order of the 25th of October 1823. And yet, according to the entry of the 22d of May 1826, it would seem to have been filed at that time.

172 *On the 19th of October 1824, an order was entered, stating, that on the motion of Benjamin Stout, and by consent of parties, he was made a party defendant in the cause. And on the 22d of the same month, on the motion of the plaintiff, he had leave to amend his bill for the purpose of making Stout a party. At February rules 1825, Stout filed his answer, stating, that he had purchased from Robinson the tract of land in the bill mentioned; that at the time of his purchase, he had no knowledge of the alleged liability of Robinson, as the surety for Heiskell, to the plaintiff; and that, being a purchaser for valuable consideration, and having paid the purchase money, he conceives he ought not to be disturbed in his purchase. He alleges that Heiskell procured Zane to make the payment for him, and contends that if the principal debtor, without the knowledge or consent of the sureties, has procured a third person to make payment, such third person cannot, either by an agreement with one surety, or by any other means, charge the other sureties, but the obligation is as to them extinguished. The fact he states to be, "that the complainant Vause has merely lent his name to the said Zane, in order to prosecute a suit by which it shall appear that the money was paid by a cosurety; and that any recovery that can be obtained is to be for the exclusive benefit of the said Zane."

According to the record sent to the court of appeals, an entry was made on the 18th of May 1826, on motion of the plaintiff, giving him leave to amend his bill by making Zane a party plaintiff; and another entry was made the 22d of May 1826, of the filing of such amended bill. By agreement of the parties, the answers previously filed were received as answers to the amended bill; and the following facts were also agreed:

"Isaac Heiskell wished to borrow money from the Wheeling bank. By the 173 rule of the bank, an indorser *in Wheeling was required from their borrowers. Heiskell applied to Noah Zane to become such indorser. Zane, having adopted as a rule for his government in relation to the bank, not to become indorser for any person, but being willing to accommodate Heiskell, applied to the plaintiff Vause to become such indorser, with an assurance to the said Vause, that if the said Heiskell did not pay off the said note when it arrived at maturity, he Zane would pay it off for him. Under this assurance by Zane, Vause indorsed the note, and it was discounted by the bank. When the note became due, Heiskell failed to pay it off, and thereupon Zane paid it off. The foregoing arrangements were made without the knowledge or agreement of the other sureties."

The note mentioned in this agreement of facts was the joint and several single bill before mentioned. Before the application to Zane, it had been executed by Heiskell and seven sureties as co-obligors, payable to the Northwestern bank. Vause became an additional obligor.

The cause coming on to be heard the 25th of October 1828, the chancellor was of opinion that the plaintiff Zane had, by an original arrangement with the plaintiff Vause, who executed the single bill at his request, bound himself, if Heiskell did not pay off the same, to pay it for him; and that Zane was invested with all the liability, and all the rights and indemnities, of Vause: and it being admitted that Heiskell was insolvent, and the death of Goff being suggested, the court decreed that the plaintiffs recover of each of the defendants Newton, Davisson, Geigley, Lake, Coplin and Robinson, the sum of 75 dollars with interest from the 21st of March 1822 until payment, and that the defendants pay to the plaintiffs their costs. And there being no personal fund of Robinson within the power or jurisdiction of the court, 174 commissioners were appointed *to go upon the land mentioned in the bill as the property of Robinson, and now in the tenure of Stout, and value and appraise the same. And the cause was continued, with leave to the plaintiff Zane, in case any one or more of the defendants against whom the decree was rendered should prove to be insolvent, to apply to the court by petition for further contribution against such as should be solvent.

The commissioners valued the tract of land, which was said to contain 480 acres, at 7 dollars per acre, making the total value of the tract 3360 dollars. Under the reservation in the decree, Zane filed a petition, setting forth, that executions had issued upon the decree, under which Geigley, Lake and Coplin had taken the oath of insolvency, and Newton and Davisson had been returned no inhabitants of the commonwealth; that previous to the decree, however, the last two named defendants had taken the oath of insolvency in other cases; and that Goff had, in his lifetime, taken the oath of insolvency, and died insolvent. The petition therefore prayed a decree against Robinson for one half the amount decreed against the other sureties, and that the land be decreed to be sold for the same. The facts stated in the petition were proved by depositions and exhibits.

Stout filed a petition for a rehearing of the decree, for reasons set forth in a cross bill.

By the cross bill, and the evidence in support thereof, it appeared, that there were suits in equity against Robinson as an absent defendant, to subject the land, prior to that of Vause; that Robinson returned to Virginia, and requested Stout to become his surety, to enable him to appear and defend those suits; that Stout became such surety, upon Robinson's making a deed of trust on the land to indemnify and save him harmless on account of his suretyship, and also to secure a debt which Robinson owed him; that afterwards Stout 175 agreed to pay the said *creditors of Robinson, other than Vause and Zane; and that Robinson, in consideration thereof, and of the previous debt which he owed Stout, conveyed the land absolutely to Stout. This conveyance bore date the 26th of February 1823, and was admitted to record in the office of Harrison county court on the same day.

The cause was farther heard before the circuit court of Harrison county on the 17th of May 1832. The court denied the petition for a rehearing, and decreed against Robinson the further sum asked by Zane's petition; and there being no personal fund in the power of the court belonging to Robinson, and bond with security being filed by the complainant Zane, conditioned according to law, the court thereupon decreed a sale of the land.

On the petition of Stout, an appeal was allowed. Among the errors assigned in the petition, were the following:

1. That no privity existing between Zane and the cosureties, the payment by Zane ought to be regarded as having been made for Heiskell, and his recourse should be against Heiskell alone, and not against the sureties, who were discharged by the payment.

2. That the proceedings of Vause created no lien upon the land in favour of Zane, the introduction of whom into the cause placed him upon the same footing merely as if he had then brought an original suit, after a dismissal of the one improperly instituted by Vause.

G. N. Johnson for the appellant. Neither Zane nor Vause became a party to the obligation at the same time with the other sureties. Zane's not putting his name on the bill is proof that he did not mean to be bound with the others. And though Vause put his name on the paper, it was not at the same time with the others, but subsequently, at the instance of Heiskell, and upon the agreement of Zane to indemnify. This being the nature of the contract, it might be maintained with great reason, even if Vause had paid the *debt, 176 that he had no right to call on the other sureties. For the claim to contribution depends on a contract, express or implied, to share equally the burthen. And it is not perceived how such contract could be implied here, when there was no privity whatever between Vause and the others. But the case is much stronger. Zane claims to be substituted in the place of Vause, who has made no payment, and has no right of contribution to which Zane can be substituted. The principle of Hopewell & al. v. Bank of Cumberland, 10 Leigh 206, is therefore applicable. Nor can Zane make out his case independently of the doctrine of substitution. If he claims in his own right, he does not shew equality with the other sureties in the time or in any of the circumstances of the suretyship. He is not therefore upon the same footing with them, and upon the principle of Givens & al. v. Nelson's ex'or & al., 10 Leigh 383, and Douglass v. Fagg, 8 Leigh 588, cannot claim contribution from them.

II. The original bill, and all the proceedings before Zane became a party, amounted to nothing. They were by a person who had no right. Stout's title was therefore acquired before there was any valid lien upon the land, and must be held good.

George H. Lee for the appellees. The rights of Zane arises out of the original contract. The agreement was not that Zane should stand between Heiskell and dishonour, but between Vause and dishonour. Zane's agreement was to pay the money for Vause. Though there is no decision of this court exactly in point, the opinion of Carr, J., in Enders & c. v. Brune, 4 Rand. 438, may be referred to for the equitable principles which govern in such cases.

II. The suit might have been maintained in the name of Vause, without making Zane a party. And if such suit there had been a decree, Zane could not have maintained a suit afterwards for the same money.

There was such privity between Vause
177 and Zane, that Zane *would have been bound although not a party. If this be so, it is an answer to the second point. And if it be not so, the doctrine of lis pendens does not require that every person who appears to be a necessary party should have been before the court at the time of suit brought. On the contrary the doctrine is, that a purchaser is bound by the decree which may be made in the suit, whether the proceedings be regular or irregular. And though it may be necessary to amend the bill and suggest new matter, the lis pendens is not brought down to the time of the amendment. Walker v. Smalwood, 2 Amb. 676; Murray &c. v. Ballou &c., 1 Johns. Ch. Rep. 566; Bishop of Winchester v. Paine, 11 Ves. 194; Style v. Martin, 1 Ch. Ca. 150; Garth v. Ward, 2 Atk. 174; Sorrell v. Carpenter, 2 P. Wms. 482. The only modification of the principle is where there is great and unnecessary delay. In the present case, the application for leave to amend was not resisted, but the bill was filed without objection, and asserted a claim for the same money that was sought to be recovered by the original bill.

Price, on the same side. Though the name of Vause was used, Zane was the real surety. After Zane paid, if a motion had been made in the name of Vause for the money so paid, though Vause had been unwilling, a court of law would have compelled him to let his name be used. But here we are in a court of equity. And this court will surely regard Zane as the real surety, having the right to call on his cosureties.

II. The proposition seems clear, that when a suit is once instituted, a purchaser of the subject in controversy is bound by all the consequences of the suit. And the introduction of a new party cannot prevent its having this effect.

C. Johnson in reply. The rights of cosureties against each other are rights of indemnity; and when one claims contribution as a cosurety, he must shew that

178 he is such, *and has paid. The sureties need not be bound by the same agreement, or at the same time; but it must in some way be ascertained that they are cosureties. Here it does not appear that there was any privity of contract. It does not appear that any of the sureties except Vause knew what Zane was doing, or that Zane knew what any of them except Vause was doing. Zane did not agree to be surety, but to indemnify a man who would become surety. He never said to Robinson that he would indemnify him if he had to pay more than his share. A cosurety can claim indemnity upon no ground except that the principal is unable to pay. If Vause had paid the money, he could not have proceeded against Robinson until he ascertained that Zane was unable to pay. Suppose that after the bill was executed, the agreement had been made to indemnify, and Zane had then deposited money in bank, which was used, when the bill became payable, to take it up; could Zane have had contribution? If he could not, what difference is there between a prior and a subsequent agreement; between an agreement without, and an agreement with a deposit? When a bill of exchange is taken up, for the credit of the acceptor, by another, that other has no claim against any one but the acceptor. And here, if Zane had paid at maturity, the payment must have enured to the benefit of all the sureties. Every indemnity given to one surety enures to the benefit of all. And this principle applies, whether the indemnity proceeds from the principal debtor or from a third person. All must be common sufferers. One must not be under guise and free from danger, while there is risk upon all the others. And the contract must be one of equality. A party who could not have been subjected as cosurety, can have no right to recover as such. Here there were no means of resorting to Zane. If Vause had become insolvent before payment, a cosurety could not have obtained indemnity either from him or Zane.

179 *II. What is Stout to be charged with notice of, upon the doctrine of lis pendens? It must be of that which appeared in the cause that was pending; to wit, that Vause claimed as creditor, and had attached to satisfy that claim. And if Vause had turned out to be creditor, the purchaser would have been subordinate to his claim. For the title which the purchaser gets is subject to such claim as the plaintiff has asserted against his vendor, provided a decree be rendered for the claim in that suit. But here no decree has been rendered for the claim asserted by Vause. If the suit had been proceeded in upon his bill, he could not have shewn that he was the creditor of Robinson, and his bill must have been dismissed with costs. It was error to permit Zane to be united with Vause, for the purpose of showing that Vause had not title, and that Zane had. The case of Sorrell v. Carpenter, cited on the other side, shews that the court ought to have refused leave to the plaintiff to amend his bill for any such purpose. At all events the claim must be regarded as a new claim of Zane, not asserted until the amended bill was filed. And the case of French v. Loyal Company, 5 Leigh 627, shews that the doctrine of lis pendens is confined to one who purchases, from a party to the suit, a right which the plaintiff has asserted in his bill, and which is successfully prosecuted by him in that suit. Here the purchase by Stout cannot be considered as made pending the suit of Zane. Moreover, at the time Zane commenced his proceedings, Robinson could not have been proceeded against as an absent debtor; and the amended bill alleges no facts to shew that he was liable then to be proceeded against as such. The doctrine of lis pendens has in truth nothing to do with the case. It rests upon the foreign attachment law, under which the creditor suing out the attachment, and claiming a lien by it, must shew himself to be a creditor. A plaintiff who has attached for £100.

STANARD, J. The first question to be solved in this case is, does the record shew any valid claim in any one subject to the defendants, seven of the sureties of Isaac Heiskell in the bill discounted at bank, to contribution for the payment made (on the default of the principal) to taken up that bill? This depends on the enquiry, whether the bill was taken up by a surety under circumstances to authorize the sureties against whom the claim of contribution is preferred, to make the payment subservient to their indemnity, in exoneration of the duty to contribute; or under circumstances to leave them subject to that duty. If the obligation of suretyship, by virtue of which the payment was made, be not, in its substance and nature, that of one of several original sureties, then, according to the circumstances under which the obligation may have been incurred, the original sureties may be exempt from the duty of contribution altogether, and the new surety, on the other hand, be liable to indemnify them; or they may be bound to make full indemnity to such new surety paying the debt. Thus if the creditor, in the pursuit of his remedy against the principal debtor, obtains an additional security, as bail on the writ, or surety in the forthcoming or prison bounds bond, and such bail or surety pays the debt, he has no claim to contribution against the original sureties, and those sureties have the right, if they pay, to enforce his obligation for their indemnity. Examples of the application of this principle are furnished by the cases of Parsons v. Briddock, 2 Vern. 608, and Givens & al. v. Nelson's ex'or & al., 10 Leigh 382, and many others that might be cited. If, on the contrary, the case be that of a creditor who, having the obligation

181 *of the principal debtor and sureties, and desiring additional security, obtains the undertaking of a third party to pay the debt if the obligors do not, the discharge of the debt by this third party, under the obligation of this undertaking, entitles him to full indemnity from the sureties in the original obligation. If the suretyship be substantially and in its nature that of one of several original sureties, on the payment under its obligation, the duty of contribution attaches to the other sureties. Was the payment in this case made by a party whose obligation was of this nature?

Coupled with the facts agreed by the parties, the following are shewn by the record. Before the application of Heiskell to Zane, he and the seven sureties (defendants) had made their single bill payable to the Northwestern bank. This bill he proposed to discount at the bank, for which purpose it was necessary that he should have an "endorser" (that is, a surety in the bill) living in Wheeling: and accordingly, under the arrangement made with Zane, Vause became a cosurety.

The rights and obligations of the parties depend on the facts so agreed and shewn. It is contended by the appellant that the just conclusion from them is, that Zane undertook to pay the money for Heiskell if he failed, that is, to assume the obligation of Heiskell on his failure, and by performing for him, to relieve and save harmless the surety Vause; and that such obligation, or at least the performance of it, enured to the benefit of all the sureties. It seems to me that this conclusion does not result from the facts, and is manifestly at war with any intention that can be rationally ascribed to Zane or Vause, the parties to the arrangement from which the conclusion is deduced. All that was asked of Zane was to become one of eight sureties. All that he was willing or intended to do was to incur such responsibility. This being most manifest, if not uncontested, the arrangement with Vause was but a substitution

182 *of Vause's responsibility for that which Zane was willing to incur, and as between Zane and Vause, made Zane liable for that suretyship which to the bank and the cosureties had been incurred by Vause. As between these parties, it was a suretyship of Zane in the name of Vause. The conclusion which converts the intended responsibility of Zane, from that of one of eight sureties, into one of indemnity to all the sureties for the whole debt, is drawn from a technical or rather a literal adherence to the terms in which the arrangement between Vause and Zane is stated in the agreed facts. That written statement should be expounded in reference to the ascertained intent and object of the parties to it, and the occasion that caused it. Vause had no possible motive to obtain from Zane an engagement that would enure to the indemnity of the other sureties, and Zane clearly did not intend to make such a one; and a construction of the terms of the arrangement deducing an engagement which the one did not seek, and the other neither intended nor was even asked to incur, is, in my estimation, hostile to the clearest principles of justice and of law. For this construction there is no colour, unless the letter of that part of the agreed facts which professes to state the engagement of Zane to Vause, be insulated from the considerations that led to it, and then interpreted without regard to its object and the intent of the parties. The engagement so extracted from the statement of facts is the assurance of Zane to Vause, when he became endorser (or cosurety), "that if Heiskell did not pay off the note when it arrived at maturity, he Zane would pay it off for him." Detached from the circumstances which led to the assurance, and from the position of the parties, such an engagement might justly involve the responsibility which the argument of the appellant has ascribed to it. Had Vause been one of many sureties to an existing obligation of Heiskell, seeking indemnity from his principal, and had

183 *Heiskell given the indemnity, either by a lien on property, or in such an engagement of a third person, the indemnity in either form, certainly in the first, might enure to the benefit of all the sureties. But such is not the case in question. Adhering to the letter of the extracted engagement, it is argued that Zane engaged to pay the note for Heiskell. But how pay it? as the substitute of Heiskell? or in place of Vause? It is the one or the other, according to the intent and object of the parties Zane and Vause. Had Zane not procured Vause to be the surety, and made no engagement with him, then, on the default of Heiskell, Vause would have been bound to pay the note; and if he paid it, he would pay for Heiskell, and such payment would subject the other sureties to the duty of contribution. Vause was the surety substituted for Zane, with the engagement of Zane to discharge the obligation Vause had incurred at his instance. The stipulation to pay for Heiskell cannot be interpreted so as to place Zane in the position of Heiskell the principal, with his obligations. According to the just interpretation, Zane stipulated to pay for Heiskell as Vause had bound himself to pay for Heiskell, that is, as one of eight sureties; and the payment made in pursuance of that engagement, by necessary intendment, would be in discharge of the obligation that Vause had assumed for him. The payment was the fruit of the obligation of one of eight sureties (all bound in the same obligation), and being made under an engagement which cast on the person making it the duty of one of eight sureties, has thereby imparted to it the quality of a payment, by one surety in discharge of the obligation of all; and the duty of contribution from those who did not pay, is its legal and equitable offspring.

The seven sureties defendants, then, were liable to the claim for contribution for the payment made in discharge of the bill, and this suit was brought to enforce that liability. It was brought in the name of Vause, *and was resisted on the ground that the payment was not made by Vause. Subsequently, Zane was united in the suit as a coplaintiff; and having ascertained that the defendant sureties were liable to contribute, the difficulty in the way of a decree on that liability was removed, as it would certainly be enforced in the name of Vause or Zane.

But the material question in this case is, what is the effect of the lis pendens? or rather, what is the time to which it ought to relate? the liability of the land in the hands of the appellant as purchaser, depending on the date from which the lis pendens takes effect. If the suit can be supported in the name of Vause alone, then there was an effectual lis pendens before Stout purchased, and his title as purchaser is overreached. Zane became a coplaintiff long after the purchase of Stout: and if the claim to contribution could be asserted by and in the name of Zane only, then it is argued with great force, that the suit in the name of Vause was nugatory as a lis pendens, as no decree could be rendered in that suit.

That a suit could not be sustained in the name of Vause for Vause's benefit, I have no doubt. The beneficial interest in the claim for contribution was in Zane. It is only by regarding the suit in the name of Vause as one brought for Zane's benefit, that title can be shewn to a decree in that suit. Could the suit be brought for Zane in the name of Vause, and was it so brought? My first impression was very strong in favour of a negative answer to the first branch of this enquiry. The general rule of the court of equity requires the person having the beneficial interest to be a party, and, if the recovery of that interest be sought, a party plaintiff asserting that right, and asking a decree to enforce it: and unless he be such party, the rule forbids a decree in respect to such interest. There were views of this case presented in the conference with one of my brethren, and in the course of my own reflections on it, that weakened this *first impression, and furnished at least plausible reasons to extricate the case from the operation of the general rule. But the first impression has not been removed, and I conclude that Zane was a necessary party plaintiff; and if so, there was no lis pendens in respect to the only party interested in its operation, until he became a coplaintiff. I adopt this conclusion with the less hesitation in this case, because, had I reached a different one, a difficulty in sustaining the suit in the name of Vause would still be presented by the second branch of the enquiry, to wit, was the suit in the name of Vause so brought by Zane for his benefit? The accession of Zane to the suit as a coplaintiff, long after Stout had been admitted a defendant, and had resisted the claim in the name of Vause, and claimed protections as a purchaser for value, is the only ground for the implication that the suit in the name of Vause was instituted by Zane for his benefit. The propriety of an implication having so large an effect on the interest of the parties, is at least most doubtful.

On the whole, I am of opinion that the decrees in this case, so far as they subjected the sureties to contribution, and required the defendant Robinson to contribute in respect to the insolvent sureties, are right; but that the same are erroneous so far as they charged the land in the hands of the appellant (who purchased it before there was a claim asserted by a party entitled to a decree, and consequently before there was an effectual lis pendens) with the amount decreed to be paid by Robinson; and that the bill, as to Stout the purchaser, ought to have been dismissed.

CABELL, P., held, not only that the proceedings created no lien upon the land in the hands of the purchaser, but also that Zane had no right to contribution. He was of opinion that the decree should be reversed and the bills dismissed in toto.

But

186 *BROOKE, J., concurring with Stanard, J., the decree of the court of appeals declared, that the decree of the court below, so far as it subjects the land claimed by the appellant to the amount decreed to be paid by Robinson to Vause and Zane, be reversed and annulled; that the bills of Vause and Vause & Zane be dismissed as to the appellant; that the appellant recover his costs expended, as well in his defence in the court below, as in the prosecution of his appeal here; and that, in all other respects, the decree of the court below be affirmed.

I. STATEMENT OF RULE.

One who purchases from a party to a pending suit, the subject thereof, is held bound by the decree that may be made against the party from whom he derives title. The litigating parties are exempt from taking any notice of the title so acquired, and such purchaser need not be made a party. This rule, however, is modified to a considerable extent in some cases by the statutes in relation to the recordation of the lis pendens. Zane v. Fink, 18 W. Va. 603; Sharitz v. Moyers, 99 Va. 526, 39 S. E. Rep. 166. See post, "Statutory Modifications of Rule."

II. NECESSITY OF RULE.

The rule as to the effect of a lis pendens is founded upon the necessity of such a rule to give effect to the proceedings of the courts of justice. Without it, the administration of justice might in all cases be frustrated by successive alienations of the property, which is the subject of the litigation, pending the suit, so that every judgment and decree would be rendered abortive where the recovery of specific property was the object. Newman v. Chapman, 2 Rand. 93, 14 Am. Dec. 766; French v. Loyal Co., 5 Leigh 627; Stone v. Tyree, 30 W. Va. 687, 5 S. E. Rep. 878; Price v. Thrash, 30 Gratt. 515; Sharitz v. Moyers, 99 Va. 519, 39 S. E. Rep. 166; White v. Perry, 14 W. Va. 66; O'Connor v. O'Connor, 45 W. Va. 354, 32 S. E. Rep. 276.

III. FOUNDATION OF RULE.

It has been said that the rule of lis pendens proceeds upon the theory that the purchaser is presumed to have notice of the pending suit. But in a leading case upon this subject this view was repudiated, the court saying that the rule was founded upon necessity and public policy. "This necessity," said the court, "is so obvious that there is no occasion to resort to the presumption that the purchaser really had, or by enquiry might have had, notice of the pendency of the suit to justify the existence of the rule. In fact, it applies in cases in which there is a physical impossibility that the purchaser could know, with any possible diligence on his part, of the existence of the suit." Newman v. Chapman, 2 Rand. 93, 14 Am. Dec. 766. And this view has been approved in numerous cases. French v. Loyal Co., 5 Leigh 627; Sharitz v. Moyers, 99 Va. 519, 39 S. E. Rep. 166; White v. Perry, 14 W. Va. 66; Stone v. Tyree, 30 W. Va. 687, 5 S. E. Rep. 878; Price v. Thrash, 30 Gratt. 515; Stout v. Philippi, etc., Co., 41 W. Va. 339, 23 S. E. Rep. 571, 56 Am. St. Rep. 843, and extensive note.

IV. STATUTORY MODIFICATIONS OF RULE.

General Scope of Statutes.—The common-law rule of lis pendens, is that a pendente lite purchaser from a party to the suit, of the subject-matter thereof, takes it subject to any decree rendered against his vendor in that suit. Because of the harsh operation of this rule upon bona fide purchasers, statutes have been enacted in most of the states with a view to protect purchasers who purchase in good faith. These statutes, which have been enacted in Virginia and West Virginia, provide, in substance, that the lien of the lis pendens shall not bind or affect a purchaser of real estate without notice unless a memorandum setting forth the title of the cause, the court in which it is pending, the general object of the suit, the location and quantity of the land, and the name of the person whose estate is intended to be affected, is filed with the clerk of the county court of the county in which the land is situated. §13, ch. 139, W. Va. Code; § 3566, Va. Code; Hurn v. Keller, 79 Va. 415; Easley v. Barksdale, 75 Va. 280; Osborn v. Glasscock, 39 W. Va. 749, 20 S. E. Rep. 702; Harmon v. Byram, 11 W. Va. 511; Beckwith v. Thompson, 18 W. Va. 103; Cammack v. Soran, 30 Gratt. 292; DeCamp v. Carnahan, 26 W. Va. 839.

Statutes Are Mandatory.—Where the lis pendens is not docketed as provided by these statutes, it is well settled that a purchaser without notice of the pendency of the suit takes a good title. DeCamp v. Carnahan, 26 W. Va. 839; Cammack v. Soran, 30 Gratt. 292; Easley v. Barksdale, 75 Va. 274; Beckwith v. Thompson, 18 W. Va. 103.

Statutes Inapplicable in Certain Cases.—Notwithstanding these statutes, the doctrine of notice arising from the mere pendency of the suit to recover specific property, real or personal, is still the law of the state of West Virginia. The statute of that state requiring the recording of a lis pendens applies only to suits to charge real estate with debt, not to suits to recover it. O'Connor v. O'Connor, 45 W. Va. 354, 32 S. E. Rep. 276. It applies neither to suits to recover nor suits to charge personalty. Osborn v. Glasscock, 39 W. Va. 749, 20 S. E. Rep. 702; Bowlby v. De Witt, 47 W. Va. 323, 34 S. E. Rep. 919; Harmon v. Byram, 11 W. Va. 511.

So where judgments are docketed or deeds of trust recorded, or liens otherwise acquired, and a chancery suit to enforce the same is pending, there need be no notice of the pending of such suit, under § 13, ch. 139, W. Va. Code, to bind purchasers purchasing after the docketing of such judgment or recordation of such deeds of trust or other lien, as they are pendente lite purchasers under the common-law rule. Shumate v. Crockett, 43 W. Va. 491, 27 S. E. Rep. 240. See also, O'Connor v. O'Connor, 45 W. Va. 354, 32 S. E. Rep. 276.

Lis Pendens of Petitioning Creditor in a Suit to Set Aside Fraudulent Conveyance.—A creditor at large who successfully sues to set aside a deed conveying property in fraud of creditors, has a lien on the property from the time the suit is brought; and a petitioning creditor, who comes into the suit, has a like lien from the filing of his petition, but, as against creditors with or without notice, and purchasers for value without notice, he has a lien only from the time of filing his memorandum of lis pendens. § 2460, Code 1887; Davis v. Bonney, 89 Va. 755, 17 S. E. Rep. 229. See also, Richardson v. Ralphsnyder, 40 W. Va. 15, 20 S. E. Rep. 854.

The lien thus conferred is only upon the property conveyed, and not, like the lien of a judgment, on all of the debtor's estate. Davis v. Bonney, 89 Va. 755, 17 S. E. Rep. 229.

V. GENERAL NATURE AND EFFECT.

Commencement of Lien.—At common law the lien of a lis pendens commenced on the day that the writ bore teste, while in chancery it did not exist until the subpoena was actually served. Newman v. Chapman, 2 Rand. 93, 14 Am. Dec. 766; Lyne v. Jackson, 1 Rand. 114.

Where the bill is not filed at the date of the issuance of the subpoena the lien of the lis pendens commences at the time the subpoena is served, though the bill is not filed until some time thereafter. The filing of the bill relates back to the date of the service of the writ, but not to the date of its issuance. Stone v. Tyree, 30 W. Va. 687, 5 S. E. Rep. 878; Harmon v. Byram, 11 W. Va. 511. Hence where a person purchases after the service of the summons, but before the bill is filed, he is a pendente lite purchaser. Harmon v. Byram, 11 W. Va. 511.

Purchaser Pendente Lite Is Treated as if He Never Purchased.—Although the maxim is pendente lite nil innovetur, that maxim is not to be understood as warranting the conclusion that the conveyance so made is absolutely null and void at all times and for all purposes. The true interpretation of the maxim is, that the conveyance does not vary the rights of the parties in that suit; and they are not bound to take notice of the title acquired under it, but with regard to them the title is to be taken, as if it had never existed. Zane v. Fink, 18 W. Va. 693.

Pendente Lite Purchaser Stands in His Vendor's Shoes.—For reasons of public policy, a pendente lite purchaser, within the absence of statute, is placed in the shoes of his vendor, and, upon becoming a party to the litigation, will be substituted to the possession and rights of his vendor. Sharitz v. Moyers, 99 Va. 519, 39 S. E. Rep. 166.

Pendente Lite Purchaser Does Not Hold Adversely to Party to Suit.—A pendente lite purchaser from a debtor, against whom a creditor is seeking to enforce a judgment by suit, does not hold adversely to the party seeking to enforce the lien, and will not be protected by the statute of limitations, by reason of open, exclusive, and notorious possession for the prescribed period. Parker v. Clarkson, 39 W. Va. 184, 19 S. E. Rep. 431; Lynch v. Andrews, 25 W. Va. 751.

VI. TO WHAT PROCEEDINGS APPLICABLE.

Common-Law and Chancery Proceedings.—It seems to be settled that the doctrine of lis pendens exists at law as well as in chancery. In one case upon this subject the court said: "It is not true, that this rule of lis pendens was unknown to the common law and was a rule applicable only in chancery causes. By the common law the lis pendens existed from the first moment of the day the writ issued and bore teste, and of necessity the courts of chancery adopted the general doctrine of lis pendens but relaxed in some degree the severity of the common-law rule, and held that no lis pendens existed until the service of the subpoena and bill filed." White v. Perry, 14 W. Va. 66; Newman v. Chapman, 2 Rand. 102; Harmon v. Byram, 11 W. Va. 511; Smith v. Browne, 9 Leigh 294.

Foreclosure Suit Where Mortgage Is Not Recorded.—Where a mortgage is not recorded, a subsequent purchaser, without actual notice, is not bound by the pendency of the foreclosure suit; the doctrine of lis pendens being inapplicable to such case. Newman v. Chapman, 2 Rand. 93, 14 Am. Dec. 766.

VII. OF WHAT LIS PENDENS IS NOTICE.

Facts Apparent from Record.—A purchaser having constructive or actual notice of a pending suit, can only be held chargeable with knowledge of the facts of which the record in the suit, as it existed at the time of his purchase, would have informed him. If these facts inform him that the vendor is committing a fraud in making the sale, he becomes a party to the fraud. But he cannot be charged with the knowledge of facts afterwards brought into the case. Davis v. Christian, 15 Gratt. 11; Stout v. Philippi, etc., Co., 41 W. Va. 345, 23 S. E. Rep. 573.

Where the facts in the record tell a pendente lite purchaser that his vendor has committed a fraud, this rule applies so as to render such purchaser a party to that fraud. Hence, if he purchases under a deed of trust, pending a suit to set it aside for fraud, he becomes a participant in such fraud, so far as the complainants in that suit are concerned. Stout v. Philippi, etc., Co., 41 W. Va. 339, 23 S. E. Rep. 571, 56 Am. St. Rep. 843.

VIII. PERSONS AFFECTED.

Pendente Lite Purchasers in General.—Every person purchasing pendente lite is treated as a purchaser with notice, and is subject to all the equities of the persons under whom he claims in priority, and it makes no difference whether the purchaser pendente lite be the claimant of a legal or equitable interest, or whether he be the assignee of the plaintiffs or defendants. Harmon v. Byram, 11 W. Va. 511; Simpson v. Dugger, 88 Va. 963, 14 S. E. Rep. 760; Zane v. Fink, 18 W. Va. 693; Sharitz v. Moyers, 99 Va. 526, 39 S. E. Rep. 166; Osborn v. Glasscock, 39 W. Va. 749, 20 S. E. Rep. 702; Stout v. Philippi, etc., Co., 41 W. Va. 339, 23 S. E. Rep. 571, 56 Am. St. Rep. 843; Goff v. McLain, 48 W. Va. 445, 37 S. E. Rep. 566; Wilfong v. Johnson, 41 W. Va. 283, 23 S. E. Rep. 730; Wick v. Dawson, 48 W. Va. 469, 37 S. E. Rep. 639; Lynch v. Andrews, 25 W. Va. 751.

Pendente Lite Purchasers Need Not Be Made Parties.—Generally, a purchaser pendente lite need not be made a party to the bill, nor need he be brought before the court. Harmon v. Byram, 11 W. Va. 511; Lynch v. Andrews, 25 W. Va. 751; Stout v. Philippi, etc., Co., 41 W. Va. 339, 23 S. E. Rep. 571, 56 Am. St. Rep. 843; Wick v. Dawson, 48 W. Va. 469, 37 S. E. Rep. 639; Wilfong v. Johnson, 41 W. Va. 283, 23 S. E. Rep. 730.

Purchasers from Pendente Lite Purchaser.—In an early Virginia case, it was intimated that the doctrine of lis pendens applied only to purchasers from the parties to the suit, and that if one of such purchasers should in turn make another conveyance, that his vendee would not be bound by the rule, for the reason that he did not obtain his title pendente lite from a party to the suit. French v. Loyal Co., 5 Leigh 627.

Where Purchaser Has Actual Notice.—In cases where the purchaser has actual notice of litigation, involving the title to the property purchased, his purchaser will be regarded as fraudulent. Lynch v. Andrews, 25 W. Va. 751.

Purchaser of Separate Estate Pending Suit to Subject It to Wife's Debts.—In a suit brought to subject the separate personal estate of a wife to the payment of her debts, until the plaintiff takes the property out of possession of the wife, or acquires a lien upon it in some of the modes recognized by law, the purchaser thereof, for value and without fraud, will not be liable to the plaintiff for the property so purchased, whether he had or had not notice of the pendency of the suit at the time of his purchase. Bruff v. Thompson, 31 W. Va. 16, 6 S. E. Rep. 352. But see Hughes v. Hamilton, 19 W. Va. 386.

Purchasers Who Have Acquiesced.—A pendente lite purchaser, who waits seven years after obtaining a conveyance of land, before asking to be made a party to the suit, will not, after such delay, be permitted to be made a party to the suit in order that he may reopen questions settled therein, where, before the date of the conveyance to him, a report of the debts had been made by the commissioner and confirmed by the court, of which he had notice and in which he acquiesced, by applying a greater part of the purchase money to the payment of the debts. Arnold v. Casner, 22 W. Va. 444.

Purchasers of Land.—Where a party, who has notice of a pendency of a suit, to specifically enforce a contract for the exchange of land, purchases one of the tracts of land from one of the parties to the contract, he will be perpetually enjoined from obtaining any advantage of his deed, and will be decreed to convey the legal title to the party to whom it belongs. Parrill v. McKinley, 6 W. Va. 67.

Land charged with an annuity, having been sold, pending a suit to enforce the annuity, will be ordered sold to satisfy the arrears of the annuity without noticing the pendente lite purchasers. Phillips v. Williams, 5 Gratt. 259.

Assignee of Plaintiff's Entire Interest.—When the sole plaintiff voluntarily transfers or assigns his interest in the estate or property which is in controversy, the suit does not thereby abate, nor does it generally become so defective, that it cannot be further proceeded in without making such transferee a party to the suit, for the reason that such transferee is a pendente lite purchaser and bound by the decision of the court. Zane v. Fink, 18 W. Va. 698.

Parties in a Representative Capacity.—A commissioner, though a party as administrator of the debtor to a creditor's suit, having no knowledge of the object of the suit, who pays money to the heirs under an order of the court, is not affected by the lis pendens of the creditor's suit so as to be held liable to pay it over again to the creditor. Carrington v. Didier, 8 Gratt. 280.

IX. PROPERTY SUBJECT TO LIEN.

Property Must Be Directly Affected.—The doctrine of lis pendens, however necessary, is harsh in its effect upon bona fide purchasers, and has always been confined in its operation to the extent of the policy on which it was founded; that is to give full effect to the judgment or decree, which might be rendered in the suit pending at the time of the purchase and it therefore applies only to proceedings directly relating to the thing or property in question. White v. Perry, 14 W. Va. 66; French v. Loyal Co., 5 Leigh 681; Newman v. Chapman, 2 Rand. 102; O'Connor v. O'Connor, 45 W. Va. 354, 32 S. E. Rep. 276.

The doctrine of lis pendens only applies where there is a suit to affect the property purchased, and can have no effect upon it unless a decree may be made in the suit to affect it, nor until such decree is made. Davis v. Christian, 15 Gratt. 11; Smith v. Browne, 9 Leigh 294.

Rents of Real Estate.—Purchasers of real estate, pending a suit, are liable for the rents thereof, if their purchase was made for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or defrauding creditors. Stobbs v.

Philippi, etc., Co., 41 W. Va. 339, 23 S. E. Rep. 571, 56 Am. St. Rep. 848.

In Simpson v. Dugger, 88 Va. 963, 14 S. E. Rep. 700, the vendee of property sold under a decree in a creditors' suit had notice of a suit setting up the claims of the debtor's children to the right of their deceased mother. Pending the suit the vendee sold the property to an insolvent, and the children being adjudged entitled to the property, were held also entitled to recover the rents from the vendee.

Skeen and Others v. Lynch and Others.

August, 1842, Lewisburg.

(Absent BROOKE and BALDWIN,* J.)

Dedication—Acts of Ownership by Owner—Effect.†—

Case of a town established on a river, by the plan of which there was an artificial line, leaving a strip of land between the lower range of lots and the river. An express dedication of the strip being claimed to have been made by the proprietor to the use of the citizens, and the proof of such dedication consisting of his declarations, the evidence of which was uncertain, the claim defeated by proving that subsequent acts of ownership, inconsistent with such claim, were exercised over the strip by the proprietor and his representatives, for a long period, and with the acquiescence of the citizens.

This was a bill in the circuit court of Alleghany county, by Hugh Lynch and others against Robert Skeen and others, asserting a right, common to the plaintiffs and the other inhabitants of the town of Covington, in a strip of ground along the margin of Jackson's river.

By an act of assembly passed the 22d of January 1818, a tract of 25 acres of 187 land near the mouth of *Dunlap's creek on the north side of Jackson's river, the property of dr. James Merry, was established as a town, as soon as the same should be laid off into lots with convenient streets. The land was accordingly surveyed

*He had been counsel for the appellees.

†Dedication—Streets—Acceptance—Presumption—Estoppel.—In Virginia there may be a valid acceptance of an easement in a town without any distinct act of recognition by the corporate authorities of such town. The mere user, however, by the public, of the locus in quo will not of itself constitute an acceptance without regard to the character of the use, and the circumstances and length of time under which it was claimed and enjoyed. Where property in a town is set apart for the public use and is enjoyed as such, and private and public rights acquired with reference to it and to its enjoyment, the law presumes such acceptance on the part of the public as will operate an estoppel in pais, and preclude the owner from revoking the dedication. Harris v. Com., 20 Gratt. 840, citing Skeen v. Lynch, 1 Rob. 186, as substantially affirming the above doctrine.

Same—Same—Presumption—Acts of Ownership by Owner.—The principal case is cited in City of Richmond v. Stokes, 31 Gratt. 716, to the point that where streets and alleys have been opened by the owner of the soil, and used by the public, with his assent, as a and laid off into lots, with streets; and by the plat which the surveyor made for the proprietor, the lower range of lots did not extend to the river, but there was an artificial line beyond which neither the lots nor the cross streets extended, and between that artificial line and the river, there was a narrow strip of land. A public sale was advertised in 1818, to be made of the lots; and at the time for the sale, the plat was exhibited. Persons declined bidding, the crier states, because they considered that if Mr. Merry retained the strip as private property, it would be a great injury to the inhabitants of the town, on account of the water. Many depositions were taken to prove what occurred at the sale: but they varied so much, that it seemed to the judge who delivered the opinion in the court of appeals, "difficult to determine what was the extent of the concession intended to be made to the inhabitants" in respect to the strip. The judge stated the following to be the tenor of those depositions: "According to some, Merry declared the strip was left open for the public, unless it should be used for a canal, millrace, or street. One witness proves that he intended it for a canal and public landings: another, that he intended it for a canal, if required; if not, for the benefit of the town. According to some, he wanted it for a canal and millrace, and, said if a millrace was conducted through it, the people should have free access to the river, and he would construct bridges over the race at the cross streets." After the declarations so made by the proprietor, the lots were sold by the plat. The public thoroughfare for years, a dedication of the easement may be presumed, and the continued and uninterrupted use, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the owner will justify the presumption of a dedication to the public, provided the use has continued so long that private rights and the public convenience might be materially affected by an interruption of the enjoyment. But any acts of ownership by the owner of the soil will repel the presumption.

The principal case is cited in foot-note to City of Richmond v. Poe, 24 Gratt. 149.

Same—Obstruction—Encroachment.—The principal case is cited in Buntin v. Danville, 93 Va. 205, 24 S. E. Rep. 830, to the point that when dedication has become complete and irrevocable, no obstruction of the subject of the dedication, or encroachment upon it by the original owner of the soil, or by any one else will affect the dedication, or impair the right of the public to its benefits, unless the land so dedicated has been abandoned by the public, or by the proper authority. See foot-note to Harris v. Com., 30 Gratt. 833.

Same—How Made—Statute of Frauds.—The principal case is cited in Buntin v. Danville, 93 Va. 211, 24 S. E. Rep. 830, to the point that a dedication is not within the statute of frauds, and need not be by deed or other writing, but may be as effectually and validly done by verbal declarations.

Railroads in Streets—Rights of Lot Owners to Compensation.—See foot-note to Talbott v. The Richmond & Danville R. Co., 81 Gratt. 685. The principal case is cited in Spencer v. Railroad Co., 23 W. Va. 423.

proprietor continued afterwards in possession of the strip, except so much as was necessary to continue the cross streets to the river. He inclosed, *cultivated, and erected houses upon that portion of the strip between the lower end of the town and the first cross street, (this portion being one fourth of the length of the strip,) and he granted permission to certain persons to make brick on another portion between the first and second cross streets. During all the time between the sale and the death of the proprietor (a period of nine or ten years,) he exercised acts of ownership over the property, without any complaint on the part of the trustees of the town, or the citizens. After the death of the proprietor, to wit, in 1831, the strip (except the parts used in continuing the cross streets to the river) was offered at public sale by his representatives. No claim for the public was then set up by the trustees of the town, or the inhabitants. On the contrary, the representatives of the proprietor, at the earnest solicitation of some of the citizens, laid off an alley adjoining the rear of the lower range of lots, and with this arrangement all seemed satisfied. The residue was then sold without objection. During the succeeding year, this suit was brought; the plaintiffs owning each a lot binding on the strip, to which they derived title from the purchasers at the original sale; and the defendants being the executors of Merry, and the purchasers of the strip from those executors. By an agreement between the purchasers, they seem to have considered the streets across the strip as private ways; but those streets have remained open for the public use. No attempt to obstruct their use led to the filing of the bill. The only cause for it was the obstruction of the use of the residue of the strip.

The cause came on to be heard the 22d of September 1835, upon the bill, answers, exhibits, and examinations of witnesses. On consideration whereof, the circuit court decreed a perpetual injunction restraining the defendants and all others from obstructing, building upon, or enclosing the strip, and also from wasting *and destroying the trees growing thereon, and required the said strip to be left open and free to the use of the plaintiffs, and proprietors of lots in the town of Covington, and the public generally, as a public easement, common passway, and outlet to the river. And the court further decreed that the defendants, within ninety days, remove from the said strip the enclosures, buildings and obstructions which were placed or erected thereon by James Merry in his lifetime, or by the defendants since; and that the plaintiffs recover their costs.

From this decree, on the petition of Skeen and the other defendants, an appeal was allowed.

G. N. Johnson, for appellants, argued, that the terms of sale of the lots could be gathered only from the written advertisement, and the plat of the town exhibited at:

the sale, from which it appeared that no part of the strip was intended to be sold: that the parol evidence of Merry's declarations at the time of the sale was inadmissible, both upon common law principles of evidence, and by the statute of frauds. Starkie's Evid. part 4, p. 996; 1 Sugden on Vendors 31, 132, 136, 143; Jones v. Edney, 3 Camp. 284. But if the parol evidence was admissible, he contended that it was vague, contradictory, and not worthy of respect; that so far as it tended to shew that Merry had parted with his property in the strip to the public or to the town, it was outweighed by the facts that for many years after the sale of the town lots, and as long as he lived, he cultivated, enclosed, and exercised other acts of ownership over the strip, without objection, and that no objection was made by any one at the time of the public sale of the ground in question by Merry's executors after his death. The true construction of the evidence was, that Merry, at the sale in 1818, promised the 190 purchasers that their access to the river should not be cut off, *while in other respects he reserved the absolute property in the strip to himself; and this promise had been fulfilled by leaving open an alley along the river range or lots, and by extending the cross streets of the town across the strip to the river.

John B. Baldwin, for the appellees, argued, that parol evidence was admissible to ascertain or explain the terms of the sale, and that the statute of frauds had no application; first, because here had been part performance; and secondly, because this was the case of a dedication of land to public use, which might well be by parol. For these propositions he cited 1 Sugden on Vend. 134; Fife v. Clayton, 13 Ves. 546; Trueheart v. Price, 2 Munf. 468; Grantland v. Wight, 2 Munf. 179; Mayo v. Murchie, 3 Munf. 358; Wainwright v. Read, 1 Desauss. 573; Cannon's ex'or v. Mitchell, 2 Desauss. 320; City of Cincinnati v. lessee of White, 6 Peters 431. He contended that the evidence sustained the allegation in the bill, of a dedication by dr. Merry of the whole strip to the public use.

G. N. Johnson, in reply, sought to distinguish this case from those cited on the other side; and in relation to the doctrine of parol dedication to public uses, he said, that to support such a dedication, it must be shewn that the uninterrupted possession and control of the property was surrendered by the owner and enjoyed by the public; which was not the case here, but on the contrary, dr. Merry continued to use and occupy the property as his own.

ALLEN, J. The plaintiffs do not allege, or attempt to prove, any special contract with the owners of the river range of lots for the easement claimed. If the easement was granted, it was for the benefit of the public generally. The objections, therefore, founded on the statute of frauds, do not, it seems to me, apply to the case. A grant or writing is not necessary to 191 *constitute a valid dedication of an easement to the public. Where streets and alleys have been opened by the owner, and used by the public, with his assent, as a public thoroughfare for years, a dedication of the easement may be presumed. Jarvis v. Dean, 3 Bing. 447; Lade v. Shepherd, 2 Strange 1004; City of Cincinnati v. White, 6 Peters 431. Nor is it essential, in the investigation of this case, to determine where the fee rests. In Mayo v. Murchie, 3 Munf. 358, the court decided that parol testimony was admissible, in aid of the inference deducible from the printed proposals, to establish an equitable title of the inhabitants of the town as tenants in common, and decreed a release to the trustees, for the use of the inhabitants, of the land dedicated. In the case of the City of Cincinnati v. White, 6 Peters 431, the court seemed to be of opinion that cases of this kind are exceptions to the general rule requiring a grantee, and that "there may be instances where the fee may remain in abeyance until there is a grantee capable of taking, where the object and purposes of the appropriation look to a future grantee in whom the fee is to vest. But" (continues the court) "the validity of the dedication does not depend on this; it will preclude the party making the appropriation from reasserting any right over the land, at all events so long as it remains in public use, although there never may arise a grantee capable of taking the fee." Nor is any particular form or ceremony necessary in the dedication of the land to public use. S. C. 440.

If, then, no deed or writing be essential to such an appropriation, and its validity do not depend upon the existence of a grantee, it remains to enquire whether the evidence in this record shews such an appropriation to the public, as precludes revocation by the original owner.

192 *On this point I have felt much difficulty. It may be collected from the whole testimony, that the proprietor did not intend to part with his entire interest in the strip of land in question. If a canal should be constructed, the right was reserved to permit it to pass through the strip; and in that event, as he would have reserved it for that purpose, he must have been regarded as the owner of the fee in respect to that subject, and entitled to compensation as such. He also, according to the greater part of the witnesses, reserved the right to conduct a millrace through it: and for this purpose it must have been regarded as private property. In either event, the easement to the public in this narrow strip would have been of little or no value, viewing it as a common. Perhaps the general terms used by witnesses speaking from memory at the distance of many years, can be best understood by a consideration of the circumstances attending the transaction. The use of this strip, except where the cross streets terminated, so as to continue them to the river, could be of little importance to the citizens of the town. But free access to the river was essential to the comfort of all. By the plan of the town which was exhibited, the cross streets terminated at the line constituting the artificial boundary of the town on the north side. Bidders might well hesitate, who for the first time, on seeing the plat, discovered that they might at any moment be cut off from the water. Accordingly, the crier says that the strip was considered a great injury, on account of the water. One of the witnesses speaks of Merry's engagement to erect bridges at the cross streets, over any millrace he might conduct along the strip; another understood him to promise free access to the water. If the declarations of the proprietor are to be understood with reference to the free access to the water, they are rendered consistent with the privileges he certainly intended to retain in the land; privileges which would be inconsistent with the unreserved appropriation of the subject to the public. And I should incline to the opinion that if the case rested here, this last would be the proper construction to be given to the testimony. But there are circumstances which it seems to me are decisive of this question, and remove the doubts which the parol testimony, if it stood alone, might create.

In the first place the plat of the town excluded the strip: the rear of the river range of lots was bounded by an artificial line. The case of Barclay &c. v. Howell's lessee, 6 Peters 498, was a controversy respecting a strip of ground in the city of Pittsburg, along the Monongahela river. From the plan of the town it appeared that all the streets and alleys were distinctly marked by the surveyor, and their width laid down, except Water street, which lies along the river. No artificial boundary was laid down as the limit of this street: its northern boundary was given, but the space to the south was left open to the river. The court, commenting on this fact, said, "If a line had been drawn in the plat along the southern limit of this street, there would have been great force in the argument that the ground between such limit and the water was reserved by the proprietors. This would have been the legal consequence from such a survey, unless the contrary had been shewn." In the case under consideration, there was such artificial boundary; and the evidence leaves it doubtful to what extent the proprietor agreed to relinquish his right to the ground between it and the river.

In the second place, the proprietor continued in possession of the strip. One part of it was enclosed and cultivated by him, and houses were erected by him on it; on another part, he permitted persons to make brick. He lived nine or ten years after the sale, and during the whole period exercised acts of ownership over the property, without any complaint on the part of the trustees of the town, or the citizens. The use of property by the public with the assent of the owner, will, under particular circumstances, justify the presumption of a dedication to the public, provided the use has continued so long that private rights and the public convenience might be materially affected by an interruption of the enjoyment. But any acts of ownership would repel the presumption. Thus, in Roberts v. Karr, 1 Camp. 262, note, the placing of a bar across the street, to prevent the passage of carriages, was held to rebut the presumption of a dedication. In Lethbridge v. Winter, 1 Camp. 263, note, it appeared that a gate had recently been put up in a place where a gate formerly stood, but where for the last twelve years there had been none: this was held to destroy the presumption. The principle of these cases applies, it is true, to dedications presumed from the long acquiescence of the owner, and not to express dedications: but where, as in this case, the evidence of the express dedication is uncertain, such acts of ownership, exercised with the acquiescence of those interested to resist them, furnish persuasive evidence that the dedication was not understood, at the time, to be as extensive as some of the declarations now deposed to would imply. With the arrangement after the death of dr. Merry, by which an alley was laid off adjoining the rear of the lower range of lots, all seemed satisfied, and the residue of the strip was then sold without objection. If the claim now set up was valid, then was the time to assert it. The citizens probably preferred securing a certain benefit, to the assertion of a questionable right. Whatever the claim was, it seems to me that it must, after these transactions, be considered as abandoned in respect to all the strip between the different cross streets. These streets, having been continued across the strip to the river, and being necessary to afford that free access to the water, which, under any view of the testimony, was assured to the citizens, have been dedicated to the public. To the use of them they are clearly entitled, both from the express declaration of the proprietor at the time of the sale, and his subsequent assent to their enjoyment. It does not appear that any attempt has been made to obstruct the use of them. It is true, that by an agreement between the purchasers of the strip, they seem to consider these as private ways. But they have remained open for the public use. I think it would have been premature to institute proceedings to protect the public in the enjoyment of this easement, until some act of disturbance was shewn. I therefore think the court should have dismissed the bill, without prejudice to the right of the plaintiffs, and other citizens of the town, to the use of the cross streets as extended through the slip of ground in question to the river, in the event of any attempt hereafter to disturb them in the enjoyment thereof; and, under all the circumstances, without costs.

The other judges concurring, a decree was entered reversing the decree of the circuit court with costs, and dismissing the bill, without costs in the court below, and without prejudice, as declared in the foregoing opinion.

196 *Garrett Ex'or of Allen v. Carr and Wife and Another.

August, 1842, Lewisburg.

(Absent STANARD and BALDWIN, J.*)

Guardian and Ward—Guardian's Account.—The decree of this court at the time the decision reported in 8 Leigh 407, having remanded this cause with directions that the account of the land fund and the hire of the slaves should be stated as a guardian's account, question now whether those directions have been complied with.

Same—Same—Construction of Statute.—Construction of the 7th section of the act in 1 R. C. 1819, p. 407, concerning guardians, which requires every guardian to exhibit to the court which appointed him, once in every year, "accounts of the produce of the estate, of the sales and disposition of such produce, and of the disbursements;" and of the 9th section, which provides that the balance appearing against the guardian "may be put out to interest for the benefit of the ward, upon such security as the court shall direct and approve; or the guardian, if it remain in his hands, shall account for the interest, to be computed from the time his account was or ought to have been passed."

Same—Same—Interest—Balance.†—If, upon the first settlement by the guardian of his account, a bal-

†Guardian and Ward—Death of Guardian—Interest—Balances.—It was held in McKay v. McKay, 33 W. Va. 737, 11 S. E. Rep. 218, citing the principal case, that when a guardianship terminates by the death of the guardian, simple interest only, and not compound, should be charged from the death of the guardian on the balance found due from him at his death. See foot-note to Cunningham v. Cunningham, 4 Gratt. 48; Crigler v. Alexander, 33 Gratt. 674. See monographic note on "Guardian and Ward" appended to Barnum v. Frost, 17 Gratt. 398, and monographic note on "Interest" appended to Fred v. Dixon, 27 Gratt. 541.

Executors—Annual Balances—Interest.—Where a testator directs his executor to manage his farms and distribute the profits among his grandchildren when of age, the executor should not be charged with compound, but only with simple interest upon the yearly balances left over in his hands, unless the testator directed that those balances should be invested in interest-bearing securities. Lovett v. Thomas, 81 Va. 258, distinguishing in this respect Garrett v. Carr, 1 Rob. 196, because in that case the testator directed that his lands be sold and the proceeds invested in stock of the Bank of Virginia, or in other property as the executors might think advantageous to his children.

Same—Same—Same—Committees of Insane Persons.—In Crigler v. Alexander, 33 Gratt. 676, the court said: "The next question is, whether in stating and settling the accounts of the intestate as committee, he is to be charged with compound interest upon the balance in his hands. It is insisted this ought to be done, by analogy to the rule governing in the ance remain in his hands on which he is to account for interest. such interest must, in his second annual account, be credited to the ward, like other profits of the estate; and if the interest and other profits credited in this second account exceed the disbursements, the surplus, whether it arise from the interest aforesaid or from other profits, will constitute a balance against the guardian on which, if it remain in his hands, he must account for interest, which interest must, in the third annual account, be credited to the ward; and so on, toties quoties.

Same—Same—Same—Rents and Hires.—The case of a guardian indebted to his ward for the annual value of land occupied, and of a slave possessed by him, forms an exception to the general rule that interest is not to be allowed on estimated rents and hires. Such annual value must, in the annual account exhibited by the guardian, be credited to his ward, and the surplus beyond the disbursements will bear interest, like other profits of the estate.

197 Same—Same—Same—No Account Returned—Effect.—Where a guardian has returned no account to the court which appointed him, and a bill in equity is filed against him, the court of equity will charge him with interest from the time and in the manner that he would have been charged, if his account had been exhibited annually to the court which appointed him; and will settle the accounts, in other respects, upon the principles that would have governed the settlements, if regular returns had been made to that court.

Same—Same—Termination of Relation—How Account Stated.—From the time that the guardianship termination of guardians' accounts. It is sufficient to say, that the liability of guardians for compound interest grows out of the peculiar provisions of our statutes on that subject. See Code 1873, § 10, ch. 124, and Garrett v. Carr, 1 Rob. 196.

"These provisions have never been considered as applying to other trustees.

"The accounts of the committee of an insane person are to be settled upon principles governing in the settlement of accounts of other fiduciaries having the control of trust funds. They are not chargeable with compound interest, except under very peculiar circumstances. Where there is an express trust for accumulating, and the trustee, instead of investing, retains the funds in his own hands, or where he employs the money in his own business, and refuses to account for the profits, he may be charged with compound interest as a punishment, or as a measure of damages for undiscovered profits. See 1 Perry on Trusts, § 470-474; Barney v. Saunders, 16 How. U. S. R. 535; Hill on Trustees, 571, note.

"Much of the reasoning of JUDGE ALLEN in Garrett v. Carr (1 Rob. 196), will apply as well to committees of insane persons as to guardians, and would seem to indicate that in some instances all classes of trustees, except executors and administrators, may be chargeable with compound interest, even upon a mere failure to invest. See page 215.

"All that can be said therefore is, that no inflexible rule can be laid down on the subject which would apply to all cases. Generally, however, it is conceded that a trustee and other fiduciaries, except a guardian, are liable for simple interest only. This doctrine seems to be settled by a great variety minates, the account between the guardian and ward will be stated upon the ordinary principle that prevails between debtor and creditor. Sums paid after that time by the guardian to the ward will be credited at the respective dates of such payments, so as to stop interest pro tanto from those dates.

By the decree of the court of appeals in this cause, entered at the time of the decision thereof reported in 3 Leigh 407, the cause was remanded to the circuit court of Augusta, with instructions to reinstate the original bill as to all the matters thereof, and to refer the accounts to a commissioner of the court, to be reformed and restated; which commissioner was to be directed to keep the accounts of the personal estate distinct from the account of the land fund and the hire of the slaves; stating and treating the former upon the principles established by the court as to administration accounts, and the latter as a guardian's account, in which the expenses of the ward were to be defrayed out of the annual interest of the fund and hires of the slaves.

A copy of this decree being produced to the circuit court of Augusta on the 4th day of authorities, both English and American. 1 Perry on Trusts, § 470-474; Barney v. Saunders, 16 How. U. S. R. 535; Hill on Trustees 571, note."

The principal case is cited for these propositions in Knight v. Watts, 26 W. Va. 218, 219; Lovett v. Thomas, 81 Va. 259.

Same—Rule Where Beneficiaries Are Minors—Accumulation Ruling Intention—Compound Interest.—In Strother v. Hull, 23 Gratt. 662, the court said: "There can be no doubt, as a general rule, that executors and administrators are not to be charged with compound interest; but it is as well established that this general rule will be modified when required by the nature of the trust or the express terms of the will. When the beneficiaries are minors, and accumulation for their benefit is the ruling intention of the will, compound interest will be charged, whether the fiduciary be an executor or guardian. He will be treated as having done what it was his duty to do, and his accounts will be settled as a guardian's accounts. Garrett v. Carr, 1 Rob. 196; same case 3 Leigh 407. * * * We think there is no material difference between the will in this case, and that in case of Garrett v. Carr; that under each alike, it was the duty of the executors to improve the estate; accumulation for the benefit of minors being the governing intention of the will."

Infants—Debts of—Liability of Real Estate.—In Gayle v. Hayes, 79 Va. 548, the court said: "The third section, ch. 127, Code 1873, relied on by appellant, has been, in one form or another, the law since March, 1842, and it was intended to make real estate legal assets for the payment of all debts. Before that time it was only bound for the payment of specialty debts. When it was enacted, and long afterwards, till 19th March, 1873, the real estate of infants was not liable to the payment of any charges of his guardian, or quasi guardian, for his maintenance or education. 1 Minor's Inst. 442; Garrett v. Carr, 1 Rob. 209; Jackson v. Jackson, 1 Gratt. 150." See foot-note to Jackson v. Jackson, 1 Gratt. 148.

of June 1832, that court, in conformity therewith, reinstated the original bill, and referred the accounts to a commissioner, to be reformed and restated as thereby directed.

Under this order, a report was made by commissioner Francis B. Dyer. The commissioner reported, that he had proceeded to separate the accounts of the executor, according to the decree; carrying into one the proceeds of the personal estate, and continuing it on the usual principal of an administration account; and carrying 198 *into the other account the hires of the slaves and the interest of the money for which the land was sold, treating the subject as if the said hires and interest were punctually paid at the end of every year; and, after deducting the whole expenses of the two wards for each current year out of that fund, carrying the excess or balance into the principal, and charging interest on it accordingly. The commissioner stated, that this seemed to him to be after the fashion of compound interest; but he considered that he was required to state the accounts in this way, by the opinion of the court of appeals, a copy of which had been furnished him.

Although the commissioner reported that he treated the subject as if the hires and interest were punctually paid at the end of every year, yet the account which he stated shews, that credits for hires were not carried into the account of the year for which they accrued, but of the year in which they were received, and that interest was not computed on the same until the end of the year in which they were received. Thus, under the date of January 21st 1818, Alexander Garrett, one of the executors, is charged "part hire Lucy 1817," $20.50. This forms part of a balance of $2671.85½ which was due the estate on the 31st of December 1818, and on which a year's interest is charged as due the 31st of December 1819.

1. Because, in stating the account as to the land fund and hires of slaves, the commissioner had charged him with compound interest, which the said defendant insisted was not warranted by the decree of the court of appeals; that decree not requiring (as he contended) that the surplus interest should be converted into principal, and made to carry interest.

2. Because, if interest is to be charged on interest in arrear, as if it had been so much money actually received, 199 *then it should be treated as money received from another debtor, and a reasonable time should be allowed for its collection and reimbursement, so that it should never be carried into the account of the year for which it is due, but should be carried into the account of the succeeding year.

3. For not giving the defendant credit for the payments made to the legatees after they came of age, at the respective dates of such payments, so as to stop interest on the sums so paid from those dates.

4. For carrying the credits for hire of slaves into the account of the year for which they accrued.

The said defendant Garrett, as executor of Dabney Minor, made exceptions similar to those made by him in his own right.

Before the decision of the court of appeals, a supplemental bill had been filed, which is mentioned in 3 Leigh 411, but the matter thereof is not there stated. It was as follows:

David Yancey of Louisa county, by his will, made the following devise and bequest: "I give to the brothers and sisters of my beloved wife, and to the children of those who are dead, to be divided in the same manner as if my said wife had died unmarried and intestate, all that part of my estate now coming to me in right of my beloved wife, from the executors of her father James Minor. I also give them, to be divided in the same way, my negro man Bartlett, the money due me from Dabney Minor by bond for the purchase of negroes which I got by my wife," &c. This will was duly admitted to record. The complainants Mary and James were children of a sister of the testator's wife, and their mother had died before the testator. They were therefore legatees under the said will; and one object of the supplemental bill was to recover what they were entitled to under the same. Another object of the supplemental bill was to assert the rights of the complainants as heirs of Mrs. Yancey.

200 *The supplemental bill set forth, that James Minor died seized of valuable real estate, to one seventh part whereof Mrs. Yancey became entitled at the death of the widow of James Minor; and Mrs. Yancey having died without children, the complainants became entitled to one sixth part of her share: that Dabney Minor, Garrett Minor and Launcelot Minor are the executors of James Minor: that from the time of Mrs. Yancey's death, Dabney Minor has had in possession her part of the said real estate (called lot no. 2), and has had in cultivation a large proportion of the same; and that the rents of the same would, the complainants believe, amount to a considerable sum, if properly estimated. Dabney Minor, in his own right and as executor of Richard H. Allen, and Dabney Minor and Launcelot Minor the surviving executors of James Minor, were made defendants.

Dabney Minor, by his answer, admitted that James Minor and his widow Mary left seven children, of whom Mrs. Allen was one, and Mrs. Yancey another. He stated, that upon a bill in chancery by Yancey and wife in the county court of Albemarle, a division was made of the real and personal estates of James and Mary Minor, and the proportion of Yancey and wife was allotted to them: that afterwards he purchased of Yancey, at the prices fixed on them by the commissioners, all the slaves except Bartlett (Yancey having removed him to Louisa): that it was also agreed he should take of said Yancey, at the price fixed by the said commissioners, the lot no. 2, (160 acres of land), he Minor owning most of the other lots; but before any conveyance of the same was made, Mrs. Yancey died without issue, and Yancey admitted he had only a life estate in the land, and could not make a conveyance of the same to him Minor: that after the death of Yancey, he proposed to all of those interested, except the complainants, who were infants, to take the boy Bartlett and the lot of land, at the valuation fixed by the commis-

201 sioners, and interest on the same, to which they readily agreed, and he had accounted with the respective parties interested for the same, crediting the estate of Richard H. Allen on account thereof; and that the balance appearing due on that account had been paid, without any dissatisfaction on their part in relation to this matter, till the filing of the supplemental bill: notwithstanding all which, the defendant is willing that the land and negro Bartlett be divided, and the part of each of the complainants allotted them respectively; they refunding him the money paid them for the same, with interest, and compensating him for his improvements on the land.

Under an order made upon the supplemental bill, commissioner Dyer took an account of the rents and profits of the lot no. 2, and of the slave Bartlett. Various witnesses being examined before the commissioner as to the annual value of the lot and slave, he took the average of their estimates, and put the annual value of the lot at 60 dollars 36 cents, and of the slave at 56 dollars 50 cents. He charged interest on the annual value of the lot and slave, from the end of the year from which the estimate was made, to the first day of July 1834, the day to which his account was made up. And after making such charges as seemed to the commissioner proper because of the credits previously given by Minor on account of the lot and slave, one sixth of the balance was reported by the commissioner to be due the plaintiffs.

In the court below, the original bill and the supplemental bill were treated as two causes. On the 21st of November 1834, they came on to be heard together. In the first suit, the court, sustaining the defendant's exceptions, recommitted the report to the commissioner, to reform and restate the same according to the decree of the court of appeals as understood by the circuit court, to wit: keeping the accounts of the personal estate distinct from the land and hire 202 fund, and stating *it upon the principles applicable to administration accounts; and stating the land and hire fund upon the principles of a guardian's account, in which the disbursements for the expenses of the wards are to be defrayed out of the annual interest of the fund and hires of the slaves, taking care not to carry the surplus of interest to the principal, so as to subject the guardian to compound interest, as had been done by the commissioner incorrectly (the court thought) in his statement of that fund. In the second suit, the court also recommitted the report to the commissioner, to reconsider the same, and make two special statements according to the pretensions of both parties.

The account which was to be stated upon the principle of an administration account, having been pronounced by the circuit court, at the time of its decree of the 21st of November 1834, to be correctly stated, the commissioner did not, after that decree, make any change in that account. The other account in the first suit, to wit, of the land fund and hire of slaves, the commissioner proceeded to state upon the principles directed by the circuit court, in accordance with its interpretation of the decision of the court of appeals. In the second suit, special statements were made as directed.

The causes came on to be heard the 26th of November 1836, upon the report of the commissioner, and exceptions by Garrett, as executor of Minor, to so much thereof as related to the accounts in the first suit. Whereupon the court, sustaining the first and second of those exceptions, whereby the balance reported against Minor's executor in the first suit was reduced to the sum of 20 dollars 48½ cents as of the 9th of April 1822, decreed against Minor's executor that balance, with interest from the said 9th of April 1822: and there being no exception in the first suit to the account of Garrett in his own right and as executor of Allen, the court decreed against him the balance of 319 dollars 93 cents 203 *appearing due thereby, with interest on 229 dollars 69 cents, part thereof, from the 31st of December 1824. In the second suit, the court pronounced the opinion that the plaintiffs had never been divested of their right to one sixth of the lot of land and one sixth of the slave Bartlett, and were therefore entitled to a due proportion of the rents and hires of the same; but the court held the plaintiffs not to be entitled to interest on the rents and hires, as they were estimated and conjectural. A statement being made on these principles, shewing due from Garrett, as executor of Minor, the sum of 554 dollars 66 cents, with interest thereon from the first day of January 1811, and also the sum of 516 dollars 13 cents, with interest from the day of the decree, the same was decreed accordingly. The court further decreed, in the original suit, that the plaintiffs pay their own costs, and pay unto Garrett the costs expended by him about his defence in his own right; and in the supplemental case, that Garrett, as executor of Minor, pay to the plaintiffs their costs.

On the petition of the plaintiffs, an appeal was allowed them.

Cooke, for appellants. The former decision of the court of appeals would have been proper, though the will had been less plain and explicit than it is. That decision is in accordance with the true intent and meaning of the statute concerning guardians, 1 R. C. p. 408, § 9, under which the annual balance on the guardianship account is to be ascertained, and if the same appear against the guardian, it is to be "put out to interest for the benefit of the ward; or the guardian, if it remain in his hands, shall account for the interest:" in other words, if the balance remain in his hands, he is to be charged with interest on it. With this statute, and with the former decree of this court, commissioner Dyer complied, in the report made by him 204 under the *order of the fourth of June 1832; and the first exception to that report ought not to have been sustained. Neither ought the second; because, it being the duty of the guardian on the one hand to pay, and on the other to receive, the interest when it accrued, we are not to presume that he did not perform that duty. The third exception alone was properly sustained; the fourth not being founded in fact. With respect to the matters arising on the supplemental bill, it is as just, where the land of a ward is occupied or his slave possessed by the guardian, that interest should go on the annual value, as it is, where the land is rented or the slave hired to another, that interest shall go on the rent and hire received.

Michie, for appellees. The decree of the court of appeals directing the account to be settled on the principle of guardians' accounts, does not contemplate its being settled on the principle of compounding the interest, but the reverse of that. The opinion delivered by the president declares that the guardian shall account on the principle of debtor and creditor. And in reference to debtor and creditor, it has been repeatedly decided that the interest shall never be compounded, so as to increase the principal and make the interest bear interest. Childers v. Deane & c., 4 Rand. 406. This case, and the cases cited by judge Carr in his opinion, shew the aversion of the courts to the compounding of interest. Even a contract by which interest in futuro is to be compounded will not be sanctioned. And under some circumstances, a bond for the interest which has accrued will be deemed usurious. If these be the principles in regard to the ordinary case of debtor and creditor, what is there in this case to induce a stricter rule? The decisions of this court in relation to guardians do not require it. Tabb v. Boyd, 4 Call 453; Carter's ex'ors v. Cutting and wife, 5 Munf. 223. All that this court has said is, that the disburse-205 ments must be *out of the income, and interest calculated on the balance. It has never said that the principal and interest shall be compounded, so as to make the interest bear interest. There is no ground for compounding, unless the statute concerning guardians requires it. Does that statute require it? The ninth section relates entirely to the case of the disbursements exceeding the profits, and a sale to raise the deficiency; and when it speaks of "the balance appearing on the contrary side," it means the balance of the proceeds of sale. How is this case stronger than the case of interest due on a debt which the guardian neglects to collect? Surely, in the case just supposed, the guardian would not be charged with interest on the interest. But the appellants go further. They claim interest on the conjectural rents of land and conjectural hires of a slave, against an adversary claimant. This claimant, we are told, stood in the relation of guardian. But this will not sustain the claim. In Colton v. Bragg, 15 East 223, the court decided that interest shall in all cases depend on the contract of the parties. The difference between the english courts and the american is, that the american more often imply a contract to pay interest. But there must be such contract, either express or implied, to authorize interest to be allowed. And here, no such contract can be implied. The statement on the other side, that the fourth exception is not founded in fact, is not admitted by us. In Hooper v. Royster, 1 Munf. 119, the time allowed the guardian was six months. Here, since the allowance of the 4th exception, the executor and guardian together have twelve. And this seems reasonable. Where a bond for negro hire is collected, though two or three months have elapsed, interest is not usually received. And then there must be time to invest.

C. Johnson, on the same side. Upon the question as to compound interest, regarding it as an original question, there cannot be much serious doubt; whether it be 206 *considered upon the authorities belonging to the question of compound interest, or upon the authorities in relation to guardians' accounts. But the question is presented at the outset, whether the point has been adjudged by the court of appeals in the very case. To ascertain this, we must look, not to the opinion delivered, but to the decree. And when we look to the decree, we find no such point adjudged. The decree merely directs the account of the land fund and the hire of the slave to be stated as a guardian's account. If we look into the opinion, to see the principles by which the court was guided, we find that those principles will not authorize this compounding of interest. In the opinion, two modes of settlement are referred to, as more suitable than that of settling executors' accounts; to wit, 1. the ordinary case of debtor and creditor; and 2. the case of guardian and ward. The appellees are willing to be guided by the ordinary rule of debtor and creditor, and say that under the opinion of the court of appeals, that rule ought to be applied. That the rule of debtor and creditor is the rule laid down in this case, is the interpretation of this court in Handly v. Snodgrass & others, 9 Leigh 484. Is it necessary to enquire what is the rule in the ordinary case of debtor and creditor? That has been long since perfectly understood. It is stated in 1 Rob. Prac. 257. Under it, it is not legal to charge compound interest. Lewis's ex'or v. Bacon's legatee, 3 Hen. & Munf. 89. But suppose the decree establishes that the accounts are to be settled on the principle of guardians' accounts; does any case settle that interest shall be charged as contended for here? Not the case of Carter's ex'ors v. Cutting & wife, 5 Munf. 240,—for that lays down that interest is not allowed on profits not received. The charging compound interest is, in truth, against the spirit and meaning of the statute of usury. And there is no ground on which it can be 207 sustained, unless the statute concerning guardians authorizes *it. Does this statute mean that the guardian shall pay compound interest? The 7th section requires the guardian to deliver into court an inventory "of all the estate he shall have received," and to exhibit, once in every year, "accounts of the produce of the estate, of the sales and disposition of such produce, and of the disbursements." We might here say, that outstanding interest is neither produce, nor sales of produce. But let us construe the act according to its spirit, and hold that any thing which has been received is to be embraced; still it cannot extend to outstanding interest not received. That would not be included in the account. And not being included in it, interest would not go on it as part of the balance. But suppose the interest shall be received, be included in the account, and form part of the balance: to what time is interest to go on this balance? The answer is, till the guardian pays it. These views of the statute are just and proper, even supposing the latter part of the 9th section to stand by itself, in a separate section from the part which precedes it. With respect to the claim of interest on estimated rents and hires, it may be remarked, that the attempt to charge such interest has uniformly failed. M'Connico &c. v. Curzen, 2 Call 358; Shields adm'r &c. v. Anderson &c., 3 Leigh 729; Payne v. Graves, 5 Leigh 561; Roper &c. v. Wren &c., 6 Leigh 38; Cunningham v. Flournoy, 6 Johns. Ch. Rep. 1. There is no pretence that Minor interfered as guardian with this subject. He held as tenant in common and is only chargeable, as a tenant in common would be, with interest on rents and hires actually received.

Cooke, in reply. The opinion delivered by the president when this case was formerly before the court, was concurred in by the other judges, and is based essentially upon the will of Richard H. Allen. Accumulation during a long minority is the leading idea of the will. The testator intended that the annual balances 208 *should be reinvested. And the opinion declares that the executors were bound at least to loan to good borrowers, securing interest to be reinvested. The decree does not, in terms, direct what is to be done with the surplus of interest after deducting disbursements; but it directs the account to be settled as a guardian's account. And under the act of assembly, the guardian's account is to be settled on the principle of reinvesting the balance. Neither the opinion nor the decree justifies the conclusion that the principle of debtor and creditor is to be so applied as to prevent the surplus interest from bearing interest. If a loan were made, the interest accruing from the borrower would be ascertained on the principle of debtor and creditor: but then it would be the duty of the executor to invest the aggregate sum, and get interest on that aggregate. The executors would have a reasonable time allowed them to reinvest, if they chose to reinvest. But here they have not chosen, and are not entitled to the benefit of the rule allowing time to reinvest. The argument of Mr. Michie upon the ninth section of the statute is explained and answered by adverting to the history of our legislation on the subject. The original statute did not have the provision for a sale, that is now found in the 9th section. 12 Hen. stat. at large 196. That provision was made by the act of December 1794. Sess. Acts 1794-5, p. 11, § 6. But before the act of 1794, all was contained in our statute that is now contained in the 9th section, except these words in the middle of it—"and so much and such part thereof may, with the approbation of the court, be sold at public auction to the highest bidder, after reasonable notice of the time and place of such sale has been given, as shall be necessary for that purpose." The cases cited respecting interest on estimated rents and hires, are not between guardian and ward, but are cases where there were adversary claims. Here, the statement of the 209 guardian is, that he made *himself purchaser. He admits that he had no right. As guardian, he should have returned an account of the rents and hires, and interest would have gone thereon. If he occupied and possessed, he cannot avail himself of his own wrong, either in claiming the property or otherwise, to diminish the rights of his ward.

ALLEN, J. This court, by its former decree, merely decided that these executors, under the will of their testator, were, in respect to the land fund and hires of slaves, to be treated as guardians, and their accounts to be settled on the principles of guardians' accounts. The question still remains to be determined, how a guardian's account is to be settled, where, as in this case, he has wholly neglected to return his annual settlements to the court to which he is amenable, according to law. This court, in Myers & c. v. Wade & c., 6 Rand. 444, determined, that in a suit by the awards against guardian for an account, the latter, having neglected to return annual settlements, and failed to procure the permission of the court to appropriate any part of the principal of the wards' estate to their maintenance, should not be allowed for disbursements beyond the annual interest or income. And in the case of Wormley's adm'r v. Boswell, decided at the last term and not yet reported, the court held, in a suit by the guardian against the representative of the ward, to recover disbursements beyond the receipts, that it was not competent for the chancery court to allow for such disbursements beyond the income, the guardian having neglected for many years to settle with the proper court and procure an order allowing such disbursements. The effect of these two decisions is, to secure the principal of the estate against misapplication by the guardian. In the latter case, I had occasion to review the various provisions of the law respecting guardians, for the purpose of shewing the anxiety of the legislature 210 to guard against abuse, *by enforcing annual settlements, and securing the controlling supervision of the proper court over the conduct of the guardian, whilst the transactions are recent. These cases having established principles which protect the principal of the estate against misapplication, it becomes necessary to decide in the present case, what principle shall govern in respect to balances of revenue which may remain after deducting the disbursements. This will depend in a great measure upon the terms of the act of assembly.

The 7th section of the law respecting guardians requires the guardian appointed by a court, at the first or second session after his qualification, to deliver into such court and inventory, upon oath, of all the estate he shall have received; and, within two successive courts after the receipt of any other estate of the ward, an inventory of such other estate, to be entered of record in a separate book. This provision looks to the principal of the estate, and furnishes record evidence by which to charge the guardian for the amount thereof. The law then provides that he shall annually, and at the September term, if it be a county court from which he has received his appointment, exhibit accounts of the produce of the estate, of the sales and disposition of such produce, and of the disbursements. The 8th section provides for the mode of enforcing such annual settlements; and the 9th, amongst other things, directs that the balance, after deducting disbursements, "may be put out to interest for the benefit of the ward, upon such security as the court shall direct and approve; or the guardian, if it remain in his hands, shall account for the interest, to be computed from the time his account was or ought to have been passed."

If the guardian complies with the requisitions of the law, all difficulty as to the mode of settling is avoided. His inventory shews the estate received; his annual account, the income; and he is entitled 211 to the aid and *instruction of the court as to the disposition of the surplus. This surplus of any one year, not being required for disbursements, becomes a part of the principal, and, as such, cannot be expended by the guardian to meet disbursements of succeeding years, except by the permission of the court. As a general rule, the court, looking to the benefit of the ward's estate, would direct the surplus to be either invested in stock producing an annual return, or loaned out to punctual borrowers who would pay the interest. If under any circumstances a secure investment at simple interest should be deemed advisable, the guardian, acting under the advice of the court, would be justified in making it. The money being so invested, the guardian would be held to account annually for only so much of the interest as he received. But where the guardian is guilty of neglect; where he fails to make his settlements, and keeps the money of the ward in his own hands, using it for his own purposes, how is the account to be stated? The words of the law require annual settlements; its policy looked to the constant superintendence and control of the proper court; and no principle should be adopted, which, in the case of such failure to settle, would place the guardian in a more favourable position, or hold out inducements to him to neglect his duty. For this would be enabling him to profit by his own wrong. An account should therefore be raised against him annually, and the disbursements applied to the annual receipts. This is necessary to satisfy the requisitions of the law, which requires interest to be computed from the time the account ought to have been settled. But as to the mode of computing interest upon the balances thus ascertained, I was at first under the impression that the provisions of the statute would be satisfied by adopting the mode prevailing between ordinary debtor and creditor, and permitting the debt to stand as an investment at simple interest,

For as the court, I presume, could, in the exercise of a proper discretion, and under peculiar circumstances, authorize such an investment, it seemed to me that the same indulgence might properly be extended to the guardian; and that in consequence of his failing to settle, he was to be treated as a borrower of the surplus, and should be permitted to hold it on as favourable terms as the court might have directed. The cases in this court, too, seemed to lean against the principle of compounding interest. Thus in Childers v. Deane &c., 4 Rand. 406, judge Carr, after reviewing the cases, states that the general rule, as settled by the later cases, is, that it shall not be allowed. And in the case of Carter's ex'ors v. Cutting & wife, 5 Munf. 223, the court decided, that moneys directed to be invested by executors in government securities, should be accounted for as if invested, after a reasonable time for that purpose; but that the executors ought not to be charged with interest upon the dividends of stock, if such dividends had not actually been received. The last was the case of executors; as to whom this court has established principles of great liberality. The peril which their office imposes on them; the necessity of disposing of the estate on a credit; the risk of loss from this source; the hazard of being subjected to a devastavit, by paying the assets to creditors of inferior dignity; their ignorance of the condition of the testator's estate; the exposure to loss from agents, counsel &c.—all these considerations have induced the courts in this country to relax the more rigorous rule adopted in England with respect to this class of fiduciaries. But in reality, few of the considerations applicable to executors apply to the guardian. His duty is simple. He is to receive the estate, collect the rents, hires &c. and dispose of the produce. He is not required to keep funds in hand to meet possible claims.

His disbursements are generally confined *to the support and education of the ward, and the preservation of the property. The general principle is, that a trustee using the trust money must account for all the profit of it. But where that profit is not ascertained, some mode of computation must be adopted by which to arrive at it. In Raphael v. Boehm, 11 Ves. 82, the direction was, to take an account against the executor (who was a trustee) with a computation of interest on all sums received by him, while in his hands; and that the master do, in such computation, make half yearly rests. The object of the direction was to charge compound interest. Lord Eldon remarks in that case, that "where there is an express trust to make improvement of the money, if he will not honestly endeavour to improve it, there is nothing wrong in considering him to have lent the money to himself, upon the same terms upon which he could have lent it to others, and as often as he ought to have lent it, if it be principal, and as often as he ought to have received it and lent it to others, if the demand be interest, and interest upon interest." And in another place, that "the court would shamefully desert its duty to infants, by adopting a rule that an executor might keep money in his hands without being answerable as if he had accumulated." These remarks apply with great force to the case under consideration; where the estate was considerable, the wards young, and accumulation for their benefit is the governing intention of the will. But they apply with almost the same force to the case of every guardian who acts under our law, which has guarded the interests of wards with so much jealous caution. This case was reheard before lord Erskine, 13 Ves. 407, and he fully concurred with lord Eldon. The subject was very fully considered by chancellor Kent, 1 Johns. Ch. Rep. 620, who there held, that if an executor convert the trust moneys to his own use, or employ them in his business or trade, he is chargeable with compound interest. After 214 shewing the injustice *which would be done to the infants by denying compound interest, he observes—"The fund, instead of accumulating for the benefit of the infants, would accumulate for his benefit. A man in trade could afford a large premium for letters of administration on a rich estate, especially if the infant heirs were young. What temptation would thus be held out for negligence and delay in rendering an account!" In the case of Childers v. Deane &c. judges Green and Carr both admit there are many cases in which the taking of compound interest is lawful. Judge Carr says, "There are still some special circumstances, under which compound interest is allowed; as where a settlement of accounts takes place after interest becomes due, and an agreement is then made, that interest due shall thereafter carry interest." This is, in effect, the precise condition in which the guardian neglecting to settle under our law is placed by the law. He should have settled; and the law treats him as though he had settled. The balance in his hands is a debt then ascertained to be due to the ward, and is to be loaned out for his benefit. Being retained by the guardian, he is to be treated as the borrower, and is to pay interest. Borrowing from himself, he guarantees the punctuality of the borrower. It would be unjust to the ward, to permit the guardian to apply the current income of the year to defray his own disbursements, whilst at the same time he was a debtor to his ward for the interest then due on former balances. This is conceded by the decree in this case, which applies the disbursements to the interest. But the excess of interest is as much a debt as that which is so extinguished. As between debtor and creditor, the latter may permit it to remain a dead capital in the debtor's hands: this is matter of contract between them. But the statute requires annual settlements; thereby, as it seems to me, requiring annual investments. A contrary principle would violate the spirit of the act, 215 which *not only for the purpose of investing these balances, but to ensure the constant superintendence of the court over the proceedings of the guardian, enjoins annual settlements, and even subjects the judge and justices to amercement for neglect in enforcing them. A premium would be held out to omit the performance of this duty. The contrary rule subjects the guardian to no hardship. When he settles his account, the balance due is invested under the order of the court, and all responsibility is avoided. Though, under special circumstances, the court might authorize an investment at simple interest, such cases would be rare in our country, where money is always in demand. Little difficulty would be found in lending, on good security, to individuals willing to pay the interest annually; especially when, if they did so, they would be permitted to retain the principal in their hands for a long period. The guardian at least should not, by his election to retain the money, deprive the ward of the chances of such a profit.

I think, therefore, that the chancellor erred in sustaining the exceptions to the first report on this ground. That report, however, was erroneous in not crediting the payments to the legatees after the termination of the guardianship, as of their respective dates, so as to stop interest pro tanto at those dates. With that exception, it should have been confirmed.

As to the matters involved in the supplemental bill: The subject in controversy did not come into the hands of Dabney Minor as executor of Richard H. Allen. It was an increment to the estate of the wards, accruing after the death of their father, from a source distinct from his estate. I think the account should be kept separate from the accounts of Dabney Minor as executor of that estate. He held the land and slave under an arrangement with the other heirs and legatees of Mrs. Yancey and her husband, by which he purchased their interests in the subject at 216 a stipulated price; and *he charged himself, in his account with his wards, with their proportion of the same subject. It is admitted that he had no right to do this; that it was not in his power, by a charge in his books, to appropriate to himself the estate of his wards. And the question arises, how his account respecting this subject is to be adjusted. In the opinion delivered in this case by the president of the court, he observes (3 Leigh 417,) that "one of the parties" (meaning Dabney Minor) "seems to have been the actual, though not indeed the legal guardian of the children; and he who so acts, ought to be charged as such. It is absurd to suppose that he can be justified in doing that which even the legal guardian cannot do. It is for his own benefit to consider him as sustained in his acts, as quasi guardian. In tenderness to him, he is justified in doing what the guardian might do; but upon no principle is he justified in doing more." Treating this defendant then as actual guardian, his duty required him to deliver into court an inventory of any other estate belonging to his ward, and afterwards to settle his annual accounts of the produce. This he failed to do: but the court, upon the principles already adverted to, must settle with him as though he had performed his duty. In adjusting the account, it must treat him as if he had returned an inventory of this additional estate, and in his annual settlements had charged himself with the hires of slaves and rent of land. The surplus of such rents and hires, upon the principles already discussed, must be brought into the account, and bear interest. Otherwise the defaulting guardian would be in a better condition than he would have been if he had complied with his duty. The rule which in most cases denies interest on conjectural hires and rents, ought not to be extended to such a case; for that would be to hold out an inducement to guardians to neglect their duty in rendering accounts. It therefore seems to me, that this account should 217 be settled upon precisely *the same principles which govern the other; that annual rests should be made in the account, and the balances be added to the principal, so as to constitute an interest-bearing fund; and that the account should be so stated and settled until the wards respectively arrived at age or married, or the guardianship terminated, from which period the account should be stated upon the ordinary principles between debtor and creditor.

CABELL, P. The decree of this court, which remanded these causes to the court below for the purpose of reforming and restating the accounts, having directed that "the accounts of the land fund and the hires of slaves" should be stated and treated "as guardians' accounts," the question now arises whether those directions have been complied with; or in other words, whether those accounts have been stated and settled upon the principles which ought to govern the statement and settlement of guardians' accounts.

The appellants insist, that these accounts should be stated and settled annually; that, at every annual statement and settlement, the excess of interest due from the guardian, over and above the expenses of the ward, should be so charged to the guardian, as that it may become an interest-bearing fund until the next annual settlement; that then, if the interest due from the guardian should again exceed the expenses of the ward, the excess of such interest should again be so charged as to become an interest-bearing fund as aforesaid; and so on, toties quoties, until the final settlement of the accounts.

I am of opinion that the claim of the appellants to have the accounts thus stated and settled is just in itself, and is sanctioned and required by the obvious spirit, if not by the express terms, of the act of assembly.

218 *The 7th section of the act concerning guardians and wards requires every guardian to exhibit to the court in which he qualified, "once in every year, accounts of the produce of the estate, of the sales and disposition of such produce, and of the disbursements; which accounts shall be examined by the court, or by such persons as the court shall refer them to."

The importance which the law attaches to these annual settlements is manifested by the provisions of the 8th section, which declares that every guardian who fails to render such accounts as are required by the 7th section, "shall, by order of the court to which he is amenable, be summoned, and if he remain in default, be compelled to perform his duty, or be displaced:" and, what is not a little remarkable, the act goes on to declare, that "every judge or justice of the court, sitting therein at any time during the term of session in which such process ought to have been ordered, if it be not ordered accordingly, shall be amerced."

Then comes the 9th section, which provides, that "if the disbursements of such guardian, being suitable to the estate and circumstances of the ward, shall exceed the profits of his or her estate in any year, the balance, with the allowance of the said court, may be debited in the account of a succeeding year, and paid out of the personal estate of the infant. And the balance appearing on the contrary side may be put out to interest for the benefit of the ward, upon such security as the court shall direct and approve; or the guardian, if it remain in his hands, shall account for the interest, to be computed from the time his account was or ought to have been passed."

It is clear, then, that the law requires annual settlements, on which a balance shall be struck, in order that that balance, if found in favour of the ward, may be made an interest-bearing fund for the benefit of the ward, either by actually putting 219 it out to interest, or *making the guardian, if it remain in his hands, accountable for the interest.

Suppose, then, a guardian, honestly desiring to comply with the law, shall, at the first proper court, exhibit his accounts for settlement. At this first settlement no question can arise as to a charge of interest against the guardian, because no interest can as yet have become due from him as guardian. But all must admit that if on this settlement a balance shall be found in favour of the ward, the guardian becomes accountable for interest on that balance, if it remain in his hands, to be computed from the time his account was passed.

Let us next see what is to be done at the second regular annual settlement, when the guardian, as before, actually exhibits his accounts.

He will, of course, credit himself with all his proper disbursements; and he ought to debit himself with every item of "the produce of the estate;" an expression sufficiently broad to include not only the proceeds of crops, hires of slaves, &c. but all sums of money belonging to the ward and received by the guardian, from whatever source they may have come. It will clearly embrace money which he has actually received; as interest on a debt, from a debtor of the ward. It will also, in my opinion, embrace any interest due to the ward from the guardian, as guardian, at the date of the settlement. Such interest may emphatically be said to be, in the language of the 9th section of the act, a part of the "profits" of the ward's estate; and being due from the guardian, and in his own hands, the policy of the law and the dictates of justice require that it should be charged to him in the annual settlement, in order that the excess of interest beyond the expenditures may be converted into an interest-bearing fund for the benefit of the ward. I can perceive no difference in 220 principle between interest due from him as *guardian, and actually in his own hands, and interest which he may have received from a debtor of the ward.

The surplus of interest due from the guardian at the date of the second settlement, being thus converted into principal bearing interest, what disposition is to be made, at the third regular annual settlement, as to the interest which may have then accrued upon it? If we bear in mind that the law requires annual settlements at the hands of guardians, in order that each successive balance in favour of the ward (of whatever it may consist) may become an interest-bearing fund for the benefit of the ward, we cannot avoid the conclusion, that the interest which has accrued on the balance found due from the guardian at the date of the second settlement, must be charged to him in the third. It is in this way only, that the just and beneficent object of the legislature can be effected. And the same principles of justice and policy, which thus govern the second and third settlements, will apply to and must govern all succeeding settlements, until the termination of the guardianship, by the ward arriving to age, or otherwise.

If such be the principles which are applicable to guardians' accounts, when the guardians settle regularly according to the requisitions of the law, what shall be done in the case of guardians who (as in the present case) disregarded the law, and exhibit no accounts until they are called upon by their wards, in a court of equity, for a final settlement of their transactions? It would indeed be a strange anomaly if a court of equity should treat such guardians with more indulgence than is extended to those who have faithfully and punctually obeyed the law. It would be to offer a premium for negligence, and something for dishonesty. All that the courts can be expected to do in such cases, is to have the accounts stated with annual rests, and to have them settled upon the same principles as would have governed the settlement if the guardians had regularly and 221 *annually exhibited their accounts; always charging them with interest from the time when they would have been accountable for it if the accounts had been in fact settled. This is justice to the ward; and although it may operate with hardship upon the guardian, he has no right to complain of it; for it is the result of his own culpable violation of a positive duty. If he wishes to avoid the hardship of the operation, let him settle up his accounts, carry the balance due from him into court, and request that it may be put out to interest, under the direction of the court.

It will be observed, that my opinion has been formed by an exclusive regard to the provisions of our law concerning guardians and wards. It derives additional strength from the case referred to by judge Allen, which shew, that even in the settlement of executors' accounts, interest due from them is sometimes converted into principal.

I am further of opinion that the accounts in relation to the estate or interests claimed by the appellants in their supplemental bill, ought also to be stated and treated as guardians' accounts; Dabney Minor having, by his acts in relation to said interests, made himself guardian de facto.

I am farther of opinion that the case of a guardian indebted to his ward for estimated rents of land and hires of slaves, forms a just exception to the general rule, that interest is not to be allowed on estimated rents and hires. We have seen that even the surplus of interest due from a guardian, over and above the expenses of the ward, is to be carried into the accounts, so as to become an interest-bearing fund; and surely the guardian cannot claim to stand on higher grounds as to estimated rents and hires due from himself. They should be carried into the accounts at the annual settlements, and become thenceforward an interest-bearing fund, as in the case of other balances.

222 *BROOKE, J., concurring, the decree of the court of appeals was to the following effect:

The court is of opinion that the circuit court erred in sustaining the first, second, fourth and fifth exceptions of the defendant to the report of commissioner Francis B. Dyer, made in pursuance of the decretal order made in the first suit on the fourth day of June 1832; and also erred in the second suit, in considering that the plaintiffs were not entitled to interest on their share of rents and hires, but only to the principal money: Therefore decreed that the said decree be reversed, and that the appellee pay to the appellants their costs by them expended in the prosecution of their appeal here. And the cause is remanded to the circuit court, with instructions to recommit the accounts to a commissioner of said court, to be restated; who is to be instructed, in settling the account of the land fund and hires of slaves (in the first cause), to charge the defendants respectively with the hires actually received, or for which they were accountable, and with the interest due from them on the sums in their hands at the end of every year; and after deducting the disbursements properly chargeable to the wards, for each current year, out of that fund, the balance to be carried to the principal, and interest to be charged on it accordingly, to the period when *the wards arrived at age after which the account is to be stated on the ordinary principles as between debtor and creditor: and in the second case, to state and settle the accounts with annual rests, upon the principles which apply to guardians' accounts; carrying the interest of the money fund and estimated rent and hires due from the guardian, at each annual settlement, to the principal, and

*The decree, as entered in the order book, used the words in italics; but the words "the guardianship terminated" would have expressed more correctly the meaning of the judges as indicated in their opinions.—Note in Original Edition.

223 charging interest* *thereon thenceforward accordingly, until the wards arrived at age;† from which latter period the account is to be stated as between ordinary debtor and creditor.

*Note by the reporter. Some of the points adjudged on the supplemental bill are not without precedent, even in England. In Quarrell v. Beckford, 1 Madd. Ch. Rep. p. 268 of eng. ed. and p. 151 of am. ed. it appeared, on taking an account between a mortgagee in possession and the mortgagor, that the former had been overpaid; and it was claimed that he should account for what had been overpaid, with interest. It was admitted on both sides, that the question as to interest was perfectly new. The vicechancellor (sir Thomas Plumer) considered it on principle altogether, and held that the mortgagee was to be charged with interest. He so held, upon the ground that the mortgagee, as soon as he was paid, was a mere trustee, holding the legal estate for the benefit of his cestui que trust, the mortgagor, with whom he was bound, by the nature of his trust, faithfully to account. "The case," says the vicechancellor, "is assimilated to a simple contract debt which does not carry interest; it is compared also to the case of mesne profits improperly received by a trespasser; in which cases, it is clear, the courts of law and equity are not in the habit of charging the party with interest. What analogy do these cases bear to the present? The main point here does not exist in those cases; viz. a sum due from a trustee to a cestui que trust. The mesne profits are received by an adverse holder, by a trespasser, where there is no privity between the one and the other; but here the profits are received under an implied contract by the mortgagee to account. That is not like the case of a trespasser receiving mesne profits. This mortgagee received the rents as trustee. He received them to pay himself first, and afterwards to account to the mortgagor. He has therefore made himself liable to account. A relation is established as between trustee and cestui que trust, and the moment the mortgage is paid off, he is converted into the situation of a bare naked trustee. All the money received from that time is money received by a trustee, having a legal estate in his hands, and receiving the rents and profits of such estate, which he holds as trustee for another." In Wilson v. Metcalfe, 1 Russ. 580, the mortgagees were in the occupation of part of the mortgaged premises, and in the receipt of the rents and profits of the remainder. In respect to the part in their occupation, an occupation rent was directed to be fixed by the master. When his report came in, it appeared that the mortgagees had been long overpaid. And then the question was made, whether the court 224 could order annual rests *to be made in the account of the occupation rent, as well as of the other rents and profits of the mortgaged premises, and interest to be computed against the mortgagees. The master of the rolls (lord Gifford) had no doubt on this question. "If," said he, "a mortgagee, receiving the rents of a mortgaged estate after his debt has been satisfied, does not immediately pay them over to the mortgagor, but retains them to his own use, he is availing himself of another man's money, and ought to be charged with interest. Is his situation substantially different, when he is in the actual occupation of the mortgaged premises? Though he is not in receipt of rent, he is, in fact, in receipt of profits; and these he keeps in his pocket. What the master has done in fixing an occupation rent of these premises, has merely been, to estimate the fair yearly rent which an occupier ought to pay for them; he does not consider what ought to be done in respect of the rent having been retained for many years by the actual occupier." It was therefore referred back to the master, to make annual rests in the account of the rents received by the mortgagees, and the occupation rent due from them, and to compute interest after the rate of 4 per centum per annum upon such rents and occupation rents. These decisions sustain the court of appeals, 1. in allowing interest upon the yearly value of the land and slave of the ward, possessed by the guardian; and 2. in making annual rests, so that interest may be computed from the end of every year, upon the value for that year. To what time the interest on such value should be computed; whether until payment, without any compounding; or only until the end of a year, so as to make the surplus interest beyond the disbursements of the year an interest-bearing fund,—was a question in this case, depending upon the interpretation of the statute concerning guardians.

(Absent BROOKE and BALDWIN,* J.)

Joint Tenants—Interest Inter Se of Joint Purchasers of Land.—A tract of land is purchased by a bricklayer and carpenter, who are to pay part of the price in money at stipulated times, and the rest in a house to be erected by them. The work to be done by each is agreed upon between them, and they commence its execution: but the carpenter, from misfortune in business, becomes unable to comply with his portion of the agreement. Thereupon a new agreement is made, that the carpenter shall cover in the house, and that for the work he has done, and for covering the house, he shall be allowed the value thereof, and receive that amount in land out of the tract. The carpenter nevertheless fails to cover in the house, and the bricklayer has this part of the work done. HELD, 1. that by the new agreement, the carpenter's interest in the land is such proportion thereof, as the amount of work then done, and under that agreement to be done by him, was of the original price of the land; and 2. that this proportion is charged to the bricklayer with the value of the work which under that agreement ought to have been, but was not, done by the carpenter.

Same—Redemption—Purchase by One Tenant of Other Tenant's Interest.—The carpenter makes a deed of trust conveying his interest in the land to secure two persons, sureties for him in a bond, one of whom is the bricklayer. Being afterwards taken in execution at the suit of other creditors, the carpenter is discharged as an insolvent debtor, and his interest in the land is sold by the sheriff, and purchased, at the price of 50 cents, for the bricklayer. The bricklayer afterwards declares that the carpenter shall have such benefit from the land as his work entitles him to, and upon applying to his cosurety in the bond to contribute to the satisfaction thereof, states that he does not mean to keep the land for what it sold for; that he wants no advantage of that kind. The cosurety makes contribution. Eleven years afterwards, upon a bill in equity being filed by the carpenter, the bricklayer insists that the sale by the sheriff is valid. HOLD, the carpenter is entitled to redeem the interest sold by the sheriff; and a decree should be made for partition of the land, so as to 226 assign him his due proportion, holding the same chargeable with such amount *as may be ascertained to be due the bricklayer, after crediting him for the value of the work done by him that ought to have been done by the carpenter, the sum paid by him in discharge of his suretyship, and the 50 cents paid the sheriff, and debiting him with such portion of the rents and profits as the interest of the carpenter in the land entitles him to.

On the 28th of February 1818, articles of agreement were entered into between James M'Dowell Moffett of the one part and Dabney Cosby and William Lambert of the other part, whereby it was witnessed that Moffett had bargained and sold to Cosby and Lambert a tract of land in Augusta county. Possession of the land was to be immediately delivered, and Moffett bound himself to convey the land to Cosby and Lambert on demand. In consideration of which, Cosby and Lambert bound themselves to pay to Moffett the sum of 5600 dollars in manner following, to wit: 4455 dollars as full consideration for certain building agreed to be done by Cosby and Lambert for Moffett; and the residue to be paid in six equal instalments, commencing on the first day of October 1820; the payment of the said instalments, and the performance of the said contract on the part of Cosby and Lambert, to be secured by a lien on the land sold.

About the same time, to wit, in March 1818, articles were entered into between Cosby and Lambert, the former of whom was a bricklayer and the latter a carpenter, by which, after reciting the purchase of land from Moffett for 5600 dollars, for part of which they were to do work and for the residue whereof they had given their joint bonds, it was set forth, that Lambert was to find all his own materials, locks, nails, glass &c. and do his part, for 2055 dollars, and that Cosby was to do the brick work and plaistering, and find his own materials &c. for 2000 dollars, and that the painting, which was estimated at 400 dollars, was to be done at their joint expense.

227 *On the 12th of November 1819, a new agreement was made between Cosby and Lambert, whereby, after reciting the preceding contracts, and setting forth, that from unexpected misfortune in business, Lambert had become unable to comply with his portion of the agreement, it was agreed that Lambert should proceed forthwith to cover in the dwelling house mentioned in the contract, in the true spirit of the contract, and then be released from any further obligations imposed on him thereby;

and that, for the work he had theretofore done agreeably to contract, materials furnished, and covering in the dwelling house, he Lambert should be allowed their value, and receive that amount in land, out of the tract before mentioned. Cosby agreed, on his part, to perform all the covenants of Lambert in the agreement aforesaid, except as before excepted, and to receive, as full compensation therefor, the residue of the land.

On the 16th of November 1819, William Lambert made a deed of trust to Erasmus Stribling, conveying his interest in the land to indemnify Cosby and Abraham Lambert in consequence of their having become bound, on the 9th of November 1819, as sureties for William Lambert in a bond to Silas H. Smith for 585 dollars 20 cents, payable one half on the 9th of November 1820, and the residue one year thereafter, with interest from the date of the bond. This deed was admitted to record in the office of Augusta county, on the 27th of February 1821.

Before it was admitted to record, judgments had been obtained against Lambert, and he had been compelled to take the oath of insolvency. At the time of his being discharged as an insolvent debtor, to wit, on the 27th of December 1820, Lambert made a deed to J. M'Nutt sheriff of Augusta county, conveying, besides a moiety of another tract of land in Augusta, his interest in the tract conveyed by Moffett. This deed was admitted to record a few days after its date.

228 *On the 26th of February 1821, a deed was made, purporting to be between James M'Nutt sheriff of Augusta county, of the one part, and Henry J. Tapp of the other part, wherein it was set forth that John Churchman, a deputy for M'Nutt, had, on a court day, advertised the lands conveyed by Lambert to the sheriff, and had afterwards, pursuant to the advertisement and to the act of assembly, proceeded to sell the same, and that Henry J. Tapp became the purchaser of Lambert's interest in the second tract conveyed by the deed, at 50 cents, (the other tract, to wit, that first named in the deed, not being sold for want of bidders). Thereupon the deed witnessed that M'Nutt sheriff as aforesaid, by his said deputy, in consideration of the said sum of 50 cents, conveyed to Tapp the said Lambert's interest in the said tract of land acquired by Cosby and Lambert from Moffett. The deed stated in the conclusion thereof, that M'Nutt sheriff as aforesaid, by Churchman his deputy, had thereunto set his hand and seal. And it was accordingly signed, "James M'Nutt S. A. C. by John Churchman deputy."

The purchase at the sheriff's sale, though in the name of Tapp, was for Cosby.

Some months after the sale by the sheriff, in a conversation between Cosby and another person, the latter remarked that he thought Lambert was badly treated at the sale; to which Cosby replied that the land was bought in with the intention that Lambert should have the benefit of it, so far as his work and materials would entitle him thereto. He said it was not intended to take any advantage of Lambert.

In 1822, judgment was entered in the county court of Augusta against Cosby on the bond to Smith, wherein Cosby and Abraham Lambert were co-obligors with William Lambert. An execution having issued the 8th of April 1822, returnable to May court following, Cosby, on the 15th of May, addressed a letter to Abraham 229 ham *Lambert, urging him to contribute promptly to the satisfaction of the judgment, and concluding in these terms: "William has sent word to me to know if I meant to keep his part of the land for the amount sold for. I have said, no, I did not. I repeat the same to you. I want no pitiful advantage of that kind, and I request you not to let me suffer."

For part of the bond to Smith, to wit, 100 dollars, Cosby was principal debtor. For the residue thereof, he and Abraham Lambert were cosureties. The latter contributed, on the 5th of August 1822, on account of the debt, the sum of 229 dollars 39 cents.

On the 20th of January 1823, Cosby addressed a letter to Lambert, commencing thus: "I am endeavouring to prepare my Moffett accounts for a general settlement, and I wish you to say how long you consider me bound for the hire of your boys, whether from the time they quit Moffett's work, or whether until they were free." After some other remarks, he says, "I shall have the painting done this spring, and endeavour to settle as shortly thereafter as possible."

Having paid off the creditors at whose suit he took the oath of insolvency, Lambert, in November 1833, exhibited a bill in the circuit court of Augusta against Cosby, wherein, after setting forth the contracts of February and March 1818 and of November 1819, he stated, that his affairs requiring him to remove to Shenandoah county, he found it inconvenient to cover in the dwelling house, and Cosby consented to relieve him from that part of his engagement, and employed a person to do that part of the work. That the work done and materials furnished by the complainant amounted to a considerable sum; and he exhibits an account of the same. That the complainant had been under the necessity of taking the oath of insolvency, and his interest in the land had been sold by the sheriff. That the complainant had no notice of the 230 sale, and was not present when *it occurred. That he does not know whether it was conducted in the mode prescribed by law, and he requires evidence on the subject. That Cosby became the purchaser of the complainant's interest for the paltry sum of 50 cents, though no one knew its real value better than himself. That since the sale, Cosby has disclaimed all intention of keeping said property from the complainant, but has never made him any compensation. That the complainant was for a considerable time prevented from seeking redress against Cosby in a court of justice, by his the complainant's embarrassed circumstances, the distant residence of Cosby, and the hope, encouraged by his repeated declarations, that he would adjust the matter amicably. The prayer of the bill was, that the complainant's account for his work, materials, and other advances about the buildings, might be stated and settled before a commissioner; that the last contract between him and Cosby might be specifically executed; that Cosby might be compelled to surrender and convey to him a due proportion of the land, if to be had, and if not, to pay in money what is due the complainant, with interest thereon; and for general relief.

The cause coming on to be heard upon the bill taken for confessed, and exhibits, the court made an order referring the accounts between the parties to a commissioner.

Cosby afterwards filed his answer, denying that he ever consented to release the plaintiff from the contract of the 12th of November 1819, and stating on the contrary, that the plaintiff, without his consent, violated it, and left him to have the building covered and the work completed in the best manner he could, whereby he was subjected to great disappointment and loss. The answer controverted the correctness of the plaintiff's account, and stated the conviction of the defendant that on a fair and 231 full settlement the plaintiff would be *largely his debtor. The lapse of time and loss of evidence, the defendant feared, would render it impossible to make such a settlement; and he insisted upon the statute of limitations. The plaintiff, he contended, could not claim under the contract, but only on a quantum meruit, so much as his work &c. were worth; and such a claim, the defendant insisted, was clearly barred. He further objected to the jurisdiction of equity, insisting that the plaintiff could only proceed at law. The answer did not admit that the plaintiff was prevented from sooner impeaching the sale by any of the causes mentioned in the bill, but required proof of the same. The defendant averred that the sale was fair; alleged that the interest of Lambert sold for its full value; and insisted that the sale was in every respect legal and valid, and that after such a lapse of time, it ought not to be disturbed. He stated, that he had long been under the impression that he was the purchaser at the sale; but it appeared by the records that Henry J. Tapp became the purchaser, and that the sheriff conveyed to him; and the heirs of Tapp, he said, should therefore be made parties. The defendant acknowledged that he had hitherto claimed and possessed the land, and stated that he was sure Tapp never intended to claim any interest in it. He supposed that Tapp, being a friend and near connexion of his, happening to be at the sale, bought the land to protect his the defendant's interest. The defendant denied having disclaimed to hold under the purchase without settlement or remuneration. He supposed that he might have said, that if the complainant would settle fairly and pay the money due, he was willing the complainant should take a fair proportion of the land. But no such declaration, he urged, could give the complainant any right, since he declined acting upon it when a fair settlement was practicable.

232 *The commissioner made a report, stating a balance due the plaintiff of 425 dollars 35 cents, with interest from the 5th of August 1822, and that if the plaintiff should be considered entitled to interest on his claim anterior to the 5th of August 1822, then the balance on that day would be 548 dollars 59 cents, bearing interest from that time.

It appeared by a certificate of the clerk of Augusta county court, that Cosby and wife, on the 5th of May 1824, conveyed to Samuel Todd 100 acres, part of the tract conveyed by Moffett.

The cause came on to be heard the 26th of November 1836; and there being no exception to the report of the commissioner, the court affirmed the same, declared that the plaintiff was entitled to recover agreeably to the second statement therein, and further declared that as the defendant has sold and conveyed the land, or part thereof, the said plaintiff had a right to receive compensation in money. Thereupon the court decreed that the defendant pay to the plaintiff the sum of 548 dollars 59 cents, with interest thereon from the 5th of August 1822 till paid, and the costs of suit; subject however to a deduction of 50 cents, the price at which the land was sold by the sheriff of Augusta county, with interest thereon from the 4th monday in January 1821, which sum of 50 cents was to be retained by the defendant without prejudice to any claim thereto on the part of the representatives of Tapp. And the court declared that the decree was without prejudice to any claim on the part of the plaintiff to subject the land in the hands of the purchaser or any other person, if payment could not be coerced from the defendant.

On the petition of Cosby, an appeal was allowed.

Michie for appellant. By the statute 1 R. C. p. 538, § 34, the interest of Lambert in the land became vested in the sheriff of Augusta county. Being so vested, 233 *whatever sale the debtor could have made, the sheriff might make; whatever interest the debtor could have passed, the sheriff might pass. The sheriff may do more than the debtor. He may part with an interest which the debtor could not dispose of; for example, where the debtor has made a deed valid between the parties. Not only does the statute authorize the sheriff to sell and convey, but it requires him to do so, and it provides no other means of making the interest available. The 35th section prescribes, it is true, another remedy for the recovery of money due or personal property belonging to the insolvent, in the possession of another; but it extends no farther. Other interests in property, the sheriff is compelled by the imperative terms of the statute to sell. He is under no obligation to go into equity to ascertain the extent of liens thereon. Shirley v. Long &c., 6 Rand. 764.

II. The suit is not brought until more than 12 years after the conveyance to Tapp. It is an application to rescind a contract made and executed, which will not be done if the case be clear of fraud. Thompson v. Jackson, 3 Rand. 504; Shelly v. Nash &c., 3 Madd. C. R. 125. Here there is no ground for the imputation of fraud, except the ground of inadequacy of price. But that is no badge of fraud where the sale is by auction. Still less should it be so considered here, where the sale is by a sworn officer. The objection of lapse of time is not obviated by the proof of Cosby's declarations: they were connected with a settlement which then might have been easily made, but could not be made now. He had claims then, the evidence of which is now lost.

III. The plaintiff has not convened the heirs of Tapp, who may claim under the sale, nor the sheriff, who, if there be misconduct, is the party that has been guilty.

IV. The effect of the decree is to make Cosby a purchaser of the land in spite of himself. This operates *unjustly, because of the great fall in the price of land since 1818. Interest too is allowed from the time the work was done on the estimated value of the work; whereas the annual rent or value of the land, instead of amounting to six per cent. would not be more than three. The court should at most only have decreed to Lambert land in proportion to his work and materials.

John B. Baldwin and Robinson for appellee. If, according to the agreement of February 1818, Moffett made a conveyance, Cosby and Lambert acquired the legal title to the land, and were joint tenants thereof. If no such conveyance was made, still they had an equitable title, and whenever turned into a legal title, it must necessarily be in the two jointly and equally. Moffett, under his contract, could convey no other. He was not to look to the proportions in which they separately performed. Their performance was to be secured by a lien on the land; and no matter which failed, the lien equally existed on the whole. If the case had stood on the agreement of February 1818, and Cosby had paid more than half the consideration money, his claim against Lambert would have been for so much money paid and advanced, with an implied lien on Lambert's part for whatever Cosby had paid exceeding his half. The agreement of March 1818 does not materially change the condition of the parties. Had it been carried out, both parties would still have been equal owners of the land. In respect to the 55 dollars, Lambert would have had a claim against Cosby, and a lien on Cosby's part of the land. Or if one paid what was intended to be paid by the other, still it would have been the same case of a claim for so much money paid, with an implied lien therefor. But on the 12th of November 1819 a new agreement was made. Lambert, having already done work and furnished materials, was, upon the principle of this last agreement, entitled to a proportion of the land; 235 and if he proceeded to cover *in the dwelling house, that proportion would be increased. He was thus entitled to a proportion of the land, when, on the 16th of November 1819, he made the deed of trust to Stribling. After making that deed, he took the oath of insolvency, and made a deed to the sheriff, who sold his interest in the land. That sale was improper and illegal, being of a contingent interest of uncertain extent. An equitable and contingent interest in goods is not permitted to be sold under a fieri facias. Claytor v. Anthony, 6 Rand. 285. The same reason applies to a sale by a sheriff of an insolvent's interest: and the statute ought not to be construed to require the sale of such an interest. The construction should be, that the sheriff is to sell that which is a fit subject for sale, not choses in action, nor equitable and contingent interests. It is conceded that choses in action ought not to be sold, and the reason assigned is, that in respect to them a remedy is prescribed by the 35th section. But that section gives no remedy against debtors out of the commonwealth; and such debts, it would be necessary to contend, are to be sold. This cannot be. Were a merchant to fail, having debts due him from numerous consignees abroad, it could never be endured that such debts should be sold at public auction. The opinions of the judges who went farthest in Shirley v. Long (6 Rand. 747, 753,) only ascertain that the sale and conveyance by the sheriff will pass the legal title, like the sale and conveyance of any other trustee; not that the same will be sanctioned by a court of equity, when the sale ought not to have been made, or has not been made in a proper manner. The difference between the two tribunals has more than once been recognized in this court. Taylor v. King, 6 Munf. 358; Harris v. Harris, 6 Munf. 367. Here, besides that a deed of trust had been made, and the interest in the land might be subject to that deed, that interest was itself of an uncertain extent, depending on 236 the value of *the work done and materials found. That value ought to have been ascertained in a suit against Cosby, before any sale was made. The nature of the interest, and the price for which it was sold, furnish of themselves sufficient reasons for not allowing Lambert's rights to be diminished by the sale. But however it might be otherwise, there is no room for question after the verbal declaration of Cosby, and his letter of the 15th of May 1822. After buying subject to the lien created by the deed of trust for the amount of the debt due Smith, and getting relieved from part of that debt by saying he would take no advantage of the sale, he cannot be permitted to take that advantage now. If the sale for 50 cents was fair when subject to the whole amount of that debt, it is very different now.

II. The suit being for land, no time short of that which would bar an ejectment is a bar here. Besides, it does not lie in the mouth of Cosby to object that the suit has been unreasonably delayed: for it was as much incumbent on him to bring suit for an adjustment of the accounts with Lambert, and partition between them, as it was incumbent on Lambert. This, too, is not a case in which Cosby has been sleeping in security, and is now surprised with a claim. His verbal declaration, and his letters of May 15, 1822 and January 20, 1823, shew that it is not. The last of the bonds to Moffett did not become payable until the 1st of October 1825, and until those bonds were paid, the due proportion of each could not be ascertained. Add to this the embarrassed circumstances of Lambert, the fact of the schedule creditors being so long the parties in interest, and the other circumstances mentioned in the bill, and all ground of objection because of the lapse of time is removed.

III. Though the conveyance to Tapp is in the name of M'Nutt as grantor, it is not executed by him, nor by any person as his attorney in fact, but by his deputy. It therefore conveys no legal title. Still, if 237 Cosby had *simply stated that Tapp purchased, there might have been some reason for making him a party. But according to the answer of Cosby, Tapp did not acquire either the legal or equitable title: whatever title he acquired was Cosby's. And the enquiry here should simply be in relation to Lambert's rights, as between him and Cosby.

There can be no occasion for making the sheriff a party. He had merely an equity after the deed of trust should be satisfied, and that equity was in him for the benefit of creditors who are now satisfied.

IV. Perhaps, in strictness, Lambert should have had a decree giving him a portion of the land, bearing the same proportion to the whole land as 790 dollars 86 cents to 5600 dollars (which would be about a seventh), and a due proportion of the rents and profits, and compelling him to pay the balance due on the deed of trust. But Cosby has sold part of the land; and it is because he has gotten into possession, and done acts which interfere with a fair division of the land, that the circuit court considered itself authorized to decree money instead of land. He ought not to be permitted to object that his vendee is not interfered with. And even though his liability shall be held to be for the value of the land, yet that value ought to be shewn by him; and not being shewn to be less than when the contract was made with Moffett, the objection is not open to him that the value is actually less.

C. Johnson in reply.

I. All the estate of the insolvent passing to the sheriff, what is the sheriff to do? As to debts and personal effects in the possession of another, particular provision is made; but as to every thing else, there must be a sale. The sheriff is a trustee, as completely as if made so by the contract of the parties, in which case there is no doubt a sale might be made. If creditors perceive that injury will be done, they may go into equity within the 60 days, and ask that the sale be enjoined; *and the court, in any case in which the direction of the law ought not to be followed, will give relief. But where there is no injunction, it is the duty of the sheriff to sell. There is no analogy between this case and that of a fieri facias. That issues against the goods and chattels of the debtor; and the sheriff cannot take goods which are not legally the debtor's. He cannot take goods in which the interest of the debtor is merely equitable. But here the sheriff is owner of the estate, whether legal or equitable. If the sheriff might have sold, he did sell; and no fraud is alleged. There are no materials even, from which to ascertain that the equity of redemption was worth more than the 50 cents for which it sold. There is no evidence shewing the value of the land, except that which shews the price contracted to be paid for it. That was in 1818, when property was at an inflated value. Since that time, it has never been worth 50 per cent. of what it sold for then.

II. The lapse of time is a valid objection, under the circumstances. Cosby's statements only bound him in case Lambert should come forward in a reasonable time and shew the state of the accounts. Lambert shews no good reason for not having then come forward and settled; and now it would be difficult to settle properly.

III. Tapp's heirs ought to be parties, to ascertain whether they are interested or not.

IV. Nothing is said in the bill about a sale of any part of the land, and the only evidence on the subject is a certificate of a deed having been made for 100 acres. There being no proof of a sale of the residue, the sale of the 100 acres is no obstacle in the way of doing ample justice. In ascertaining Lambert's share of the land, we have not merely to look to the value of his work and materials; but what Cosby had to pay for covering in the house must be added thereto, and after giving Lambert a part of the land in proportion to the *combined amount, there will be an incumbrance on Lambert's part of the land in favor of Cosby, for the amount paid by the latter for covering in the house, and also for the balance due on the deed of trust.

STANARD, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The court is of opinion that under the agreement of the 12th November 1819, Lambert's original interest in the land was reduced to such proportion thereof, as the amount of the work then done and under that agreement to be done by him, was of 5600 dollars, the original price of the land; and had he done the work to be performed by him, the proper partition of the land would have been in the proportions aforesaid.

The court is further of opinion that the failure of Lambert to do the work, did not (at least for his benefit) change the said proportion of the land on the partition thereof; but the effect of that failure, and the doing of the work by Cosby, left Lambert's proportion of the land unchanged;—chargeable however to Cosby for the amount of the value of said work which Lambert ought to have done, but which, on his failure, was done by Cosby.

The court is further of opinion that notwithstanding the surrender of Lambert's interest in the land when he took the oath of insolvency, and the sale thereof by the sheriff, and purchase by Tapp for Cosby, the subsequent transaction, especially the demand by Cosby of contribution from his cosurety for the debt to Silas H. Smith, which was an incumbrance on Lambert's share of the land by virtue of the conveyance of Lambert to Stribling for the indemnity of the sureties for that debt,—coupled with the assurance that the land, notwithstanding the sheriff's sale, was still redeemable by Lambert, and the receipt of contribution from that surety, entitled Lambert to redeem, on paying all that was justly chargeable thereon in favour of Cosby.

240 *The court is further of opinion that such right of redemption was all that Lambert could justly claim, and the court below had no authority to convert this into a money demand, and by subjecting Cosby to a decree for such money demand, make him a purchaser of the equity of redemption against his will, and that too at a price fixed without enquiry into its value at the time of the decree, or any evidence of such value.

The court is further of opinion that the alleged sale by Cosby of one hundred acres of the land was no effectual impediment to a partition, so as to assign to Lambert his due proportion of the land; that the proper relief to him would have been a decree for such partition, holding the share allotted to him chargeable with the amount that might be ascertained by account to be due Cosby; that amount to be ascertained by crediting Cosby for the amount of the work done by him that Lambert ought to have done under the said agreement of the 12th November 1819, and the payments of Cosby in discharge of the said debt to Silas M. Smith, and the 50 cents, the amount of the purchase at the sheriff's sale, and debiting him with the just proportion of the rents and profits that the interest aforesaid of Lambert in the land entitled him to; and subjecting the said share of Lambert to sale, to satisfy the amount so ascertained to be due Cosby, if the same should not be paid in a reasonable time.

The court is further of opinion that in fixing the value of the work done by Lambert, with a view to the ascertainment of his share as aforesaid of the land, respect should be had, as far as practicable, to the standard furnished by the prices that may have governed the original contract, rather than the current prices of other work of the like kind.

The court is further of opinion that as the sheriff sold to Tapp, and no conveyance appears to have been made by Tapp to Cosby,

241 Tapp's heirs ought to have been parties. *Though the record affords strong ground for the inference that Tapp purchased for Cosby, the proceedings in this case, if Tapp's heirs be not parties, would not bind them, or be evidence against them; and if the case were to proceed to decree without making them parties, an ostensible title would be left outstanding, to the assertion of which the decree in this cause would be no bar.

Therefore the court doth adjudge, order and decree, that the decree be reversed with costs, and that the cause be remanded for farther proceedings in conformity with the foregoing principles.

Campbells v. Bowen's Adm'rs & Another.

August, 1842, Lewisburg.

(Absent CABELL, P., and BROOKE, J.)

Insanity*—Institution of Enquiry—Guardian ad Litem

—Practice.—In a suit in equity to foreclose a mortgage, after the defendant has answered, an account been taken before a commissioner, and a decree of foreclosure made, the sons of the defendant file a petition, suggesting that the defendant is, and was at the time of the mortgage, a lunatic; and they exhibit some affidavits in support of the suggestion. The circuit court thereupon appoints the petitioners guardians ad litem to the defendant, suspends the decree of foreclosure, and (the petition being traversed) directs an issue to try the validity of the mortgage. Afterwards, considering it improper that there should be an enquiry as to the validity of the mortgage until the fact of lunacy at the time of the suggestion is first established, the court sets aside the order directing the issue, leaves those interested to furnish proof of the fact of lunacy by procuring the appointment of a committee by the county court, and declares that if this be not done in a reasonable time, it will rescind the order suspending the decree. The court waits 18 months, and then (no such step having been taken) allows the decree of foreclosure to 242 operate, and orders *the parties who filed the petition to pay the costs incurred in consequence thereof. Whereupon those parties, as well as the original defendant, appeal. Held, 1. that on the petition and the traverse thereof, the circuit court should have instituted an enquiry as to the state of the defendant's mind at that time, and ascertained whether it was such as to require for him the protection of a guardian ad litem. 2. That the court erred, when, without making this enquiry, it appointed guardians ad litem, and directed an issue to ascertain whether the defendant was of unsound mind when he made the mortgage. 3. That the order directing the issue was properly set aside, to correct the error in making it. 4. That, for the purpose of ascertaining whether there was such incapacity as made it proper to appoint a guardian ad litem, the court might have taken such a course as is resorted to in England in like cases; that is to say, it might have referred the matter to a master, for him to report, on a personal examination of the party, aided (if need were) on such examination, by physicians. 5. (ALLEN, J., dissenting.) That, under the circumstances of the case, the appellate court ought to consider that which was done in the circuit court, as equivalent to an enquiry before the master, and a report by him against the suggestion. And 6. that as the parties who filed the petition were not interested as parties in the original suit, and can only claim to be injured by the decree for costs, the appellate court must dismiss the appeal from such decree for costs, as a matter of which it has not jurisdiction.

On the first of June 1829, Rebecca Bowen administratrix and William Gillespie administrator of Rees Bowen deceased, and John Crockett, filed a bill in the superior court of chancery holden at Wythe courthouse, against William Campbell, to foreclose a mortgage theretofore (to wit, on the 4th of November 1823) executed by Campbell to Rees Bowen and John Crockett, to secure debts arising out of contracts made in 1821, 1822 and 1823.

At May term 1830, Campbell filed his answer. The answer was duly sworn to before a justice of the peace, and was very full in its statements and views. It furnished strong evidence on its face that it was prepared by counsel; and indeed the record shewed that counsel appeared for the defendant and filed it.

243 *After the establishment of circuit superior courts, the cause was removed to the circuit court of Washington county.

The accounts between the parties being referred to a commissioner, and a report returned, the court, on the 19th of May 1834, decreed that unless payment should be made, on or before the first day of the succeeding term, of the sums ascertained to be due, the mortgagor should be barred and foreclosed of his equity of redemption, and the mortgaged lands sold by a commissioner appointed for the purpose, in the manner and upon the terms mentioned in the decree.

At the next term, to wit, on the 20th of October 1834, Alexander H. Campbell and George W. Campbell sons of William Campbell, filed a petition, representing that their father had for more than twenty years been labouring under mental derangement; that this was notorious, and was known, at the time the mortgage was taken, to the agent who obtained it for the mortgagees, and to the mortgagees also; that at the time of the mortgage, as well as before and since, he was incompetent to make a contract, or sanction one, which would be binding on him, either in law or equity; that the contract was moreover an unconscionable one, and upon the least taint of fraud, ought to be dissolved by a court of equity; that even if their father be held to the contract, great injustice has been done him in ascertaining the amount due. The petitioners expressed their belief, that, from the mental incapacity of their father, much had been omitted in his defence, which by proper attention could be shewn, and which would materially change the aspect of the case. And the prayer of the petition was, that the decree might be set aside; that a guardian or committee be appointed to represent the interest of the defendant, with permission to answer the bill; that an enquiry might 244 be instituted in regard *to his mental capacity, and such relief afforded as justice and law required.

The petition was sworn to by George W. Campbell, before a justice of the peace; and the petitioners, in support of their petition, relied upon various contracts entered into by Campbell at different times before the mortgage (which contracts formed the basis of the mortgage, and had been filed with the bill and answer), and also relied upon the following affidavits of other persons; to wit—

Of John T. Campbell; that at least three times in the course of 8 or 10 years, he had seen William Campbell in a perfect state of derangement.

Of Jeremiah Ayres; that since 1819, he had been acquainted with Campbell, and during that time never thought he was capable of doing business, and frequently knew him to be in a state of derangement.

Of Charles Tate; that he had been acquainted with Campbell for upwards of 20 years, and for the last 15 years had regarded him as of unsound mind, and incompetent to the transaction of business of importance; that the affiant believed his state of mind to be such at this time, that he was no way capable of given to any business proper attention.

Of Edward Fulton; that he had been acquainted with Campbell since 1831, and had seen him, at periods during that time, mentally disqualified safely to transact any sort of business.

Of Francis Smith; that he had been acquainted with Campbell upwards of 30 years; that for 20 years or upwards, he had thought Campbell's mind unsound,—much more so at some times than at others; that though capable generally of managing common business, he was inadequate to what was material and intricate.

Of Richard Roberts; that he had been acquainted with Campbell for more than 245 20 years, and from his peculiar *actions on some occasions, concluded that he was in a state of derangement.

Of Theodore G. Pearson; that he had been acquainted with Campbell for 12 years, and once or twice in the course of that time had seen him when the affiant thought his mind was impaired. On one occasion, when the affiant saw him and spoke to him, he would not speak, and from external appearances the affiant thought that his mind was certainly very much disordered.

Upon this petition, thus supported, the court made an order suspending the execution of the decree; appointing Alexander H. Campbell and George W. Campbell guardians ad litem of the defendant; and giving leave to the complainants to traverse the suggestions in the petition.

At May term 1835, it was entered of record that the complainants traversed and denied the petition, and all the allegations thereof; and thereupon the court ordered that issues be made up, to be tried at its bar, to ascertain, first, whether Campbell, at the time of making the several contracts before mentioned, was of unsound mind, and in consequence thereof incapacitated to make the said contracts; and secondly, whether, at the time of executing the mortgage, he was of unsound mind, and incapacitated thereby to execute the same.

At October term 1835, the cause was continued.

At May term 1836, on motion of the complainants, it was ordered that the issues be so changed, as that it should first be ascertained by the verdict of the jury, whether, at the time of executing the mortgage, Campbell was of unsound mind, and thereby incapacitated to execute the same; and if so, secondly, whether at the time of making the several other contracts before mentioned, Campbell was of unsound mind, and thereby incapacitated to make the same. During the same term, a jury was impanelled to try the issues; but, after hearing the evidence, the jurors were unable to agree upon a verdict, and were discharged.

246 *At May term 1837, for reasons appearing to the court, the issues were ordered to be tried at the bar of the circuit court of Scott county. A trial was had in that court in September 1837, which again resulted in the failure of the jury to agree.

At October term 1837, a motion was made by the complainants to set aside the issues made up on the petition, to dismiss the said petition at the costs of the petitioners, and to rescind the order suspending the decree of foreclosure. On consideration thereof, the court decreed that the issues be set aside and the petition dismissed. It made no decision at that time upon the question of costs, but held the same for advisement and refused at that time to rescind the order suspending the decree, for reasons set forth in a written opinion.

"It seems," says the judge in this opinion, "that the chancellor has no power to appoint a committee for a lunatic. This power was exercised in England by commission from the king, which, though usually directed to the chancellor, might be directed to any body; and it was in virtue of the commission that the chancellor acted, and not virtute officii. The king, by virtue of his office, having the care and custody of all such persons, and not being able to exercise the office in person, delegated it to another, who, by virtue of such delegation, thus exercised a personal trust. But the courts of chancery, as such, have power to appoint guardians ad litem to defend the interest of persons disabled in law or fact from defending themselves, and the only question seems to be whether the guardians were regularly appointed." After remarking upon the nature of the petition and proofs, the judge thus proceeds: "It seems to the court that it was wrong, upon these suggestions and proofs, to have made the appointment; which the court regrets, on account of the expense to which the parties have been thereby subjected: and it is now questionable whether the proper mode to have 247 this subject *investigated is by a committee appointed by the county court, (to whom, and to magistrates, the legislature seems alone to have confided the power over this subject usually exercised in England under a commission from the king) which committee may file a bill asking a suspension of the decree, or that the court should have an investigation before a jury ordered by it, and if the defendant is found now of unsound mind, appoint guardians ad litem to defend this suit for him. One or the other of these modes ought to have been pursued, and the first seems most proper, not only as the mode pointed out by statute, but as presenting parties liable for costs in such expensive litigation, to be paid out of the lunatic's estate. As the courts of chancery are vested with power, in all analogous cases, to appoint guardians ad litem for all persons disabled or incompetent from infancy &c. to defend their own interests, the power might be exercised in a proper case in relation to a lunatic. But it certainly ought not to be exercised upon mere suggestion." After some farther remarks upon the former proceeding, the judge continued as follows: "The court now thinks the proceeding wrong, and must set aside the issues as improvidently ordered. But the court has seen enough in the proceedings to induce the belief that some investigation of the sort may be proper; and were the court now to rescind the order suspending the decree of foreclosure, it would operate a surprise upon the defendants: and although the court would not suspend its decree for an indefinite length of time, merely to see whether any body would place himself in condition properly to have the matter of the issues investigated, yet it thinks a suspension till the next term but reasonable; when, if no steps shall have been taken by persons interested to oppose the decree of foreclosure, the suspending order will be rescinded, and the decree allowed to operate."

The cause was continued at May term 1838, and was again continued at October term 1838.

248 *At May term 1839, the case was again examined by the judge, and on this occasion he adverted to the first proceeding on the petition, in the following terms: "The error in that proceeding seems to be this, that on the suggestion of the petitioners, and affidavits offered by them, the court took for granted a fact which ought to have been shewn in another manner, viz. that the defendant was at that time a lunatic, and incompetent to manage his case or to be impleaded therein. From the proofs made on the trial of those issues, the court might, if it had power, direct that matter to be enquired into; but believing it possessed no such power, the court left it to defendant's counsel, and to his sons, or any other feeling interest in the matter, to provide the proper means for investigating that subject, through the action of the county court or otherwise, and afforded them ample time to do so. It has not been done, though a proceeding was instituted in the county court of Smyth (defendant's residence) and afterwards abandoned, so that the defendant stands before me in a situation no way different from other defendants, and the court is called upon to decide the cause upon the papers before it, freed from other considerations than those afforded by the pleadings and testimony in the cause."

Thereupon the court, rescinding the order which suspended the former decree of foreclosure, made another decree of foreclosure, and ordered the petitioners to pay the complainants their costs expended about the defence of the petition, and upon the issues.

From the said decree and proceedings, an appeal was allowed on the petition of William Campbell, Alexander H. Campbell and George W. Campbell.

The cause was argued by Preston and B. R. Johnston for the appellants, and by Leftwich for the appellees. The argument was full, upon the merits as well as upon the questions growing out of the petition suggesting the fact of lunacy.

249 *In the course of the argument the following authorities were referred to, to shew the power of the chancellor in England, and the power and duty of the circuit court, upon such suggestion: 4 Bac. Leftwich also referred to the following authorities, to shew that no appeal would lie for the petitioners from the decree against them for the costs incurred in consequence of the petition: Cook v. Piles, 2 Munf. 152; Garnett v. Childers, Id. 277; Henry's ex'or v. Elcan, Id. 541; Ashby v. Kiger, 3 Rand. 165; 1 R. C. 1819, p. 206, § 51.

STANARD, J. The first enquiry in this case is, whether it was brought on prematurely, before the court below had, by the appointment of a guardian ad litem to the defendant Campbell (alleged to be under the disability of lunacy), provided for a proper defence of an incompetent defendant, or at least instituted suitable proceedings to ascertain the fact on which the necessity of such an appointment depended.

The suggestion of the disability of lunacy was not made until the lapse of years after the institution of the suit, and after a defence ostensibly full, and a decree. It was then made on an affidavit of parties, who petitioned for the appointment of a guardian ad litem, supported by other ex parte affidavits. The affidavit speaks of the general incompetency of the defendant for a period of more than twenty years, and the supporting affidavits speak generally of a fluctuating capacity during that time, which rendered him incompetent "to give proper attention to any business;" or as, "at periods, mentally disqualifying him safely to transact any sort of business;" or as rendering him, though "capable generally of managing common business," yet "inadequate to what was material and intricate;" or as betraying, "by his peculiar actions on some occasions, that he was in a state of derangement;" or as having been seen, when, from his silence, and "from external indications, the affiant thought his mind certainly disordered." The affidavit of the petitioners seems to point more to the incapacity at the time of the contract, and to the consequent invalidity of the contract, than to its influence on the measures of defence in the suit; for in respect to that, there is only a general declaration of their belief that in consequence of the mental incapacity of the defendant, "much has been omitted in his defence, which by proper attention could be shewn," without the specification of any omission; and the supporting affidavits do not apply specially, nor are they directed, to the mental capacity at the time of preparing and filing the answer, or at the time of any other proceeding of the defendant in defence of the suit.

Nothing is more certain than that, on such a suggestion, the only proper subject of enquiry for the court was the then capacity or incapacity of the defendant to superintend his defence. If he was labouring under mental disability in the decree to require the superintendence of a guardian ad litem, that protection should have been given him. If he was not, the court had no power to supersede his free will and put him in wardship, and through such agency, to obtrude on him a defence on the ground of incapacity at the time the contract was made; a defence which, on the supposition of existing capacity, he did not think proper to urge for himself, and which he by implication disavowed. If the allegations of the petition of existing incapacity had been admitted, the court might and ought to have appointed a guardian ad litem, and (the guardian being thus introduced into the case) it would depend on what he might suggest and shew to the court, whether or not he would be permitted, on behalf of the defendant, to change the defence, by adding to it the objection to the validity of the contract on the ground of incapacity at the time it was made. He would probably not be allowed to make such change, without suggesting and shewing that the defendant laboured under the alleged incapacity at the time he made his defence. But though the allegations of the petition were immediately traversed, the court, without making the only enquiry proper to be made on the petition, that is, to ascertain the then state of the defendant's capacity, passed by that enquiry, appointed the petitioners guardians ad litem, and directed an issue to ascertain whether the defendant was of unsound mind at the time he made the contracts and mortgage in the bill mentioned, and thereby incapacitated to make the contracts and execute the mortgage. All this was certainly most irregular. This issue was improperly directed, and the abortive attempts to get a verdict on it may be passed over without further notice. The order directing it was properly set aside, to correct the admitted error in making it, and under the well founded conviction that the preliminary question was, whether the then state of the defendant's mind was such as to require for him, at the hands of the court, the protection of a guardian ad litem. The judge thought he had no right to enquire into the insanity of the defendant; that the statute had prescribed the manner of making such enquiry, and the organs to make it; and that the appointment of a guardian ad litem could not regularly be made, but as a consequence of such enquiry, and in the person of the committee that such enquiry might provide for the lunatic.

The argument of the appellant's counsel, and the authorities vouched in support of it, have, I think, most successfully shewn that the judge of the court below mistook the extent of his powers, and erroneously thought them more limited than they were. He may not have the power that the lord chancellor in England, as the delegate of the crown, possesses—that of issuing a commission of lunacy, nor of appointing a committee. His power in this respect need not here be enquired into or adjudicated. If a defendant in a suit in equity be lunatic, the court in which the suit may be pending has power to appoint a guardian ad litem, not only as a part of its general jurisdiction, but by express authority of the statute, 1 R. C. 212. And the authorities before referred to also ascertain, that if a party lunatic have not a committee, he should have a guardian ad litem appointed to superintend and protect his interests; that such protection is extended even to those who, from age and imbecility, are shewn to need it; and that the interposition of such protection is a matter of sound discretion of the court. When, however, the fact of lunacy or incapacity is contested, the rightful exercise of the power to appoint a guardian ad litem depends on the previous ascertainment of the fact, and the power to enquire into it is incident to that which is to be exercised on the ascertainment of it. In England, there is no statutory provision for a summary and compendious enquiry into the fact of lunacy. The enquiry there, with a view to the appointment of a committee to be charged with the care of the lunatic and his estate, is by commission from the chancellor, acting as the delegate of the crown; and where it is suggested that a party defendant in equity, who has not been found lunatic under a commission, is a lunatic, and the enquiry is made for the purpose of deciding whether or no the court should provide for this incapacity by appointing a guardian ad litem, that enquiry is referred to a master for his report on a personal examination of the party, the master being aided (if need be) in such examination, by physicians. Shelford on Lunacy 445; 1 Smith's Ch. Pract. 186. Such enquiry is instituted under the sound discretion of the court; and sometimes, instead of appointing a guardian ad litem to act for the incapable defendant, that duty is directed to be performed by the clerk in court. In the case under consideration, such a course might have been taken, though the judge below thought he had no power to resort to it. So thinking, he (instead thereof) suspended the decree for 18 months, avowedly for the purpose of affording the defendant, and those who assumed the superintendence of his interests, an opportunity to resort to that summary enquiry which the statute here (but not in England) allows, to ascertain the existence of the suggested incapacity. The resulting question then is, ought this, under the circumstances of this case, to be regarded in the appellate court as an equivalent for the enquiry before a master, which the court in its sound discretion might have directed?

The suggestion of incapacity was made under circumstances calculated to excite distrust and suspicion. The suit was instituted in 1829, to foreclose a mortgage executed in 1823; and the existing debts secured by the mortgage had been contracted in 1821 and 1822: and the first decree of foreclosure was rendered in May 1834, after a defence ostensibly full and active. From the time of the first contract in 1821 to the decree in May 1834, the defendant continued in the uncontrolled management of his property, and unrestrained enjoyment of his liberty, as a person of sound mind; and not an intimation is made in the progress of the suit, until 254 after the decree, that he laboured under any incapacity *requiring a guardian ad litem to conduct his defence: and during the time that elapsed from 1834 to 1837 in the abortive attempts to get a verdict on the issue that was erroneously directed, he still continued unrestrained in his personal liberty and the management of his property. If counsel prepared his answer, the proper evidence of his incapacity then would be that counsel, and yet no such evidence is offered; and if it was prepared by himself, it furnishes most persuasive if not conclusive proof of the presence of capacity. The opportunity afforded by the suspension of the decree, for enquiry into the capacity of the defendant by a personal examination, if used (as the opinion of the court below states that it was) resulted in as satisfactory a refutation of the suggestion of existing incapacity, as would have been furnished by a report of a master; and if not used, the failure to use it is inferential proof, almost as cogent as direct, that it could not be successfully used. Under the circumstances of the case, I think the appellate court ought to consider that which was done in the court below, a full equivalent for an enquiry before a master, resulting in a negation of the suggestion: and thereafter the court below soundly exercised its discretion, in proceeding with the case as one in which the defence had been, and would continue to be, made by a competent defendant.

On the merits, I think the decree is right. (The judge proceeded to give his view of the evidence, and of the operation of the contracts, and then concluded as follows:)

It is not necessary to enquire whether the court ought to have given costs against the petitioners, on the dismissal of their petition. They had no rights in the matters in controversy in the original suit. They were not interested as parties, and could claim no decree therein. The utmost injury they can 255 sustain by the decree, is the amount of costs decreed against them; *and for the correction of this error, if it be one, this court has not jurisdiction.

On the whole, I think the decree in the original suit ought to be affirmed, and the appeal of Alexander H. Campbell and George W. Campbell, from the decree for costs on the dismissal of their petition, dismissed, as not within the jurisdiction of this court.

BALDWIN, J., concurring, the decree was entered accordingly.

ALLEN, J., said, he would have concurred with the majority of the court on the merits, if he had considered it proper, at this time, to make a decision upon the merits. He was of opinion that it was competent for the circuit court, upon the suggestion of the insanity of the defendant, verified by the affidavits and other circumstances of the cause, to have enquired into the fact; that if such enquiry resulted in satisfying the court that the defendant was insane when he filed his answer, and so continued, the court had the power, and it was its duty, to appoint a guardian ad litem, and give him leave to file an answer; that as, by the pleadings, the competency of the defendant to contract at the time the contracts and mortgage were executed had not been put in issue, the order directing issues to enquire into that fact was premature and irregular; but that, upon the proofs in the cause, the court should have suspended proceedings until it had ascertained, by an issue or otherwise, whether the defendant, at that time, and when he filed his answer, was insane or not. It therefore seemed to him that the decree of the circuit court ought to be reversed, and the cause remanded for the proper enquiry to be made.

Specific Performance*—Contract to Convey Wife's

*Specific Performance—Title.—A party is not entitled to a specific execution of a contract for the sale of land unless he can make a good title thereto. Middleton v. Selby, 19 W. Va. 174; Linkous v. Cooper, 2 W. Va. 70, both citing the principal case.

See foot-note to Clarke v. Reins, 12 Gratt. 90, and Land.—A husband sells land in which his wife has an estate in fee, and executes a bond to the purchaser, conditioned that he and his wife will make a deed to the purchaser within a specified time. After that time the husband states that his wife has declined joining him in the deed, and has forbidden him to convey his estate, and he refuses to make any conveyance. Thereupon a bill is filed by the purchaser against the husband, stating that there are children of the marriage, claiming that the husband is therefore entitled to a life estate, and praying that he may be decreed to convey to the complainant all his interest in the land, reserving to the complainant his right of action at law upon the bond against the husband for failing to procure his wife to unite with him in the conveyance. The bill being demurred to, the circuit court sustains the demurrer and dismisses the bill; and this decree is affirmed.

John Ross having an estate of inheritance in a tract of land in the county of Harrison, and dying intestate, the same descended to his children, ten in number, of whom one was Patsy. She, after the death of her father, married Joseph James, and there were children of the marriage. James M'Cann purchased, for the sum of 110 dollars, so much of the land and the rents thereof as James and wife were entitled to; and James executed a bond to him in the penal sum of 200 dollars, with condition that James and his wife should make him a good deed for the same within two years from the date thereof. After the two years had expired, M'Cann exhibited a bill in the circuit court of Harrison, setting forth, that since the expiration of the two years, he had frequently applied to James to have a deed made by himself and his wife according to the bond, and 257 James had promised him it should be done; but after those promises, *James stated that his wife would not join him in a deed: that by the marriage and the birth of children, James was at all events entitled to a life estate; but he said that his wife had forbidden him to convey that, and he refused to convey it. The bill prayed, that James might be decreed to convey to the complainant all his interest in the land, reserving to the complainant his right of action at law upon the bond against James, for failing to procure his wife to unite with him in the conveyance; and that the court should grant such other, further and general relief in the premises, as to equity appertains.

The cause coming on to be heard upon the bill and a demurrer thereto, Duncan, J., delivered the following opinion:

"If this were a bill for a specific execution of the entire contract, that is, to obtain a decree for conveyance of the wife's estate, then my judgment would incline to the opinion expressed by judge Story in his excellent commentaries on equity, vol. 2, p. 38-40. See also Sugden on Vendors, p. 152 (9th London edi. p. 198, 9). To grant such a prayer would, to my mind, be undertaking to enforce a contract against the policy of the law, as it would tend to a violation of conjugal duties, and it would be 'offering a premium to the husband to be ungenerous as well as unjust to his wife.' Weighty authorities exist, however, shewing that the courts have thought otherwise, and that upon a contract of this kind, the husband might be thrown into jail until the affections of the wife could be so worked upon as to induce her to surrender perhaps the only means that remained to her to save herself and children from penury. I confess, that unless borne down by the weight of authorities, I should decide differently.* The 258 *plaintiff has relieved the court from a more full-examination of the ques-

*Note by the reporter.—In Howel v. George, 1 Madd. Ch. Rep. 1, the defendant, when he entered into the agreement, thought he had an absolute power over the estate, but afterwards found that he was only tenant for life: and his wife and son, who had interests in the estate, refused to join with him in suffering a recovery. The vicechancellor (sir Thomas Plumer) said: "It was not much pressed in argument, that the defendant ought to be decreed to procure his wife and son to join in a recovery. It could not be argued that a man should be compelled to use his marital and parental authority to compel his wife and son to do acts which ought only to be spontaneously done. In Hall v. Hardy, 8 P. Wms. 189, the master of the rolls says, there have been a hundred precedents where, if the husband, for a valuable consideration, covenants that his wife shall join with him in a fine, the court has decreed the husband to perform his covenant; and in Morris v. Stephenson, 7 Ves. 474, a husband was, under the circumstances, decreed to procure his wife to join in a surrender of a copyhold estate; but in Emery v. Wase, 8 Ves. 505, lord Eldon reviews the cases, and expresses great doubt whether, under a contract by a husband to sell the estate of his wife, the court will decree him to procure her to join. In Davis v. Jones, 1 New Rep. (4 Bos. & Pul.) 267, the chief justice of the common pleas (sir James Mansfield) who was very conversant in the doctrines of a court of equity, thought nothing could be more absurd than to allow a married woman to be compelled to levy a fine through the fear of her husband being sued and thrown into jail, when the general principle of the law was that a married woman shall not be compelled to levy a fine. Those cases in which a husband was compelled to make his wife concur have been where he has agreed she should convey, and her consent might be supposed to have been previously obtained; but in this case there is no pretence that the defendant agreed that his wife and son should join in a recovery. None of the cases have gone so far as to say that a father can be compelled to procure his son to join in a recovery."

Afterwards, in Martin v. Mitchell, 2 Jac. & Walk. 425, the same judge (being then master of the rolls) expressed himself in these terms: "If it was only tion, by shaping his cause differently. He seeks for a partial execution of the contract, and a right to resort to law to recover compensation for the residue. Can this be done? There are indeed many cases decided in Virginia, where a vendee has obtained a decree for a part of the land he purchased; for example, where there was a small deficiency in the quantity, but yet the vendor was capable of giving a title to what was the substantial inducement to the contract, the deficiency lying in compensation. There are cases also in which a vendee has obtained a decree for a conveyance from a husband who had bound himself to obtain a relinquishment of his wife's dower. But in such cases the vendee has gotten substantially what he purchased, to wit, the fee simple title of the husband.

259 This, it is true, the vendee *has taken subject to a contingent right of dower; but he has gotten also the husband's covenant of warranty for his protection against the claim of dower, and as he purchased with a knowledge of the contingent right of the wife, it is no great hardship that he should be compelled to take the husband's deed alone, with a risk of the possibility of his wife's having an estate in dower, and be made to rely for compensation in that event, upon his covenant of title. The question may be asked, whether, if the vendee be willing to take the title of the husband such as it is, the court ought not to decree it to him? As a general rule, I suppose that equity will decree specific performance so far as the vendor is capable of performing his contract, if the vendee be willing to receive the same. See Sugden on Vendors, p. 159 (9th London edi. p. 209).

But I apprehend that the vendee must take the decree of equity *as full satisfaction, or not at all. He cannot be permitted to come into equity for part satisfaction, and resort to a court of law for further satisfaction. But even in a case in which the vendee is willing to take from the vendor a less estate than he bargained for, it must appear that the vendor has a lawful right to convey such less estate. Thus the question arises, whether the vendee can have a decree for a conveyance by the husband of his life estate in the lands of the wife, during her life? A tenancy by the agreement of the husband, what becomes of the plaintiff's case? The point, that the court should compel the husband to coerce the wife to join with him in the conveyance, was abandoned. The counsel did not urge that that is the law now, and that the husband was to go to prison if she refuses to concur. It is not necessary, therefore, to go into the class of cases upon that subject, the authority of which has been very much weakened. They were much shaken by the remark of the lord chancellor, upon the difficulty of a court of equity compelling her to consent to a fine, while the court of common pleas always examines her to ascertain whether she acts freely, and if they find her to be under constraint, still her consent must be taken, or the husband will be punished. That point, however, is not pressed here."

the curtesy is only consummated by the death of the wife; and I apprehend that the husband has only a limited usufructuary right during the life of his wife, a right to receive the rents and issues. His right to lease his wife's lands, without her joining in the lease, is doubted: See Lomax's Digest vol. 2, p. 90. I am therefore of opinion that the demurrer to the bill must be sustained, on two grounds; to wit, 1. That any decree which equity can render must be in full satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim; it cannot sustain a bill for a specific performance in part, with a right to resort to a court of law for the recovery of damages for the residue: and 2dly, That a husband cannot be decreed to convey a life estate in his wife's lands, during her life. The plaintiff suggested, that although the court might refuse to give a decree for a specific performance of the contract, it might rescind the contract, under the prayer for general relief. I think otherwise. The prayer for general relief in addition to a prayer for specific relief, will only authorize such a decree as is consistent with the specific relief sought."

In conformity with this opinion, the circuit court, sustaining the demurrer, decreed that the bill of the plaintiff be dismissed, and that the plaintiff pay to the defendant his costs.

On the petition of the plaintiff, an appeal was allowed.

261 *The cause was submitted without argument, by William A. Harrison for the appellant, and George H. Lee for the appellee.

PER CURIAM. Decree affirmed.

Note by the reporter.—In Mortlock v. Buller, 10 Ves. 816, lord Eldon says: "I agree, if a man having partial interests in an estate, chooses to enter into a contract, representing it, and agreeing to sell it as his own, it is not competent to him afterwards to say, though he has valuable interests, he has not the entirety, and therefore the purchaser shall not have the benefit of his contract. For the purpose of this jurisdiction, the person contracting under those circumstances is bound by the assertion in his contract; and if the vendee chooses to take as much as he can have, he has a right to that, and to an abatement; and the court will not hear the objection by the vendor, that the purchaser cannot have the whole." Lord Eldon repeats the same doctrine in Mestaer v. Gillespie, 11 Ves. 640. "It is familiar," he says, "to come to this court for a specific performance of an agreement, the whole benefit of which the party cannot have; and if he waives that part, it is not competent to the other party to refuse to perform the rest."—"No one," he observes in Wood v. Griffith, 1 Swanst. 54, "will dispute this proposition, that if a man offers to sell an estate in fee simple, and it appears that he is unable to make a title to the fee simple, he cannot refuse to make a title to all that he has. The purchaser may insist on having his estate, such as it is. The vendor cannot say that he will give nothing, because he is unable to give all that he has contracted to give. If a person possessed of a term for 100 years contracts to sell the fee, he cannot compel the purchaser to take, but the purchaser can compel him to convey, the term, and this court will arrange the equities between the parties." Other authorities sustain the same view. See Milligan v. Cooke, 16 Ves. 1; Todd v. Gee, 17 Ves. 274; Western v. Russell, 3 Ves. & Beam. 192; Waters v. Travis, 9 Johns. 450; Morgan's heirs v. Morgan, 2 Wheat. 303, note d.; Sugden on Vendors 198, 9.

The plaintiff in a bill for specific performance must not, however, call upon the other party to do an act which he is not lawfully competent to do. "If," says lord Redesdale, "a party is compelled to do an act which he is not lawfully authorized to do, he is exposed to a new action for damages at the suit of the person injured by such act: and therefore, if a bill is filed for a specific performance of an agreement made by a man who appears to have had a bad title, he is not compellable to execute it, unless the party seeking performance is willing to accept such a title as he can give; and that, only in cases where an injury would be sustained by the party plaintiff, in case he were not to get such an execution of the agreement as the defendant can give. I take the reason to be this, amongst others; not only that it is laying the foundation of an action at law, in which damages may be recovered against the party, but also that it is, by possibility, injuring a third person by creating a title with which he may have to contend." Harnett v. Yielding, 2 Sch. & Lef. 554. See also Ellard v. Lord Llandaff, 1 Ball & Beat. 251.

Neither (it seems) must the plaintiff by his bill seek that which was prayed by the bill here, viz. a decree giving the plaintiff a conveyance of that which the defendant can convey, and allowing the plaintiff to proceed at law to recover damages against the defendant for that which he cannot convey. The first ground taken in the opinion of the judge of the circuit court, to wit, that a court of equity ought not to sustain the bill for a specific performance as to part, and allow the plaintiff to proceed at law for the recovery of damages as to the residue, is that on which the court of appeals affirmed the decree, as the reporter has been informed by one of the judges. On this subject, see Wood v. Rowe, 2 Bligh 595.

Appeals—Matter of Right—Roads—Construction of Statute.†—Construction of the act of April 16, 1831, declaring that appeals to the circuit courts shall be demandable as of right from the orders of the county or corporation courts in controversies concerning mills, roads, or the like.

The principal case is cited in Chesapeake & Ohio Canal Co. v. Hoyer, 2 Gratt. 522, 523; Senter v. Pugh, 9 Gratt. 261; Wheeling Bridge & Terminal Ry. Co. v. Wheeling Steel & Iron Co., 41 W. Va. 751, 24 S. E. Rep. 652.

of a turnpike company, a county court appoints freeholders to assess damages to a tract of land which will result from opening a turnpike road through it, and upon a report being made by the freeholders, it is affirmed by the county court and entered of record, an appeal to the circuit court is not demandable of right from such order of the county court.

By an act of assembly passed the 21st of March 1838 (Sess. Acts 1838, p. 120,) a company was incorporated by the name and style of "The Salem and Pepper's ferry turnpike company," subject to the provisions of the act prescribing certain general regulations for the incorporation of turnpike companies, 2 R. C. p. 211, ch. 234.

Application being made by the Salem and Pepper's ferry turnpike company to the court of Montgomery county, under the 7th section of the act last cited (p. 213, 14,) the court appointed five freeholders to assess the damages which would result from opening the turnpike road through certain lands of James A. Hill and others. Upon a report being afterwards returned by the freeholders, Hill, for himself, and as agent for the other land-owners, moved the court to quash the same; but his motion was overruled, and no good cause being shewn against the report in the opinion of the court, the same was affirmed and entered of record.

264 *From this order, Hill prayed an appeal to the circuit court; and upon his entering into bond with security, conditioned to pay all costs which might be awarded against him, the county court allowed the appeal.

In the circuit court, the appellees moved the court to dismiss the appeal, upon the ground that the county court had no power to grant the same; and this motion prevailed.

Thereupon, on the petition of Hill, a supersedeas was awarded by a judge of this court to the judgment of the circuit court.

The act of April 16, 1831, establishing the circuit superior courts, (Sess. Acts 1830-31, p. 50, § 30,) declaring that appeals to the circuit courts shall be demandable as of right from the orders of the county or corporation courts in controversies concerning mills, roads, or the like, and in certain other cases which are specified, and then declaring that all other cases may be brought before the circuit courts by writ of error or supersedeas, upon petition assigning error; the question was, whether the order of the county court appealed from in this case was an order in a controversy concerning a road, within the meaning of the said act of April 1831?

The attorney general, for the plaintiff in error, said, that in this case, as well as in cases under the act concerning public roads, 2 R. C. p. 233, ch. 236, the controversy is about the injury which the individual sustains by taking his private property for public uses; that whether the public right be exercised at the instance of a turnpike company or a county court, the case is not varied; it is still a public proceeding. The act prescribing regulations for the incorporation of turnpike companies does not regulate the mode of taking appeals; and in the absence of any special regulation, 265 *the general law allowing appeals in controversies concerning roads ought to govern the case.

M'Comas was counsel for the defendants in error, but did not argue the case.

PER CURIAM. The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

XIX. Appeals to Supreme Court of United States.

I. GENERAL PRINCIPLES.

A. RIGHT OF APPEAL NOT ABSOLUTE.—The right to have a decision reviewed is not an absolute right like the right to be heard in an original suit, but is subject to such conditions and restrictions as the legislature may put upon it. Casanova v. Kreusch, 21 W. Va. 720.

But the right to an appeal or writ of error is a legal right where it exists at all, and if the appellate court thinks there is error in the decree prejudicial to the appellant, an appeal and supersedeas must be granted, though the court were satisfied that the only object of the appeal, was to keep the property in the appellant's hands as long as possible without giving security for the rents and profits. Perry v. Horn, 21 W. Va. 732.

Rests with Appellate Court.—Whether a party has a right to appeal is not a question for the lower, but for the appellate, court. Todd v. Gallego, etc., Mfg. Co., 84 Va. 586, 588, 5 S. E. Rep. 676.

How Taken Away.—The right to appeal can only be taken away by express enactment or by implication equally plain. Leighton v. Maury, 76 Va. 865; Ex parte Lester, 77 Va. 663.

B. REAL CONTROVERSY MUST EXIST.—Whenever it appears from the record, or is shown by extrinsic evidence, that there is no controversy existing between the litigants, or, if it once existed, it has been settled or has ceased to exist, the writ of error or appeal will be dismissed. Courts do not sit to determine moot questions. Franklin v. Peers, 95 Va. 602, 29 S. E. Rep. 321; Shumate v. Spilman, 1 Va. Dec. 604.

Settlement of Controversy Pending Appeal.—Generally, if, pending an appeal or writ of error, the matter of controversy in the suit be settled, the court of appeals will simply dismiss the appeal or writ of error without deciding the merits merely to determine as to costs, and will not pass on the question of costs. Ferguson v. Millender, 82 W. Va. 30, 9 S. E. Rep. 38.

So where, after a writ of error was granted to the judgment of the circuit court refusing to grant the plaintiff in error a mandamus to compel the clerk of the board of election commissioners to give him a certificate of election, it appeared that the contest had been decided in a proper proceeding, the writ of error was dismissed. Franklin v. Peers, 95 Va. 602, 29 S. E. Rep. 321.

Matter in Controversy Ceasing to Exist.—When the matter in controversy is the possession of an office, and the plaintiff in error fails to file a brief or prosecute his writ of error until after the expiration of the term of the office in question, the writ of error will be dismissed at the costs of plaintiff in error. Taylor v. Maynor, 46 W. Va. 588, 83 S. E. Rep. 260.

That the term stated in a declaration in ejectment has expired, previous to the decision on an appeal, is a circumstance of no importance. Baker v. Seekright, 1 H. & M. 177.

An appeal from a judgment in ejectment does not abate by the death of the lessor of the plaintiff, notwithstanding such lessor claimed the land for life only. Medley v. Medley, 8 Munf. 191.

C. WHETHER NEW ACTION OR NOT.—Writs of error and appeals in chancery causes are in their nature new actions. Bailey v. McCormick, 23 W. Va. 95.

Suitors' Oath Laws.—A supersedeas is a new suit within the meaning of the "suitors' oath" laws, and the error in the judgment below is a cause of action within the meaning of the statute, hence where it occurred after the 1st of April, 1865, the act of Feb. 28, 1865, does not apply but that of March 1st, 1866, governs. Nadenbousch v. Sharer, 2 W. Va. 285; Higginbotham v. Haselden, 3 W. Va. 17.

A motion by the defendant in error against the plaintiff in error, for a rule requiring him to take the "suitors' oath" as provided by Act of Feb. 28, 1865, is not made too late, when made at a term preceding that at which the cause could under the rules of the court be heard. Higginbotham v. Haselden, 3 W. Va. 17.

The act of March 1st, 1866, relieving appellants under a writ of supersedeas from the necessity of taking the "suitors' oath" applies as well to appeals and writs of error as to a technical supersedeas. Higginbotham v. Haselden, 3 W. Va. 17.

D. CHANGES IN LAW.—Where a change in the mode of correcting errors is made while a suit is pending, the new law is applicable. Lewis v. Arnold, 18 Gratt. 454.

E. SPECIAL COURTS OF APPEALS.

Constitutionality.—The Act of March 31, 1848, Sess. Acts, p. 51, establishing a special court of appeals is constitutional, and does not impair vested rights since a suitor in an appellate court has no vested right to a judgment in his suit pending therein; BALDWIN, J., saying: "The right to an appeal or a writ of error, is a remedy provided for a supposed injustice. It may be entirely withheld, as it is in many instances; and when allowed, can be exercised only under such limitations and regulations as the law prescribes. Legislation respecting it relates to the remedy merely. Justice requires, that when once allowed, it should not be arbitrarily taken away. That when it becomes expedient to abolish a court, or to divide the business before it amongst other courts, or to relieve an existing court from a mass of business which it cannot transact within a reasonable time, some other tribunal should be substituted to dispose of the cases then pending and undetermined. The character of that tribunal must be left to the discretion of the legislature, under the general and unlimited authority to regulate the jurisdiction of the courts and the judges thereof; subject to the single limitation, that the persons authorized to determine the cases, are judicial functionaries, appointed and compensated in the mode pointed out in the constitution, and holding office by the tenure there prescribed." Sharpe v. Robertson, 5 Gratt. 518.

When, in pursuance of the Act of 1869-70, ch. 171, § 5, p. 227, the court of appeals sent a cause which had been pending in a district court of appeals, to a circuit court, that was a decision that the act was constitutional, and that the circuit court had jurisdiction to rehear and decide the same. Cowan v. Doddridge, 22 Gratt. 458; Cowan v. Fulton, 23 Gratt. 579; Kent v. Dickinson, 25 Gratt. 817.

If in such a case the judge of the circuit court refuses to rehear and decide the same, and directs it to be struck from the docket, no appeal can be taken from his judgment where the matter in controversy is less than $500. The remedy is by application to the court of appeals for a mandamus to the circuit judge, to compel him to rehear and decide the case. Cowan v. Doddridge, 22 Gratt. 458; Cowan v. Fulton, 23 Gratt. 579; Kent v. Dickinson, 25 Gratt. 817.

The act of February 28, 1872, to provide a special court of appeals. Acts of 1871-72, ch. 124, p. 98, which creates a special court of appeals to consist of three judges of the circuit courts, is constitutional, and the decisions of the court are valid and binding on the parties in the causes decided. Bolling v. Lersner, 26 Gratt. 36.

Proper Cases for Their Decision under Act of 1872.—All cases pending on the docket of the supreme court of appeals, not involving a constitutional question and not decided in the court below by one of the judges of the special court of appeals, are proper cases to be sent to said special court of appeals for decision; and it is for the judges of the supreme court of appeals under the constitution and the statute to select the cases to be sent to said special court. Bolling v. Lersner, 26 Gratt. 36.

F. MILITARY COURT.—An appeal allowed by a judge acting under military authority in 1869, was a valid appeal, and was confirmed by the act of March 5, 1870, styled the enabling act. Bolling v. Lersner, 26 Gratt. 36.

G. DEFINITIONS AND DISTINCTIONS.

1. WRIT OF ERROR.

Formerly a Writ of Right.—At common law the mode of correcting the error of an inferior court in its final judgment was by a writ of error issued by the appellate court as a matter of course, it being a writ of right, except in cases of treason and felony; and it is only by reason of statute-law, that it ceases to be a writ of right. Board of Education v. Hopkins, 19 W. Va. 84; Dryden v. Swinburn, 15 W. Va. 234; Wingfield v. Crenshaw, 3 H. & M. 245.

Only Lies from a Court of Record.—The writ of error, at common law lies only to remove a cause from a court of record of competent jurisdiction to an appellate court. It does not lie to renew the proceedings of a court or tribunal not of record. Railway Co. v. Board of Public Works, 28 W. Va. 264; Abrahams v. Com., 11 Leigh 675.

Hence the general court has no jurisdiction to award a writ of error to a refusal of a judge of a circuit superior court in vacation, to award a writ of error to a judgment of an inferior court. Abrahams v. Com., 11 Leigh 675.

Proceeding Must Be Judicial.—The writ of error must be not only from a court of record, but it must be from a judgment of such court rendered in a judicial proceeding, a judgment founded upon a judicial determination of a controversy in a suit or action inter partes.

It does not lie, even from a court of record, when the order or judgment of such court sought to be reviewed is simply an ex parte or administrative order or proceeding. Railway Co. v. Board of Public Works, 28 W. Va. 264.

In Criminal Cases.—It is only by the common-law writ of error, and not by appeal or supersedeas, that the judgment of an inferior court upon a presentment for a misdemeanor can be reviewed and reversed by a superior court; and the writ of error may issue without regard to the costs or value of the judgment, and without the assent of the commonwealth's attorney. Temple v. Com., 1 Va. Cas. 162.

2 APPEAL.—The prima facie and most proper, meaning of an "appeal,"—though it has different meanings, according to its use,—is a process continuing the same suit, in order to obtain a rehearing in the appellate court, wherein new evidence may be allowed, and a new trial as if never tried, as in appeals from justices. See Bailey v. McCormick, 23 W. Va. 102, 103; Bratt v. Marum, 24

W. Va. 652; Mackin v. Taylor County Court, 38 W. Va. 388, 18 S. E. Rep. 632.

Unknown at Common Law.—Appeals in civil cases were altogether unknown at common law. They are a proceeding of the civil law. Wingfield v. Crenshaw, 3 H. & M. 245.

The appointment of a guardian by election of the infant, after he arrives to the age of fourteen, being made on the chancery side of the county court, no writ of error lies by a superior court of law, to review the proceedings on such election and appointment. Ficklin v. Ficklin, 2 Va. Cas. 204.

Dependent on Statutes.—The right of appeal from the judgment or proceedings of a court of record, being unknown to the common law, must depend upon the statutes which allow it in certain cases. Cooper v. Saunders, 1 H. & M. 413.

Must Be Taken at Once.—By an appeal the whole testimony may be re-examined by the higher court, but the appeal must be taken at once. Wingfield v. Crenshaw, 3 H. & M. 245.

3. SUPERSEDEAS.—A supersedeas in England is merely an auxiliary process, and so it is in some instances in this country, but in general it is a mode by which the record of a judgment of an inferior court is removed before a superior jurisdiction. White v. Jones, 1 Wash. 116.

It was said in Wingfield v. Crenshaw, 3 H. & M. 245, that in practice in Virginia the supersedeas is a substitute for a writ of error of which there are few or no instances in Virginia.

A supersedeas is the proper remedy, only where the error is apparent on the face of the proceedings, and where the person seeking to reverse the judgment is a party in the court below. Wingfield v. Crenshaw, 3 H. & M. 245.

Failure to Perfect Appeal.—If an appeal be taken, but not perfected by giving bond and security, a writ of supersedeas to the same judgment may be obtained. Day v. Pickett, 4 Munf. 104.

Law Governing.—A supersedeas must be governed by the law in operation at the time it was awarded. Clark v. Brown, 8 Gratt. 549; Yarborough v. Deshazo, 7 Gratt. 374.

One Supersedeas to Several Judgments.—One supersedeas to five judgments, though between the same parties, and upon claims of the like nature, and though the question be the same in all the cases, is irregular, and ought to be quashed as improvidently allowed. If not quashed by the circuit court the appellant is entitled to his costs in both circuit court and court of appeals, but not to damages. Ayres v. Lewellin, 3 Leigh 609.

Presumption That Supersedeas Was Granted.—Although the petition only asks for an appeal and there is nothing to show that a supersedeas was granted, except the fact that a supersedeas bond was executed, the presumption is not that an appeal only was granted but that a supersedeas also was granted, so as to stop the running of the statute against the issuance of an execution of the decree appealed from. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Vanderwarker, 19 W. Va. 265.

4. WRIT OF ERROR CORAM VOBIS.—The remedy for a mere clerical error was formerly by writ of error coram vobis in the same court in which the error was committed, but it is now by motion to amend only and no appeal or writ of error lies. Goolsby v. St. John, 25 Gratt. 146.

By the statute of 1819 the remedy by motion in the same court was extended to mistakes in the judgment of the court which can be corrected by any verdict, bond, note, bill, etc., in the record. Eubank v. Ralls, 4 Leigh 308, 316; Com. v. Winstons, 5 Rand. 546.

As to what is such an error as may be corrected by motion in the lower court, see monographic notes on "Judgments" appended to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 425, and "Amendments" appended to Snead v. Coleman, 7 Gratt. 300.

In Bent v. Patten, 1 Rand. 25, the court decided that by the adoption of § 108, 1 Rev. Code, p. 512, it was not the purpose of the legislature to enlarge the subjects amendable; that the 108th section looked only to clerical errors—errors made by the clerk and depending upon comparisons and calculations to be made by him, and which might be readily and safely reformed by reference to other statements contained in the proceedings; that judicial errors—errors growing out of a mistaken application of the law to the facts—were still to be remedied by appeal to a superior tribunal. Compton v. Cline, 5 Gratt. 137.

Does Not Lie in Court of Appeals.—A writ of error coram vobis does not lie in the court of appeals, nor is the power to grant them conferred by act Feb. 24, 1820. Reid v. Strider, 7 Gratt. 76.

Certiorari.

At Common Law.—The writ of certiorari lies at common law to examine and reverse or affirm proceedings and judgments in inferior courts, and for the purpose of removing not only legal, but equitable proceedings also. Cooper v. Saunders, 1 H. & M. 413.

A certiorari may be awarded in cases before justices of the peace, in orders, summary proceedings and trials, before newly-created jurisdictions, and where the party cannot have a writ of error. It will lie after verdict, and before judgment, and an inquisition in case of rioters, not being a verdict, it will lie to bring up such inquisition. Mackaboy v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 268.

In Morgan v. Ohio River R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588, BRANNON, P., said, that it might be questioned whether § 2, ch. 110, Code W. Va. 1887, extended the writ of certiorari to any additional cases, but that § 8 merely widened the remedial powers.

Where a new tribunal acts in a cause in a manner different from the common law, no writ of error would lie to its judgments. In such case the common law gave a mode of reviewing such judgments. This mode was by writ of certiorari, which however was not a writ of right. Board of Education v. Hopkins, 19 W. Va. 84; Dryden v. Swinburn, 15 W. Va. 234; Cunningham v. Squires, 2 W. Va. 422; Ridgway v. Hinton, 25 W. Va. 554.

The ex parte settlement of a sheriff, confirmed by the county court, being purely statutory and not according to the course of the common law, in the absence of a statute authorizing the reviewal by writ of error, must be reviewed by certiorari. Board of Education v. Hopkins, 19 W. Va. 84.

Or a contested election case before the board of supervisors of a county. Cunningham v. Squires, 2 W. Va. 422; Burke v. Supervisors, 4 W. Va. 371.

Or a contested election case before the county court under ch. 118, Acts 1872-3 of W. Va. Dryden v. Swinburn, 15 W. Va. 234.

In West Virginia the writ of certiorari will lie from the circuit court to the county commissioners assembled in special session to ascertain the result of an election. Chenoweth v. Commissioners, 26 W. Va. 230.

The common-law function of the writ (now ancillary) was to remove a civil cause from an inferior to a superior court, before judgment, where the superior court had original jurisdiction, and could administer the same justice as the court below, and the case was there retained and tried. Bee v. Seaman, 36 W. Va. 881, 15 S. E. Rep. 173.

The principal use of this writ before 1868 was to bring up records, in whole or in part, in aid of some other proceeding; but the statute of 1882, as now found in the Code, p. 742, ch. 110, has very much enlarged its scope, giving power to rehear after judgment on the evidence certified, as well as correct errors in law, and in a proper case to retain for trial de novo, being thus in effect an appeal from the judgment of a justice in a certain class of cases. Long v. Ohio River R. Co., 35 W. Va. 333, 13 S. E. Rep. 1010.

Ex Parte or Administrative Proceedings.—Ex parte or administrative orders or proceedings when reviewable, are likewise the subjects of a writ of certiorari, and they are never reviewable by writ of error. Railway Co. v. Board of Public Works, 28 W. Va. 264.

Copy of Record Must Accompany Writ.—A copy of the record must accompany every application for a certiorari. Triplett v. Tyler, 4 H. & M. 418.

By Statute.

Generally.—The original writ of certiorari now so extensively used, and performing such important functions, in West Virginia, (the common-law original writ of certiorari enlarged in its functions and efficacy by ch. 110, § 2, Code,) is an appellate writ,—the counterpart of the writ of error. Morgan v. Ohio, etc., Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588.

"The use of this writ is now pretty well understood and its limits well defined, though the practice is not the same in all jurisdictions. It is generally used in such cases as might otherwise, without its intervention, leave the party remediless. It is considered as an extraordinary remedy resorted to for the purpose of supplying a defect of justice in cases obviously entitled to redress, and yet unprovided for by the ordinary forms of proceeding. Even in cases where the law has provided a remedy by writ of error or appeal this writ may, under special circumstances, be invoked, as for instance, if by the act of the court, either oppressively or erroneously, the writ of error or appeal is refused; or, if by the act of the clerk, negligently or wilfully caused, the writ of error was defeated; or, if by the contrivance or procurement of the adverse party the same result is effected; or, even, if by inevitable accident, or the misfortune without blame of the party injured he has been prevented from having the benefit of a second investigation of the facts of the cause, by the prescribed mode of a writ of error or appeal, certiorari may be resorted to as a substitute for redress. But in all cases the party, praying for this extraordinary remedy, must have merits on his side and pursue it in proper time. Time has always been considered an important circumstance in the application of this writ, and redress by this means should be sought as soon as possible after the happening of the event which rendered it necessary to resort to it." SNYDER, J., in Poe v. Machine Works, 24 W. Va. 517.

A Discretionary Writ.—The writ of certiorari is not a writ of right except at the suit of the commonwealth. It is a discretionary writ, but it should not issue where there is other adequate remedy, or if it be a matter of no serious complaint or injury. But this discretion is not a purely arbitrary discretion, but a discretion to be regulated by precedents and established principles: hence, the decision would be reversed, which awarded the writ of certiorari when according to the precedents and principles laid down as governing in such cases, no writ should have been awarded, and on the other hand if a writ had properly been awarded, and was afterwards quashed as improvidently awarded, the appellate court would reverse such decision, and it would also reverse it, if the court below had improperly refused to grant such writ, when the appellant had a right to have it awarded in accordance with the precedents and principles laid down as regulating such writ, and he had no other redress except such review and reversal. Welch v. County Court, 29 W. Va. 63, 1 S. E. Rep. 337.

No Other Remedy Available.—The general rule is that where the party aggrieved can obtain redress by appeal or writ of error he will not be allowed the unusual remedy by certiorari. Poe v. Machine Works, 24 W. Va. 517.

If persons having a remedy by appeal, permit the time to expire, certiorari will not issue for their relief, unless upon a special showing that it was not due to the applicant's negligence. Poe v. Machine Works, 24 W. Va. 517.

So in Beasley v. Beckley, 28 W. Va. 88, the denial of the writ of certiorari to the judgment of a mayor imposing a fine for the violation of a city ordinance was approved by the court of appeals upon writ of error, because the applicant had an adequate remedy by appeal to the circuit court by § 230, ch. 50, Code of W. Va., as amended by ch. 145, Acts 1883.

Decision Need Not Be Final.—It is not necessary that a decision be final, in order to be reviewed by writ of certiorari. Board of Education v. Hopkins, 19 W. Va. 84.

5. DISTINCTIONS.

a. Appeals and Writs of Error.—The proceeding by way of appeal is a proceeding of the civil law, while that by writ of error is a proceeding of the common law. Wingfield v. Crenshaw, 3 H. & M. 245.

One of the most prominent differences between an appeal and a writ of error is that the former must be prayed and allowed in the court, whose sentence or decree is sought to be reviewed, unless by statute further time is allowed, while the latter being a writ of right and grantable ex debito iustitie, may by the common law, be sued out without leave of the court unless barred by the statute of limitations. Wingfield v. Crenshaw, 3 H. & M. 245.

At law, a party may appeal at the time the judgment is rendered; or he may afterwards obtain a writ of error which may issue after the judgment is executed. White v. Jones, 1 Wash. 116.

The express grant of an appeal of right from the county to the circuit courts in such cases does not take away the general right to have the case reviewed in the circuit court by writ of error and supersedeas, or to have the decision of the circuit court reviewed by appeal, or writ of error and supersedeas. Ex parte Lester, 77 Va. 663.

b. Appeals and Bills of Review.—If the errors complained of be errors of judgment in the determination of facts, such errors can be corrected only by appeal and not by bill of review. Rawlings v. Rawlings, 75 Va. 76, 88; Kern v. Wyatt, 89 Va. 885, 891, 17 S. E. Rep. 549; Wethered v. Elliott, 45 W. Va. 436, 32 S. E. Rep. 209; Thomson v. Brooke, 76 Va. 160.

c. Writ of Error and Certiorari.—The writ of error corrects errors of record committed by courts of record proceeding according to the course of the common law, whilst the original writ of certiorari corrects the errors of inferior tribunals, in matters where the proceeding is not according to the course of common law, and where no appeal or writ of error lies. Morgan v. Ohio, etc., Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588.

Where the legislature erects a new court of record, if that court exercises a particular jurisdiction according to the course of the common law, a writ of error would lie to its judgments. Board of Education v. Hopkins, 19 W. Va. 84.

The county and corporation courts being courts of record, the writ of certiorari does not lie to a judgment of a corporation court affirming a judgment of a single magistrate, though his is not a court of record, for a fine imposed by a penal law, or in a civil case: if there be error in the judgment of such court affirming the judgment of a single magistrate for a fine, the writ of error lies. Tankersley v. Lipscomb, 3 Leigh 813.

Under the act of December 21, 1872, a writ of error or supersedeas is always a proper method of bringing a case from the circuit court to supreme court of appeals, even though a writ of certiorari would have been the proper mode according to the rules of the common law. Dryden v. Swinburn, 15 W. Va. 234; Fowler v. Thompson, 22 W. Va. 106.

II. APPEALABLE JUDGMENTS, ORDERS AND DECREES.

A. FINALITY OF DECISION.—No appeal can be taken from an interlocutory, but only from a final decree, or judgment. M'Call v. Peachy, 1 Call 56; Core v. Strickler, 24 W. Va. 689; Ferneyhough v. Dickinson, 2 Rob. 582; Harris v. Hauser, 26 W. Va. 595; Grymes v. Pendleton, 1 Call 54; Alexander v. Coleman, 6 Munf. 328; Lockridge v. Lockridge, 1 Va. Dec. 61; State v. Hays, 30 W. Va. 107, 3 S. E. Rep. 177; Gibson v. Randolph, 2 Munf. 310; Gillespie v. Coleman, 98 Va. 276, 36 S. E. Rep. 377.

No supersedeas will lie from the circuit superior court to an order of the county court where the same is interlocutory merely and not final. Trevillian v. Louisa R. Co., 3 Gratt. 326; Hancock v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 3 Gratt. 328.

The plaintiff cannot appeal from a judgment in favor of all the defendants, except one, in a joint action of trespass, until the suit has been abated, dismissed, or decided, as to that one. Wells v. Jackson, 3 Munf. 458.

No appeal lay from the court of admiralty, upon an interlocutory decree. Dawson v. Graves, 4 Call 127.

Judgment Must Have Been Entered.—An appeal allowed before any judgment has been rendered in the cause must be dismissed, although it was due to a mistake of the clerk and although, pending the appeal the lower court corrects the error by having the judgment entered and certified to the higher court. Tatum v. Snidow, 2 H. & M. 542.

May Be Entered at Any Time.—It cannot be seriously questioned, that a court may in fact enter a final judgment in any stage of the cause, however erroneous or premature it may be; and that when such judgment is so entered, it may be reviewed by the appellate tribunal, as a final judgment. Burch v. Hardwicke, 23 Gratt. 55.

Judgment Must Appear by Record.—A writ of error will not lie where the record does not show the judgment of the trial court, but merely recites that judgment was entered. Read's Case, 90 Va. 168, 17 S. E. Rep. 855.

B. PARTICULAR INSTANCES.

Order Setting Aside an Award.—An order setting aside an award founded upon a submission in pais, and which it is agreed shall be entered up as the judgment of the court, is a final judgment to which a writ of error will lie. Tennant v. Divine, 24 W. Va. 387.

Order Refusing to Enter Judgment on an Award.—Where an award, is made in a pending suit, and it is agreed that it shall be entered as the judgment of the court, a judgment of the court refusing to enter judgment according to the award is not a final judgment from which an appeal can be taken, since the action still remains before the court for further proceedings and a final judgment may be had therein without a new action. Manlove v. Thrift, 5 Munf. 493.

Reversal of Judgment Below.—Where a final judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause retained in the superior court for further proceedings, without acquiescence in such further proceedings by the appellee, such judgment of the superior court is a final judgment to which a writ of error will lie. Crawford v. Valley R. Co., 25 Gratt. 467; Brumbaugh v. Wissler, 25 Gratt. 463; Com. v. Lewis, 25 Gratt. 938; Morgan v. Ohio River R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588.

The judgment of the circuit court, reversing and setting aside the judgment of the county court quashing the original summons in the case and dismissing it, and retaining the cause in the circuit court for trial and determination is a judgment of such finality in its character, as that the court of appeals has jurisdiction to review it upon writ of error or supersedeas. Board of Education of Union District v. Crawford, 14 W. Va. 790.

A court having set aside an office judgment and the execution which had issued upon it after the fifteenth day of the term, and permitted the defendant to plead, the plaintiff may have a supersedeas from this order: though that part of the order setting aside the judgment is interlocutory. Enders v. Burch, 15 Gratt. 64.

Decree Dismissing Bill.—A decree dismissing a bill as to a defendant is, as to such defendant, a final decree. Dick v. Robinson, 19 W. Va. 159.

A decree dismissing a bill with costs upon the hearing is necessarily a final decree within the meaning of the statute limiting appeals and the judge pronouncing it, even if so inclined, cannot, by subsequent action, impart to it a different character. At any rate a mere instruction as to taxing costs will not do so. Pace v. Ficklin, 76 Va. 292.

Order Retaining Cause in District Court.—When, upon the reversal of a county court judgment, a cause has been retained in the district court, by consent; if, at a subsequent term, the order for detaining the cause be set aside, an appeal cannot then be taken, to the court of appeals, even by consent of parties, but the cause should be sent back to the county court for farther proceedings. Norris v. Tomlin, 2 Munf. 336.

In Janey v. Blake, 8 Leigh 88, this case was said to be badly reported and no authority for the above doctrine and it was held that where, on a supersedeas to a judgment of a county court, the circuit court reverses the judgment with costs, but omits to give such judgment as the county court ought to have given, and retains the cause, that this judgment of the circuit court is to be regarded as its final judgment in its appellate character, and supersedeas will lie thereto from the court of appeals.

Final Judgment in County Courts.—Though a judgment of a superior court of law, reversing a judgment of a county court, and directing other pleadings in the cause, be interlocutory in its character, yet the finality of the judgment in the county court imparts its character to the judgment of the superior court, so as to authorize an appeal to the court of appeals. Cowling v. Justices of Nansemond County, 6 Rand. 349.

Order Touching Process.—An order declaring a summons void as an alias summons, but good as an original summons, is not appealable, under § 3454, Code 1887, as being a final judgment. Roger v. Bertha Zinc Co., 1 Va. Dec. 827.

Order Sustaining Demurrer.—An order sustaining a demurrer and remanding the cause to rules with leave to the plaintiff to amend is not a final judgment to which a writ of error will lie. White v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 26 W. Va. 800; Gillespie v. Coleman, 98 Va. 276, 36 S. E. Rep. 377.

Where the court sustained defendant's demurrer to complainant's bill, but overruled a motion to dismiss, and granted leave to amend the bill, held, that an appeal was improvidently awarded to defendant. Commercial Bank of Lynchburg v. Rucker, 2 Va. Dec. 350.

A decree sustaining a demurrer, but overruling a motion to dismiss the bill, and granting leave to the plaintiff to file an amended bill is not appealable. Commercial Bank v. Rucker, 2 Va. Dec. 350; London, etc., Co. v. Moore, 98 Va. 256, 35 S. E. Rep. 722.

But a judgment sustaining a demurrer is appealable where no leave to amend is given but final judgment is entered on the demurrer. Norris v. Lemen, 28 W. Va. 336.

To make a judgment sustaining a demurrer final, there must be a judgment of dismissal. Gillespie v. Coleman, 98 Va. 276, 36 S. E. Rep. 377.

Order Directing an Issue.—A decree directing an issue to be tried at the bar of the court is not an appealable decree. Moore v. Lipscombe, 83 Va. 544.

Order Granting New Trial.—Prior to the act of Feb. 29, 1868, no supersedeas lay to the judgment of circuit court setting aside a judgment at the same time at which it was rendered, and awarding a new trial, such judgment being interlocutory merely, the cause being still pending and undetermined. Pumphry v. Brown, 3 W. Va. 9.

Order Granting a New Trial.—When in any civil suit there is an order made granting a new trial, a writ of error will lie from such order, either before or after the new trial has been had, and without regard to the finding on such new trial. Gwynn v. Schwartz, 33 W. Va. 487, 9 S. E. Rep. 880; Lambert v. Mfg. Co., 42 W. Va. 818, 26 S. E. Rep. 431; Code W. Va. (1899) ch. 135, § 1, par. 9.

Order Refusing New Trial.—An order overruling a motion to set aside a verdict of a jury and refusing to grant a new trial is not such an order or judgment as will authorize a writ of error from the court of appeals. Damron v. Ferguson, 32 W. Va. 33, 9 S. E. Rep. 39.

Order Remanding Cause for Further Proceedings.—A writ of error does not lie from the court of appeals from an order of the circuit court reversing the judgment of an inferior court in a criminal case, and remanding the same for further proceedings. State v. Bluefield Drug Co., 41 W. Va. 638, 24 S. E. Rep. 649.

Order of Nonsuit.—By suffering a nonsuit, plaintiff ends his present suit without prejudice to his right to bring another; and it is not a final judgment, but the opposite. Mallory v. Taylor, 90 Va. 348, 18 S. E. Rep. 438.

Order Refusing Petition for Rehearing.—The refusal of the lower court to allow a petition for a rehearing is a proper subject of appeal. Ambrouse v. Keller, 22 Gratt. 769.

Order Refusing to Allow Bill of Review to Be Filed.—The refusal of the lower court to allow a bill of review to be filed is a proper subject of appeal. Ambrouse v. Keller, 22 Gratt. 769.

Refusal to Remove Cause.—Mandamus and not appeal is the proper remedy when the county court refuses to remove a cause to the United States courts, an appeal not lying till the final decision of the cause. Brown v. Crippin, 4 H. & M. 173.

Order Setting Aside Decree Confirming Sale.—An order setting aside a decree confirming a sale before the end of the term, is interlocutory and non-appealable. Bank v. Jarvis, 26 W. Va. 785.

Under the decision in Childs v. Hurd, 26 W. Va. 580, the purchaser cannot appeal from the decree setting aside sale before resale made and confirmed.

Order Directing Surveyor to Make Report.—Where in a suit for specific performance of a contract for the sale of land, a decree holds the plaintiff entitled to recover and directs a surveyor to lay off the land and make a report, if an appeal is taken before the report is made, it will be dismissed or improvidently allowed. Higginbotham v. Brown, 22 Gratt. 323.

A decree directing the surveyor to make partition of a tract of land, and to make report, is not final, and cannot be appealed from. Young v. Skipwith, 2 Wash. 300.

Order Appointing Commissioner to Assess Damages.—The order of a court appointing commissioners to assess a just compensation for land condemned by a city is not a final judgment, decree or order in reference to which the party aggrieved may petition for a writ of error or supersedeas, under § 3454, Code Va. 1887. Ludlow v. Norfolk, 87 Va. 319, 12 S. E. Rep. 612; Postal Tel. Cable Co. v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 87 Va. 349, 12 S. E. Rep. 613; Wheeling B. & T. Ry. Co. v. Wheeling, S. & I. Co., 41 W. Va. 747, 24 S. E. Rep. 651.

Decree for an Account.—Errors in the details of a decree for an account are not a proper subject for appeal and correction in the appellate court; but they may be corrected by exceptions to the commissioner's report. Humphrey v. Foster, 13 Gratt. 653; Rust v. Rust, 17 W. Va. 912.

Order Quashing Commissioner's Report.—An order quashing the report of commissioners appointed to assess damages is an interlocutory order to which a writ of supersedeas will not lie. Trevillian v. Louisa R. Co., 3 Gratt. 326.

Decree Prematurely Entered before Commissioner's Report Disposed of.—Pending a commissioner's report undisposed of, a decree prematurely entered, which does not finally adjudicate the controversies between the parties to the cause, is interlocutory, and not appealable. Smith v. Evans, 42 W. Va. 352, 28 S. E. Rep. 347.

Decree Refusing Relief until Further Legislation.—A decree which declines to grant the relief prayed until the legislature enacts a further law on the subject is not a final decree, nor does it adjudicate the principles of the cause. From it no appeal lies. If a decision is desired the proper remedy is by mandamus to compel the trial court to hear and determine the cause. Supervisors v. Alexandria, 35 Va. 469, 28 S. E. Rep. 882.

C. INTERLOCUTORY DECREES.

Generally.—As to what is an interlocutory decree, see monographic note on "Decrees" appended to Evans v. Spurgin, 11 Gratt. 615.

Suspension of Decree.—Under § 4, ch. 25 of the Act of 1827-8, an appeal will not be granted from an interlocutory decree. The proper procedure in such case is to apply to the chancery court from whose decree an appeal is desired, or the judge thereof in vacation, to suspend the decree until final decree is made, which will be done, where the decree requires the payment of money or the changing the possession and title of property, provided the party will give bond with good security to take an appeal from the final decree and pay all costs, damages, etc. Graves v. Graves, 1 Leigh 34.

Exceptions.—The statute, § 2, ch. 178, Code 1873, the language of which is identical with § 3454 of the Code of 1887, provides that any person, who is a party to any case in chancery wherein there is a decree or order dissolving an injunction, or requiring money to be paid, or the possession or title of property to be changed, or adjudicating the principles of the cause, or to any civil case wherein there is a final judgment, decree, or order, may present a petition, if the case be in chancery, for an appeal from the decree or order. Lancaster v. Lancaster, 86 Va. 201, 9 S. E. Rep. 988; Elder v. Harris, 75 Va. 68.

No appeal will lie where no final decree has been entered, nor any decree, "adjudicating the principles in the case, or dissolving or refusing to dissolve an injunction, or requiring money to be paid or real estate to be sold, or requiring the possession or title of property to be changed." Harris v. Hauser, 26 W. Va. 595; Code W. Va. (1899) ch. 135, § 1; Kanawha Lodge v. Swann, 37 W. Va. 176, 16 S. E. Rep. 462; Stout v. Philippi Mfg., etc., Co., 41 W. Va. 339, 23 S. E. Rep. 571.

Purely Statutory.—The jurisdiction of the court of appeals in relation to appeals from interlocutory decrees is purely statutory. Lancaster v. Lancaster, 86 Va. 201, 9 S. E. Rep. 988; Elder v. Harris, 75 Va. 68.

Law Governing.—Where an order is not appealable when the appeal is taken, it is immaterial that afterwards it is made appealable, by statute, the appeal must be dismissed. Robrecht v. Wharton, 29 W. Va. 746, 2 S. E. Rep. 793.

In Chancery Only.—Only in a case in chancery is a party authorized to appeal from a decree or order which is not final, and then only from such decree or order as is above described. Unless the decree or order, not being final, falls within this description in one or the other of the specifications, the appellate court would have no jurisdiction of the appeal, because the appellate court has no jurisdiction to review an interlocutory decree or order in chancery, except what is given by statute; and jurisdiction is given only in the cases described. Elder v. Harris, 75 Va. 68; Pack v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. 5 W. Va. 118.

Discretionary Merely.—If an appeal from an interlocutory order or decree is allowed, and the court of appeals is of opinion that it should have been proceeded in further before the appeal was allowed, it will be dismissed as improvidently awarded. Hughes v. Johnston, 12 Gratt. 479.

Where a cause is heard upon the report of a commissioner, which has not been returned for the legal period, the decree being merely interlocutory, the error should be corrected by application to the court below; and it is not ground for an appeal unless, upon application, the court below refuses to correct it; the court saying: "The right of appeal from an interlocutory order or decree was not given for the correction of such an error as this: but is limited to 'a decree or order dissolving an injunction or requiring money to be paid, or the possession or title of property to be changed, or adjudicating the principles of the cause;' and was intended to test the merits of the decree or order. If that be right upon the merits, and the only apparent error in the proceedings consists in the fact that the decree or order was prematurely made, the petition for an appeal therefrom may be rejected upon the ground that it is most proper that the case 'should be proceeded in further in the court below, before an appeal is allowed therein.' In other words, the petitioner should have the error corrected in the court below if he can." Armstrong v. Pitts, 13 Gratt. 235.

Decree Requiring Money to Be Paid.—A trustee has a right of appeal from a decree ordering him to pay trust funds into court as such a decree "requires money to be paid." Grinnan v. Long, 22 W. Va. 693.

A decree overruling some exceptions to a commissioner's report and confirming others and then ascertaining the indebtedness of parties and "decreeing money to be paid" is appealable. Hooper v. Hooper, 29 W. Va. 276, 1 S. E. Rep. 280.

Decree "Requiring the Title or Possession of Property to Be Changed."

Decree Ordering the Sale of Land.—A decree ordering the sale of land is an appealable decree, under ch. 135, § 1, subd. 7, of the Code; and no error in such decree can be reviewed unless a petition for an appeal is presented within two years after such decree was rendered. Rader v. Adamson, 37 W. Va. 582, 16 S. E. Rep. 808; Buster v. Holland, 27 W. Va. 510, 523.

A decree for the sale of land in a partition suit, though interlocutory, is appealable under Code, § 3454, as it requires change of title and possession, especially where it settles the principles of the cause. Stevens v. McCormick, 90 Va. 735, 19 S. E. Rep. 742.

A decree ascertaining and fixing the amounts and priorities of liens on real estate, and providing for sale thereof by special commissioner, unless such liens are paid by a future day, mentioned in the decree, is appealable, and can only be corrected on appeal or bill of review filed within the time prescribed by statute. Lehman v. Hinton, 44 W. Va. 1, 29 S. E. Rep. 984.

Decree Appointing a Receiver.—Under Code, § 3454, an appeal lies to a decree appointing a receiver, whereby a change in possession or control of the property is required, though made in vacation. Shannon v. Hanks, 88 Va. 338, 13 S. E. Rep. 437; Ruffner v. Mairs, 33 W. Va. 655, 11 S. E. Rep. 5.

An appeal lies from an order of a circuit court, appointing a receiver in a suit to subject land to judgment liens, since it requires the possession of the land to be changed, whether it adjudicates the principles of the cause or not. Hutton v. Lockridge, 27 W. Va. 428; Grantham v. Lucas, 15 W. Va. 425; Wagner v. Coen, 41 W. Va. 351, 25 S. E. Rep. 735.

An order or decree refusing to appoint such receiver is not appealable. Robrecht v. Robrecht, 46 W. Va. 738, 34 S. E. Rep. 801.

Decree Setting Aside a Conveyance as Fraudulent.—A decree setting aside a conveyance as fraudulent is appealable, since it requires the "possession or title of property to be changed." Linsey v. McGannon, 9 W. Va. 154.

Must Actually Change the Possession or Title.—But an injunction, restraining the defendant from using, cultivating or further trespassing on certain premises or from interfering with the plaintiff in his cultivation of the premises, does not "change the possession of the property" from the defendant to the plaintiff, but merely stops the defendant where he is, and hence is not appealable on that ground. Robrecht v. Wharton, 29 W. Va. 746, 2 S. E. Rep. 793.

Applies to Personal Property.—In Harris v. Hauser, 26 W. Va. 595, GREEN, J., said he was by no means satisfied that the words "possession or title of property to be changed" did not apply to real estate alone.

But in Ruffner v. Mairs, 33 W. Va. 655, 11 S. E. Rep. 5, it was held that the clause of § 1, ch. 135, Code W. Va., conferring appellate jurisdiction on the court of appeals from a decree or order directing "the possession or title of property to be changed" referred to personal as well as real property.

Property Must Have Been in Possession of Appellant.—Where the property has never been in the possession of the appellant, he cannot appeal from an order changing the possession of such property. Harris v. Hauser, 26 W. Va. 595.

Decree Adjudicating the Principles of a Cause.

Generally.—By Acts of 1882, ch. 157, § 1, an appeal will lie in any case in chancery where there is a decree or order "adjudicating the principles of the cause." In such case it is immaterial whether or not such is technically a final decree or order. Steenrod v. Railroad, 25 W. Va. 133; Hoy v. Hughes, 27 W. Va. 778; Hill v. Als, 27 W. Va. 215; Stout v. Philippi Mfg. Co., 41 W. Va. 339, 23 S. E. Rep. 571; Core v. Strickler, 24 W. Va. 693; Alexander v. Byrd, 35 Va. 690, 8 S. E. Rep. 577.

A decree which adjudicates all the principles of a cause and settles the rights of the parties, leaving nothing further to be done but to execute it, is such a decree as will support an appeal from a decree which grants a rehearing of such decree. Deaton v. Mitchell, 45 W. Va. 670, 31 S. E. Rep. 968.

Thus where a demurrer to a bill is overruled by an interlocutory order, which settles the principles of the cause, the demurrant may appeal from such order alone, but not until after a decree has been entered carrying into effect the principles thus adjudicated by such order overruling the demurrer. The reason for denying an appeal from such order without waiting for the final decree is, to prevent the inconvenience and expense of successive appeals in the same cause. The same court has the power, before the final decree, to correct any error it may have committed and thus remove the cause for an appeal, or it may commit other and additional errors in the subsequent orders and decrees entered in the cause which the party prejudiced thereby may desire to have reviewed. It is, therefore, proper and right that the law denying appeals from interlocutory orders, even though such orders may settle the principles of the cause, until after those principles have been enforced by final decree, should be strictly adhered to and observed as a rule of convenience as well as a matter of safety and justice to the parties litigant. Steenrod v. Railroad Co., 25 W. Va. 133; Laidley v. Kline, 21 W. Va. 21.

An appeal will lie to the court of appeals from a decree adjudicating the principles of a cause, although the same may not be a final decree (§ 3454, Code Va.), and an appeal also lies from a final decree. So that a party may appeal at once from a decree settling the principles in a cause against him, or he may, at his option, await the final decree in the cause and then appeal. Harper v. Vaughan, 87 Va. 426, 12 S. E. Rep. 785.

There is no limitation upon the time wherein an appeal will lie from an interlocutory decree settling the principles of the cause, such limitation running only as against the final decree, the statute providing under the law now in force that "no petition shall be presented for an appeal from any final decree which shall have been rendered more than one year before the said petition is presented." § 3455, Code Va.; Jameson v. Jameson, 86 Va. 51, 9 S. E. Rep. 480.

"If after the final decree the party prejudiced by such interlocutory order has no complaint except such as resulted directly from such order, he may appeal from such order, although he is not in a condition to appeal from the final decree which carries into effect the principles adjudicated by such order. But if he complains not only of the error committed in such order, but also of errors in the subsequent decree, independent of those resulting merely from giving effect to such erroneous order, then he cannot appeal from such order unless he is also in a condition to appeal from the final decree: because to allow him to do so would be to permit him to appeal a cause in which the court would have jurisdiction to pass upon only a part of the errors of which the appellant complains. The effect of this would be either to deprive the appellant of the right to have a part of the errors complained of reviewed, or to compel the appellate court to pass upon the errors in the interlocutory order and remand the cause in order that the appellant might put himself in a position to appeal from the final decree and then entertain a second appeal for the review of the said decree. Such a practice could not be sustained upon any principle of law, reason, justice, or expediency and has never been, so far as I can discover, by any court." Steenrod v. Railroad Co., 25 W. Va. 133.

Definitions.—It is difficult, if not impossible, to define exactly what is meant by adjudicating the principles of the cause in such a way as to fit every case; but it must mean that the rules or methods by which the rights of the parties are to be finally worked out have been so far determined that it is only necessary to apply these rules or methods to the facts of the case in order to ascertain the relative rights of the parties with regard to the subject-matter of the suit. Lancaster v. Lancaster, 86 Va. 201, 9 S. E. Rep. 988; Wood v. Harmison, 41 W. Va. 376, 23 S. E. Rep. 560.

"Apart from any decision construing this provision it seems to be apparent, that the object of the legislature was to allow appeals only in cases in which there was a decree or order adjudicating all the principles of the cause. Before this provision was adopted, appeals could be taken from final decrees only. This being then in derogation of the general principle, it must be construed strictly and not extended beyond the apparent purpose for which it was made; and especially so, since any other interpretation would produce great delay and expense in the final disposition of causes by allowing appeals from the successive adjudications of the points decided by the lower court without waiting for the adjudication of all of them, so that one appeal might end the cause. The policy of the law always has been to have as few appeals in the same cause as possible; and the innovation made by this and some other provisions of the statute was evidently not intended to abrogate this policy, but its obvious purpose was only to permit appeals in certain cases, in which, it was supposed, the controversy might be sooner ended by allowing appeals before a final adjudication in the court below. It seems to me clear, therefore, that this provision was intended to permit appeals only in cases where the decree or order appealed from had fully adjudicated all the principles presented by the pleadings or otherwise in the cause." Hill v. Als, 27 W. Va. 218; Shirey v. Musgrave, 29 W. Va. 131, 11 S. E. Rep. 914; Hinchman v. Morris, 29 W. Va. 673, 2 S. E. Rep. 863; Fowler v. Lewis, 36 W. Va. 112, 14 S. E. Rep. 447; Wood v. Harmison, 41 W. Va. 376, 23 S. E. Rep. 560.

"The provision of the statute authorizing appeals to this court in chancery causes, when there is a decree adjudicating the principles of the case, authorizes such appeal only when the decree appealed from adjudicates all questions raised in the cause by pleadings or otherwise; and therefore if a number of questions are stated in the bill, which the court is called upon to settle, and but one of the questions is determined by the decree, and all the other questions arising in the cause are especially reserved on the face of the decree, till after a certain person is made a party defendant in the cause, such decree cannot be appealed from." Shirey v. Musgrave, 29 W. Va. 131, 11 S. E. Rep. 914.

A fortiori where the only question in the cause has not been decided and the lower court has expressly reserved it for its further consideration. Kelly v. Lively, 23 W. Va. 1.

Presumption.—Where it does not appear that there was any question before the lower court not adjudicated, the court of appeals will presume that all the principles of the cause were adjudicated and will not of its own motion award a writ of certiorari to bring up the record to inquire if this is so. Hinchman v. Morris, 29 W. Va. 673, 2 S. E. Rep. 863.

Examples.—In a suit to set aside a deed and subject the subject to a debt, a decree determining whether the property is subject to the debt and ascertaining the amount of the debt, is an appealable decree under § 1, ch. 157, Acts 1882 W. Va., as a decree "adjudicating the principles of a cause." Hoy v. Hughes, 27 W. Va. 778.

Whether a decree requiring the possession of personal property to be changed by the appointment of a receiver, is appealable or not, under § 1, ch. 185, Code W. Va., if that is the only relief prayed for in the bill, such a decree adjudicates the principle of the cause and is appealable on that ground. Wagner v. Coen, 41 W. Va. 351, 23 S. E. Rep. 735.

A decree stating the findings of the court on the matters in controversy, setting aside a former survey, decree, and deed as fraudulent and appointing commissioners to make a new survey, is a decree "adjudicating the principles of the cause," and is appealable. Lloyd v. Kyle, 26 W. Va. 534.

A decree overruling an exception and adjudging a debt valid and not barred by the statute of limitations nor by laches, and that, there being nothing in the hands of the intestate's personal representative, the intestate's realty is liable in the hands of his heirs, and ascertaining them and their respective liability, is a decree adjudicating the principles of the cause, from which an appeal will lie. Alexander v. Byrd, 85 Va. 690, 8 S. E. Rep. 577.

A decree deciding that a deed is not fraudulent per se, thus overruling one of the grounds upon which relief is prayed for in the bill, is a decree, "adjudicating the principles of the cause" to a certain extent and is appealable. Norris v. Lake, 89 Va. 513, 16 S. E. Rep. 663.

Where certain tracts of land are attached by creditors as the individual property of the defendant, and a partner of defendant, who was not a party to the original suit, files his petition claiming that these tracts are the property of the partnership, an interlocutory decree holding the tracts to be the individual property of defendant, adjudicates the principles of the cause between the creditors and the petitioner and is appealable by the petitioner. Hopkins v. Prichard (W. Va.), 41 S. E. Rep. 847.

A decree overruling certain exceptions to a commissioner's report, and confirming the report as to the questions involved in these exceptions, is a decree settling the principles of the cause as to these questions, from which the party excepting may appeal, although the report is recommitted to the commissioner as to other matters involved in other exceptions. Garrett v. Bradford, 28 Gratt. 609.

In Walden v. Beverley, 20 Gratt. 147, which was an appeal from an interlocutory order, directing issues to be tried by a jury, the question of jurisdiction was not raised, nor expressly passed on by the court. But the court held that upon the case made by the record, all the material allegations of the bill were positively denied by the answer, and were not supported by two witnesses, or one witness and corroborating circumstances; that consequently the plaintiff had failed to make out his case, and his bill ought to have been dismissed; that it was error to direct issues to be tried by a jury to enable him to make out his case by new testimony; and that the circuit court, by directing the issues to be tried by a jury, must have held either that the plaintiff had not failed to make out his case by the proofs, or that if he had, his bill should not be dismissed, but that an issue should be directed to enable him by new and additional testimony to maintain the allegations of his bill; and that upon either ground the decision was erroneous, and settled the principles of the case adversely to the defendant and erroneously, as upon the face of the record he was entitled to the dismissal of the plaintiff's bill. Elder v. Harris, 75 Va. 68.

But where the only principles involved in the case, are raised by the exceptions to the commissioner's report, and the court directs an issue as to one of those very exceptions and expressly declines to decide the other exceptions until this issue is decided, such an order does not "adjudicate the principles of the cause," and is not appealable. Elder v. Harris, 75 Va. 68.

A decree sustaining some exceptions to a commissioner's report and overruling others and not noticing others, does not adjudicate the principles of the cause and cannot be appealed from, and an appeal, if granted, will be dismissed as prematurely awarded, with costs to the appellee. Laidley v. Kline, 21 W. Va. 21.

Decree Directing an Issue Out of Chancery.—An appeal will lie from an order directing an issue out of chancery if it "adjudicates the principles of the cause." Elder v. Harris, 75 Va. 68.

A decree directing an issue out of chancery which decides that the statute of limitations and laches are not sufficient defences to the plaintiff's demand, "adjudicates the principles of the cause" and is appealable, e. g., where the record shows that such defences are valid, but the lower court, by directing other issues decided to the contrary. Reed v. Cline, 9 Gratt. 136; Elder v. Harris, 75 Va. 68.

Refusal to Dissolve an Injunction Order.—The refusal of the court to dissolve an injunction order appointing a receiver, "adjudicates the principles of the cause," and is appealable. Bristow v. Home Bldg. Co., 91 Va. 18, 22, 20 S. E. Rep. 946, 947. See monographic note on "Injunctions" appended to Claytor v. Anthony, 15 Gratt. 518.

Order Referring a Cause to a Commissioner.—An order referring a cause to a commissioner to take an account of liens and their priorities and the real estate subject to them, and whether the rents and profits will satisfy them in a reasonable time, is not an order "adjudicating the principles of the cause," and is not appealable. Buehler v. Chevront, 15 W. Va. 479; Kahawha Lodge v. Swann, 37 W. Va. 176, 16 S. E. Rep. 462.

Order Recommittting a Cause.—A decree which sustains certain exceptions to a commissioner's report, and recommitts the cause to the same or another commissioner, is not an appealable decree since it does not "adjudicate the principles of the cause." Hooper v. Hooper, 29 W. Va. 276, 1 S. E. Rep. 280.

Decree Overruling Demurrer.—A decree overruling a demurrer is not a decree "adjudicating the principles of the cause," and no appeal lies from it. Lancaster v. Lancaster, 86 Va. 201, 9 S. E. Rep. 988; Buehler v. Chevront, 15 W. Va. 479.

Though an order overruling a demurrer does settle the principles of a cause, it cannot be appealed from, until after those principles have been enforced by a final decree, as the court below before the final decree might correct any error or might commit additional errors. Laidley v. Kline, 21 W. Va. 21; Watson v. Wiggington, 28 W. Va. 533. See, however, Vance v. Snyder, 6 W. Va. 24, where the court seemed to incline to the other opinion.

Injunction Cases.—For principles governing appeals from injunction orders, see monographic note on "Injunctions" appended to Claytor v. Anthony, 15 Gratt. 518.

Jurisdictional Amount Must Be Involved.—No appeal lies from a decree dissolving an injunction where the subject involved is pecuniary, and is of less amount than $500. The right of appeal given by section 3454 of the Code is limited by section 3455. Shoemaker v. Bowman, 98 Va. 688, 37 S. E. Rep. 278.

When Appeal Must Be Taken.—Although the right is given to appeal from certain interlocutory decrees, the party aggrieved is not bound to appeal from them at once, but may do so at any time within a year after a final decree has been rendered in the cause, provided all the other requisites for an appeal exist. Southern R. Co. v. Glenn, 98 Va. 309, 36 S. E. Rep. 395.

Rights of Appellee.—Where an appeal is taken from an interlocutory decree of a county court to the court of chancery, and that court affirms the decree, and an appeal is taken to the court of appeals, the decree of the court of chancery will be considered as interlocutory, so that the appellee has a right to call it up within the 60 days prescribed by the statute. Fretwell v. Wayt, 1 Rand. 415.

D. CHARACTER OF PROCEEDINGS.

1. GENERALLY.

Proceedings Must Be Judicial.—Under the constitution of West Virginia, the supreme court of appeals has no power to review by writ of error or appeal the decisions or orders of inferior tribunals, officers or boards, as to matters which are simply administrative, executive or legislative and not strictly judi-dial in their nature, except where such power is expressly conferred by the constitution. Railroad Co. v. Board of Public Works, 28 W. Va. 264.

As the jurisdiction of the supreme court of appeals, whether original or appellate, is, by the letter, true spirit and intention of the constitution, wholly judicial, the legislature could not confer jurisdiction of any other cast or quality upon that court, and even if it were, by explicit enactment, to confer power on it to entertain a writ of error or appeal, or other form of process to review a decision of the county court in a matter of the correction of an assessment of value for taxation, the act would be void, as contrary to art. 8, § 3, of the constitution. Mackin v. Taylor County Court, 38 W. Va. 338, 18 S. E. Rep. 632.

And such a proceeding, going up to the circuit court on appeal is no more a judicial proceeding than it was in the county court. Mackin v. County Court, 38 W. Va. 338, 18 S. E. Rep. 632.

The fact that a ministerial act is performed by a court does not change the nature of the act and make it judicial. Pittsburg, etc., R. Co. v. Board of Public Works, 28 W. Va. 264; Mackin v. County Court, 38 W. Va. 338, 18 S. E. Rep. 632.

Upon an appeal from the judgment of an inferior court, errors in the execution or replevy bond, issued, or taken, after the judgment, will not be noticed. They are merely ministerial acts, and must be corrected in the same court, upon motion; and if, on such motion, that court give an erroneous opinion, the party injured may then appeal, and have it corrected. Leftwich v. Stovall, 1 Wash. 308.

So a mere executive act, such as an official appointment, cannot be reversed in an appellate court. Dew v. Judges, 3 H. & M. 1.

May Be Ex Parte.—No just inference can be drawn that the action of the county court in ascertaining, declaring and entering of record, the result of a vote on the relocation of a county seat, is not reviewable by the circuit court, because the proceeding is in its origin an ex parte proceeding, and no provisions are made in the statute whereby persons may contest the truth of the returns or separate certificates before the county court. Anyone interested in the question would have a right, as in many other matters, originally ex parte, to appear before the county court, and contest what is proposed to be done and by the appropriate appellate proceedings have the action of the county court reviewed by the circuit court. Poteet v. County Com. of Cabell Co., 30 W. Va. 58, 3 S. E. Rep. 97.

Although the order of allowance of an executor's account by a county court is only ex parte, an appeal will lie from such order to the district court, where the appellee has appeared and contested the allowance, and averred himself to be interested, as devisee in the estate in question, under the act giving a right of appeal to "all who may be injured or aggrieved by the sentence or judgment of a county court in any suit or contest whatsoever." Triplett v. Jameson, 2 Munf. 242.

2. TAX VALUATION.—There is no power of review of a tax valuation unless the legislature has provided for it. Hence if one aggrieved is given the right to apply to the county court and then to appeal to the circuit court, the right of appeal stops there if the right of appeal to the court of appeals is not expressly given, which it is not. Mackin v. County Court, 38 W. Va. 338, 18 S. E. Rep. 632.

Nor will the court of appeals have jurisdiction of cases touching the assessment of taxes, under § 8, art. 8, giving that court appellate jurisdiction in civil cases "where the amount in controversy is of greater value than $100" since that applies only to judicial controversies, not where the matter is merely administrative. Mackin v. County Court, 38 W. Va. 338, 18 S. E. Rep. 632.

The supreme court of appeals of West Virginia has no jurisdiction to review by writ of error or otherwise, a decision of the circuit court correcting an order of the board of public works assessing the value of railroad property for taxation; such action being merely administrative and not judicial. Railroad Co. v. Board of Public Works, 28 W. Va. 264.

In Low v. County Court, 27 W. Va. 785, there was a dictum to the effect that an appeal would lie, under § 94, ch. 161, Acts 1882, from a judgment of the county court refusing to correct an assessment when it is claimed that the party assessed with the taxes is not chargeable therewith; but this was expressly repudiated in Railroad Co. v. Board of Public Works, 28 W. Va. 264.

No appeal lies from the judgment of a county court rendered under § 7, ch. 32, Acts 1882, refusing to correct the assessed valuation of real estate. Such judgment if reviewable at all, can only be reviewed by certiorari. Low v. County Court, 27 W. Va. 785.

But see Bank v. County Court, 36 W. Va. 341, 15 S. E. Rep. 78, where it was held that the court of appeals had jurisdiction of a writ of error to the judgment of the circuit court affirming the judgment of the county court dismissing a petition to correct an alleged erroneous assessment under § 94, ch. 29, Code W. Va. the amount of controversy exceeding $100. This case was decided prior to that of Mackin v. County Court, 38 W. Va. 338, 18 S. E. Rep. 632, but was not mentioned by the court in its opinion in that case.

3. MANDAMUS CASES.—Acts 1881-2, ch. 7, §§ 3, 4, expressly confer the right of appeal to the court of appeals from all judgments in all proceedings by mandamus rendered in the inferior courts. Taylor v. Williams, 78 Va. 422.

Refusal to Award Rule.—Where the circuit court refuses to award a rule on a petition praying a mandamus, the proper remedy is not by writ of error, but direct application to the court of appeals for such rule. Martin v. Board of Education, 42 W. Va. 514, 26 S. E. Rep. 348.

4. CERTIORARI CASES.—A final decision on a writ of certiorari is reviewable on writ of error from the court of appeals according to the rules of law and practice in other cases. Arnold v. Lewis County Court, 38 W. Va. 142, 18 S. E. Rep. 476.

The authority of the court of appeals to review a certiorari case, where the case has been heard, both parties being before the court below, is unquestionable, though the writ be a discretionary writ. In any case it is settled beyond dispute by the amendment to the constitution of West Virginia, art. 8, § 3, saying: "The court of appeals shall have appellate jurisdiction in cases of quo warranto, habeas corpus, mandamus and certiorari. W. Va. Code, p. 23." Welch v. County Court, 29 W. Va. 63, 1 S. E. Rep. 337.

5. CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS.—Where the statute on condemnation proceedings does not declare, that the judgment shall be final, the judgment of the inferior court must stand as all other judgments, and the aggrieved party is entitled to the benefit of the general law regulating writs of error and supersedeas. B. & O. R. Co. v. P. W. & Ky. R. Co., 17 W. Va. 812.

The circuit court has no jurisdiction to award a supersedeas to the judgment of the county court in a proceeding by the board of supervisors to condemn land for public purposes, when it is not manifest that they are transcending their authority and the interposition of the court is necessary to prevent injury that cannot be adequately compensated in damages. Board of Supervisors of Culpeper Co. v. Gorrell, 20 Gratt. 484, 521.

C. HABEAS CORPUS CASES.

West Virginia.—While under § 1, ch. 135 of the Code, as amended by ch. 137 of Acts of 1882, a writ of error will lie from the supreme court of appeals to the judgment of a circuit judge remanding a prisoner brought before him on a writ of habeas corpus, such judgment, under § 12, ch. 111, cannot be superseded. Ex parte Mooney, 26 W. Va. 32.

Virginia.—The court of appeals has no jurisdiction to grant a writ of error to a judgment upon an application for a writ of habeas corpus. Bell v. Com., 7 Gratt. 201; Jones v. Timberlake, 6 Rand. 678.

7. DISBARMENT PROCEEDINGS.—The supreme court of appeals has jurisdiction of a writ of error to the circuit court on disbarment of an attorney as for a contempt. State v. Shumate, 48 W. Va. 359, 37 S. E. Rep. 618.

8. CONTEMPT PROCEEDINGS.—A contempt of court is in the nature of a criminal proceeding. Hence the judgment in such a proceeding can be reviewed only by writ of error and not always in that way, never by appeal. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Wheeling, 18 Gratt. 40. See monographic note on "Contempts" appended to Wells v. Com., 21 Gratt. 500.

Proceedings for contempt cannot be reviewed in the court of appeals on application for a writ of habeas corpus. Cromwell v. Com., 95 Va. 254, 28 S. E. Rep. 1023.

9. AWARD OF ARBITRATORS.—There cannot be an appeal to the court of appeals, from the award of an arbitrator, unless it be made the judgment or decree of the court from which it is taken; and the mere copying of the award in the proceedings of the court, though they be signed by the judge, does not make it the judgment or decree of the court. Crane v. Crane, 21 Gratt. 579. See monographic note on "Arbitration and Award" appended to Bassett v. Cunningham, 9 Gratt. 684.

10. DECISION ON MOTION TO QUASH OR ISSUE EXECUTION.—An appeal will lie from the decision of a court on a motion to quash an execution or order an execution to issue, it being so far considered a pending cause, as to entitle the parties in the original action to appeal. Com. v. Hewitt, 2 H. & M. 181; Lowther v. Davis, 33 W. Va. 132, 16 S. E. Rep. 20.

An appeal will lie from an order or decree overruling a motion to quash an execution, although the matter in controversy consists wholly of costs, since such an appeal is not from the decree in the principal cause, but as independent of it as if it were a decree in an independent suit to subject realty to costs in a former suit. Taney v. Woodmansee, 23 W. Va. 709.

Issuing Execution against a Person Not a Party.—If the clerk of an inferior court misconceive a judgment, and issue execution against any person not properly a party thereto, the remedy is not by supersedeas or writ of error, but by motion to quash the execution; and if such motion be overruled, an appeal may be taken to the court of appeals or application may be made for a writ of error or supersedeas to the order overruling such motion. Moss v. Moss, 4 H. & M. 203.

11. REFUSAL TO ORDER SURVEYOR'S REPORT TO BE RECORDED.—If the county court in passing upon any question under the act, Code, ch. 37, § 15, render a judgment with costs overruling a motion to record the surveyor's report of the land sold for taxes, upon appeal to the circuit court, that court should simply reverse their judgment, but should not proceed to order that the report of the surveyor should be recorded; the error of the county court in refusing to order the report to be recorded can only be corrected by mandamus and not by writ of error or supersedeas. Delaney v. Goddin, 12 Gratt. 266.

12. ORDER OF REMOVAL TO UNITED STATES COURTS.—An order of a circuit court removing a case at law to the circuit court of the United States is reviewable by the supreme court of appeals of West Virginia on writ of error. Henen v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 17 W. Va. 881.

13. CONTESTED ELECTION CASES.—No writ of error or supersedeas will lie to the judgment of the county court in contested election cases. Dryden v. Swinburne, 20 W. Va. 89, 104.

14. ORDER APPOINTING OR DISPLACING GUARDIAN.—Under the statutes, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 64, § 2, ch. 66, §§ 50, 51, no appeal lies from an order of the county court appointing or displacing a guardian, to the superior court of chancery, or from the court of chancery to the court of appeals. Dupuy v. Hardaway, 4 Leigh 584.

15. BASTARDY PROCEEDINGS.—The superior courts of law have jurisdiction to grant writs of supersedeas to orders of the county or corporation courts, binding persons accused of being the fathers of bastard children to support such children; and the court of appeals in like manner, has jurisdiction to correct errors in the decisions of superior courts of law on the same subject. Mann v. Com., 6 Munf. 452.

16. DECISION OF CIRCUIT COURT ON CLAIM DISALLOWED BY AUDITOR.—Where a claim against the state for services rendered, as shorthand reporter, in a criminal case, has been allowed by the circuit court in which the case was tried, and been certified to the auditor for payment, by whom a portion of the claim is allowed, and the residue refused, and the holder of the claim applies by petition, under § 1 of ch. 37 of the Code, to the circuit court to have the claim audited, and adjusted, a writ of error will not lie to the court of appeals from the action of the circuit court on said petition. Robinson v. La Follette, 46 W. Va. 565, 33 S. E. Rep. 288.

17. REFUSAL OF LEAVE TO SUE IN FORMA PAUPERIS.—An appeal will lie from an order of a superior court refusing to grant leave to a person held in slavery, to sue in forma pauperis. Sam v. Blake-more, 4 Rand. 466.

18. EX PARTE ALLOWANCES TO ATTORNEY.—An ex parte order making allowances to an attorney for legal services out of funds in the control of the court is nonappealable. If erroneous, the proper remedy to correct it is by motion in the lower court. Board of Education of Beverly Dist. v. Ward, 50 W. Va. 443, 40 S. E. Rep. 344.

19. EX PARTE VACATION ORDER.—An ex parte vacation order made by a judge of the circuit court is nonappealable. Clark v. Bryan, 48 W. Va. 271, 37 S. E. Rep. 543.

20. PROHIBITION PROCEEDINGS.—A judgment granting a peremptory writ of prohibition with costs is such a final judgment that a writ of error will be awarded to it. Burch v. Hardwicke, 23 Gratt. 51.

21. CRIMINAL CASES.

Motion to Abate Milldam as a Nuisance.—A motion to abate a milldam as a nuisance, is a criminal prosecution, hence a writ of error lies from the general court to the order of the circuit superior court affirming the order of the county court. White v. King, 5 Leigh 726.

Judgment against Slaves and Free Negroes.—No writ of error lay to the judgment of a justice's court sitting as a court of oyer and terminer, condemning a slave to death. Peter v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 330.

The same was true of the judgment of a county or corporation sitting as a court of oyer and terminer for the trial of a free negro or mulatto under the act of 1832-3, ch. 22, § 11. Anderson's Case, 5 Leigh 740.

E. MATTERS OF DISCRETION.

Generally.—When a matter is to be decided by an inferior court, though it be called a subject of discretion, as the awarding of a new trial, or the granting of a continuance, amendment of pleadings, and many other matters, and the discretion is so exercised as to prejudice the substantial rights of a party, it may be reviewed at his instance by an appellate court, and corrected by such court, when the inferior court has not exercised a sound judicial discretion, in accordance with established rules and principles, but has clearly violated such rules and principles.

It was anciently held that, whatever vested in the discretion of the court could not be reviewed. This was applied to amendments, or the refusal to amend pleadings, or the records in any part; to the continuance of, or the refusal to continue common-law suits to another term; to the granting of, or the refusal to grant new trials; and to a great variety of questions arising while the case was being tried, and which were regarded as questions of practice under the control of the court below, and not subject to review. But in most of the courts this doctrine has passed through, and is now passing through, a gradual change, and in many of the states a very great change, while in other states it has either not been modified, or has been but slightly modified.

Formerly these questions were doubtless matters of pure discretion, and then properly not the subjects of review; but they are no longer so, as the rules and principles governing them, with a few exceptions have become so settled and fixed that these subjects are really no longer matters of mere discretion, though still called as heretofore matters of discretion: the decision of the court in such cases being now really not the exercise of a discretion proper, but rather the application by the court below to the case before it of well-known rules and principles of law; and if it errs in the performance of this judicial duty, its errors should be corrected by the appellate court, just as any other error of law committed by it is corrected. But when the subject, upon which the inferior court has acted, is one within its absolute or pure discretion, its action cannot be reviewed. Welch v. County Court, 29 W. Va. 63, 1 S. E. Rep. 337.

Removal of Cause to Another Circuit.—When a judge of a circuit court is so situated as to render it improper, in his judgment, for him to preside at the trial of a cause, the statute makes it lawful for him to remove the cause to another circuit. In such case, however, the propriety of removing or refusing to remove depends upon the discretion of the judge, and an appellate court cannot revise his decision. Boswell v. Flockheart, 8 Leigh 364.

Continuances.—A motion for a continuance is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, under all the circumstances of the case; and although an appellate court will supervise the action of an inferior court on such a motion, it will not reverse a judgment on that ground, unless such action was plainly erroneous. Hewitt v. Com., 17 Gratt. 627; Myers v. Trice, 86 Va. 635, 11 S. E. Rep. 428; Harman v. Howe, 27 Gratt. 676; Welch v. Com., 90 Va. 318, 18 S. E. Rep. 273; Walton v. Com., 32 Gratt. 855; Roussell v. Com., 28 Gratt. 930; Phillips v. Com., 90 Va. 401, 18 S. E. Rep. 841; Harris v. Harris, 2 Leigh 584; Bland & Giles County Judge Case, 33 Gratt. 443; State v. Betsall, 11 W. Va. 703, 727; Davis v. Walker, 7 W. Va. 447; Keese v. Bank, 77 Va. 129; Marmet v. Archibald, 37 W. Va. 778, 17 S. E. Rep. 299. See monographic note on "Continuances" appended to Harman v. Howe, 27 Gratt. 676; McAlexander v. Hairston, 10 Leigh 486; Gwatkin v. Com., 10 Leigh 687; Deford v. Hayes, 6 Munf. 390.

The same rule applies to the granting of continuances by commissioners in chancery of proceedings before them.

A commissioner properly has much latitude of discretion in granting continuances of proceedings before him, and the court whose order he is executing will not overrule his action in that respect, unless it be plainly erroneous. Still less will an appellate court reverse a decree for that cause. Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 187.

Change of Venue.—The appellate court can review the action of the trial court in refusing or granting a change of venue. Ott v. McHenry, 2 W. Va. 73.

Allowance of Special Jury.—Under Code Va. § 3158, providing that a court "may allow a special jury," the allowance of a special jury is not a matter of right, but rests in the sound discretion of the court. Atlantic & D. R. Co. v. Peake, 87 Va. 130, 12 S. E. Rep. 348.

Challenging of Jurors.—The decision of a court allowing a challenge on the part of the commonwealth, or disallowing a challenge on the part of the accused, whether such challenge be a principal challenge or a challenge to the favor, is matter of exception on the part of the accused; which it is his right to have reviewed in the appellate court. Montague v. Commonwealth, 10 Gratt. 767.

Introduction of Evidence.—The matter of the introduction of the evidence as to the order and time thereof, is largely in the discretion of the trial court, and will not be interfered with by the appellate court, where no injustice has been done. Lewis v. Alkire, 32 W. Va. 504, 9 S. E. Rep. 890.

Whether a plaintiff shall be permitted to introduce further evidence after the defendant's evidence is introduced is a matter within the discretion of the court trying the cause; and its exercise will rarely, if ever, be controlled by an appellate court. Brooks v. Wilcox, 11 Gratt. 411; Kerr v. Lunsford, 31 W. Va. 659, 8 S. E. Rep. 493; Bowyer v. Knapp, 15 W. Va. 278.

The admission of evidence after the cause has been closed is a matter within the discretion of the trial court, and its action will not be reviewed unless it works surprise or injustice to the other party. Bank v. Lockwood, 13 W. Va. 392, 433; George v. Pilcher, 28 Gratt. 299.

Where a case is heard by the court without a jury, an appellate court will not reverse the judgment, though the court below may have erred in requiring the plaintiff to introduce his evidence first. In such a case, it is a matter of perfect indifference in what order the evidence is heard. Wright v. Rambo, 21 Gratt. 158.

Examination of Witnesses.—The subject of the examination of witnesses lies chiefly in the discretion of the trial court, and its exercise will rarely if ever be controlled by an appellate court. Brooks v. Wilcox, 11 Gratt. 411; Scott v. Shelor, 28 Gratt. 891.

Unless it was palpably improper to grant leave for the second examination of a witness, an appellate court will not, for this cause, reverse the decree; as the circuit court ought to possess much latitude of discretion in the decision of such questions. Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 187. For the principles governing the appellate court in reviewing the action of the trial court in the examination of witnesses, see monographic note on "Evidence."

Conduct of Counsel.—Counsel necessarily have great latitude in the argument of a case, and it is, of course, within the discretion of the court to restrain them; but with this discretion the appellate court will not interfere, unless it clearly appears from the record that the rights of the prisoner were prejudiced by such line of argument. State v. Allen, 45 W. Va. 65, 30 S. E. Rep. 209.

The extent to which counsel may read to the jury, from law books, sound law, relevant to the case on trial, is left largely to the discretion of the trial judge, subject to review in case of abuse of discretion. Harrow v. Ohio River Co., 38 W. Va. 711, 18 S. E. Rep. 926.

Submitting Instruction after Jury Directed to Retire.—It is the legal right of counsel on the trial to submit instructions to the jury, and have them passed upon by the court; but where instructions are submitted by the counsel after the jury has been directed to retire, and the court refuses to consider them because offered too late, the court of appeals will not reverse the judgment of the trial court, unless it affirmatively appears that the said court manifestly abused the large discretion vested in it in respect to its action in such matters. Tully v. Despard, 31 W. Va. 870, 6 S. E. Rep. 927.

Setting Aside Nonsuit.—The appellate court can review the action of the trial court in refusing to set aside a nonsuit and can order the cause to be reinstated and remanded to the lower court. M. & F. Bank v. Mathews, 3 W. Va. 26.

Withdrawal of Demurrer to Evidence.—After the taking of the testimony in the case, the defendant demurred to the evidence, and the plaintiffs joined therein, and immediately after such joinder the defendant asked leave to withdraw his said demurrer to which the plaintiffs objected; but the court overruled the objection, and allowed the demurrer to be withdrawn. Held, that the court of appeals allows to the courts below a wide latitude of discretion in all such matters of practice arising during the trial of the case below, and, in general, will not review such discretionary action, unless the same has been exercised in a manner plainly arbitrary, or otherwise obviously improper. Burns v. Morrison, 36 W. Va. 423, 15 S. E. Rep. 62.

Dismissal of Jury.—What constitutes a reasonable time during which the jury should be kept together, lies within the discretion of the trial court, and its action will not be reviewed except in a clear case of abuse of such discretion. Buntin v. Danville, 93 Va. 200, 212, 24 S. E. Rep. 830.

New Trial.

Generally.—The appellate court can review the action of the lower court in granting or refusing a new trial, where a bill of exception is filed and if the lower court erred may reverse its judgment. Power v. Finkle, 4 Call 411; Slaughter v. Tutt, 12 Leigh 147; Keys v. McFatrige, 6 Munf. 18; Com. v. Wormley, 8 Gratt. 712; Ball's Case, 8 Leigh 726; Hill's Case, 2 Gratt. 594; Brown v. Speyers, 20 Gratt. 296; Walton v. Com., 32 Gratt. 855; Hoover v. State, 1 W. Va. 335.

Or affirm it if no error is perceived. State v. Bettsall, 11 W. Va. 703, 727; Davis v. Walker, 7 W. Va. 447; Tefft v. Marsh, 1 W. Va. 38; Sweeney v. Baker, 13 W. Va. 168.

An appellate court ought not to grant a new trial where it has been refused in the court below, except in cases of gross and palpable deviation from the evidence. Brugh v. Shanks, 5 Leigh 508. See note on "New Trials."

Quashal of Indictment.—In general it rests in the sound discretion of the court whether it will quash an indictment. Nevertheless, if the fact for which the defendant has been examined by an examining court cannot be ascertained from the record of that court; but can only be ascertained by testimony dehors the record it is the duty of the superior court to quash the indictment. In such case, testimony dehors the record of the examining court cannot be looked into. Com. v. John M'Caul, 1 Va. Cas. 271.

Amendment of Bill.—Under § 12, ch. 125, Code of W. Va., allowing the plaintiff to amend his bill at any time after the appearance of the defendant if substantial justice will be promoted thereby, it is the province of the court below to decide when a proper case presents itself and his discretion is not to be reviewed unless abused. Western M. & M. Co. v. Virginia, etc., Coal Co., 10 W. Va. 250, 295.

Directing Issues Out of Chancery.—The courts of chancery have a legal discretion on the propriety of directing issues: their action in regard thereto may be reviewed by an appellate tribunal. Reed v. Cline, 9 Gratt. 137; Beverley v. Walden, 20 Gratt. 147; Stannard v. Graves, 2 Call 369; Fishburne v. Ferguson, 84 Va. 87, 4 S. E. Rep. 575. See monographic note on "Issue Out of Chancery" appended to Lavell v. Gold, 25 Gratt. 478.

New Trial of Issues.—A decree of a circuit court granting or refusing a new trial on an issue out of chancery, may be reviewed in the supreme court of appeals. Tompkins v. Stephens, 10 W. Va. 156.

Submitting Questions to Jury for Special Finding.—As to when questions shall be submitted to the jury for special findings, the trial court has discretion not to allow them to be submitted at a stage so unreasonable as to be manifestly unfair to the other side, but its action in submitting or not submitting them, is subject to review. § 5, ch. 131, Code W. Va.; Peninsular, etc., Co. v. Franklin Ins. Co., 35 W. Va. 666, 14 S. E. Rep. 237.

Removal of Executors.—There must, of necessity, be vested in the court a very large discretion; and while it is a legal discretion, to be exercised in a proper case, an appellate court ought not to interfere, except in a case where manifest injustice has been done, or where it is plain that a proper case has not been made for the exercise of the powers which the law has specially conferred on the court from which the fiduciary derives his authority. Reynolds v. Zink, 27 Gratt. 29.

Appointment of Receivers.—To appoint, or refuse to appoint receivers, is a discretionary power, which will not be interfered with on appeal, except in cases where the discretion has been manifestly abused. Wagner v. Coen, 41 W. Va. 351, 23 S. E. Rep. 735.

Appointment and Removal of Commissioner.—The circuit court has absolute control over its commissioners, with the power to appoint and remove at its discretion; and unless such discretion is plainly abused, to the prejudice of the parties to the litigation, the court of appeals cannot interfere therewith. Arbogast v. McGraw, 47 W. Va. 263, 34 S. E. Rep. 736.

Overruling Motion to Dissolve Injunction.—The exercise of a sound discretion without abuse by a circuit judge in overruling a motion in vacation to dissolve an injunction is not reviewable. McEl-downey v. Lowther, 49 W. Va. 348, 38 S. E. Rep. 644. See monographic note on "Injunctions" appended to Claytor v. Anthony, 15 Gratt. 518.

Exceptions to Answers.—The mode in which an exception to an answer shall point out the omission excepted to, is a matter of practice discretionary with the court, and not a subject of appeal. Craig v. Sebrell, 9 Gratt. 131.

Granting of Appellate Process.—Where a court refuses to grant a writ of error, or a mandamus, or a writ of prohibition, or a writ of certiorari, or other proper writ to remedy the wrong complained of, and the person asking such writ has no other remedy, though it is a discretionary writ, the appellate court will review, by the appropriate writ, the order refusing to grant such writ, though, when such order was made, no one was before the court but the party complaining, and though the other party never had been heard in the court below; for, if such an order cannot be reviewed by an appellate court, there is a total failure in the law to furnish any remedy for a wrong,—and because such order entered of record refusing to award such writ, when the plaintiff has the right to have it awarded, and has no other redress for the wrong, though not technically a final judgment, is, so far as the plaintiff is concerned, in its operation and effect, a final judgment against him, just as much as it would have been had the writ been awarded, and, on the hearing of the case, had been decided against him; and no injustice or wrong is done to the defendant, as, in such a case, if the inferior court refusing to grant such writ is reversed, the order of the appellate court will be only that the writ shall be issued, and he will have his hearing after it is issued, before the inferior court, and he has his hearing before the appellate court on the question of the propriety of issuing such writ, when the writ prayed for in the court below is a discretionary writ, and not a writ of right. Welch v. County Court, 29 W. Va. 63, 1 S. E. Rep. 337.

Granting Retail Liquor License.—The county court, under the act of June 29th, 1870, Sess. Acts 1869-70, ch. 74, has a discretion to grant or refuse a license to retail ardent spirits, and its judgment is final, and cannot be reviewed by the circuit court by a writ of supersedeas, all proceedings upon such writ are coram non iudice and void, including the judgment and execution in the higher court, and a writ of prohibition will be awarded by the supreme court to the judge of the circuit court, superseding the supersedeas and all proceedings thereon. French v. Noel, 22 Gratt. 454; Ex parte Yeager, 11 Gratt. 655.

But in Leigton v. Maury, 76 Va. 865, it was held that, under the Acts 1879-80, p. 148, changing the wording of the statute from "may" to "shall" and giving an appeal to the circuit court, the court has a sound judicial discretion in determining whether the applicant is a "fit" person and the place "suitable and convenient," and if satisfied on these points it is its duty to issue the license and this discretion is reviewable, both in the circuit court and the court of appeals.

But in Ailstock v. Page, 77 Va. 386, it was held that the change of the word "shall" back to "may" in the Act of March 6, 1882, was intended to restore the law as laid down in French v. Noel, 22 Gratt. 454, and to leave it discretionary with the county court to grant or refuse such licenses; though such discretion must be a sound legal discretion, a discretion to be exercised upon a full and complete survey of all the circumstances of each particular case, regard being had to the interest and policy of the state as manifested in the statute, as well as to the interests of the applicant and to the interests of the community in which the business is to be carried on, since a right of appeal to the circuit court is given to the applicant.

In Ex parte Lester, 77 Va. 663, it was held under the same statute that the whole subject was not remitted to the unlimited discretion of the county court; but that, an immediate appeal being allowed to the circuit court, it is still mandatory on the county court to issue the license, if on hearing the testimony, it is satisfied that the applicant fulfills the requirements of the statute.

Judicial Sales.

Ordering Sale.—The discretion vested in the court ordering the sale is always subject to review in the appellate court. It is not an arbitrary discretion, but a judicial discretion, which must be exercised reasonably and justly; and any party who may think himself aggrieved by the decree against him may apply for an appeal to the court of appeals. Todd v. Gallego, etc., Co., 84 Va. 586, 5 S. E. Rep. 676.

Reasonable Time.—In enforcing the lien of a judgment against land it lies within the discretion of the trial court to decide what is a "reasonable time" within which the rents and profits should discharge the lien, but this is not an arbitrary but a sound, legal discretion, subject to review in the appellate court, but the debtor must have asked that the property be rented in the lower court. Rose v. Brown, 11 W. Va. 122; Hill v. Morehead, 20 W. Va. 429.

Quantity to Be Sold.—Whether it be necessary to sell the whole tract or only a part lies in the discretion of the lower court, and its decision will not be reversed unless plainly erroneous. Johnson v. Wagner, 76 Va. 587.

Sequestrating Income Instead of Directing Sale.—Where a trust fund has been created the annual interest or income from which is directed to be paid to an execution debtor, it is not error for a court of equity to sequester such interest or income, and direct its payment to the execution creditors instead of directing a sale of the interest of the debtor. This does exact justice to all concerned. Courts of equity have a discretion in such cases which will not be reviewed or reversed except for error appearing on the face of the record. Frank v. People's Bank, 95 Va. 500, 28 S. E. Rep. 874.

Confirmation of Sale.—A motion to confirm or set aside a sale made under its decree, is one addressed to the legal discretion of the court, to be governed by the circumstances of the particular case; and if improperly exercised it will in a proper case be corrected by appeal, at the instance of the injured party. Childs v. Hurd, 25 W. Va. 530; Marling v. Robrecht, 13 W. Va. 440, 474.

Opening Biddings.—In discussing the principles applicable to the opening of biddings before confirmation, JUDGE ANDERSON, speaking for the court in Roudabush v. Miller, 32 Gratt. 464, 465, said that "in a proper case, where it would be just to all the parties concerned, this court may be understood as having sanctioned a practice in the circuit courts, in the exercise of a sound discretion, of setting aside a sale made by commissioners under a decree, and reopening the bidding upon the offer of an advanced bid of a sufficient amount deposited or well secured; and to that extent the former English practice has been allowed in this state. But it has never been held imperative upon the courts to set aside the sale and reopen the bids. It is a question addressed to the sound discretion of the courts, subject to the review of the appellate tribunal, and the propriety of its exercise depends upon the circumstances of each case, and can only be rightfully exercised when it can be done with a due regard to the rights and interests of all concerned—the purchaser as well as others." Berlin v. Melhorn, 75 Va. 639.

No person can demand a resale of property after the former sale has been confirmed, upon the mere offer of an upset bid; hence he cannot complain in an appellate court of the terms on which such resale is granted, if granted at all. Yost v. Porter, 80 Va. 855.

F. JUDGMENTS BY CONFESSION.—A confession of judgment amounts to a release of all previous errors in the proceedings. Cooke v. Pope, 3 Munf. 167. See monographic note on "Judgments by Confession" appended to Richardson v. Jones, 12 Gratt. 53.

Where a writ of error is only taken to an order of the lower court amending a judgment by confession for judicial error, the appellate court can only render such judgment as the lower court should have rendered and dismiss the motion to amend; it cannot consider any errors in the original judgment. Stringer v. Anderson, 23 W. Va. 482.

Relinquishment of Plea.—Where the defendant relinquishes his plea and agrees to the plaintiff's damages, there is a judgment by confession, amounting to a release of errors and defendant cannot appeal even by consent of plaintiff. Cooke v. Pope, 3 Munf. 167.

Confession of Judgment on Forthcoming Bond.—A confession of judgment on a forthcoming bond operates a release of error in the original judgment. Edmonds v. Green, 1 Rand. 44. See monographic note on "Judgments by Confession" appended to Richardson v. Jones, 12 Gratt. 53.

G. JUDGMENTS AND DECREES BY DEFAULT.

Decrees Rendered on Bill Taken for Confessed.—Under § 5, ch. 134 of the Code of West Virginia the appellate court is forbidden to allow or entertain any appeal from decrees rendered on bills taken for confessed, unless an application has been first made to the court making such decree to correct the errors complained of and such motion has been overruled in whole or in part. Steenrod v. Railroad, 25 W. Va. 133; Saunders v. Griggs, 81 Va. 506; Dickinson v. Lewis, 7 W. Va. 673; Baker v. Western M. & M. Co., 6 W. Va. 196; Hartley v. Roffe, 12 W. Va. 401, 419; Hill v. Bowyer, 18 Gratt. 369, 377; Rowland v. Rowland, 11 W. Va. 262, 274; Forest v. Stephens, 21 W. Va. 316; McKinney v. Hammett, 26 W. Va. 628; Gates v. Cragg, 11 W. Va. 300; Hunter v. Kennedy, 30 W. Va. 343; Bock v. Bock, 24 W. Va. 586; Hix v. Hix, 25 W. Va. 481; Beaty v. Veon, 18 W. Va. 291; Ferrell v. Camden, 49 W. Va. 252, 38 S. E. Rep. 581; Cann v. Cann, 45 W. Va. 563, 31 S. E. Rep. 923.

The court of appeals has no jurisdiction of an appeal from a decree by default until relief has been sought under § 3451 of the Code, by motion to the court in which the decree was rendered. When the time allowed by this section has expired, the decree becomes final and irreversible. Smith v. Powell, 98 Va. 431, 36 S. E. Rep. 522.

A party who has allowed a decree to be rendered against him as an absent defendant, cannot appeal from the decree: his only remedy is to have the cause reheard. Platt v. Howland, 10 Leigh 507; Lenows v. Lenow, 8 Gratt. 349; Barbee v. Pannill, 6 Gratt. 442; Meadows v. Justice, 6 W. Va. 198; Newman v. Mollohan, 10 W. Va. 488, 504; Higginbotham v. Haselden, 3 W. Va. 17; Handy v. Scott, 26 W. Va. 710.

A decree confirming a sale of real estate will not be reversed for an error in the decree ordering the sale, where no steps have been taken in the court below, under § 5, ch. 134, before the confirmation to reverse said decree. Dick v. Robinson, 19 W. Va. 159.

In a foreign attachment, an absent debtor who has not appeared in the court below cannot appeal, his only remedy is by petition to the lower court for a rehearing. Vance v. Snyder, 6 W. Va. 24.

But where the parties have submitted the case on its merits and a decision in the appellate court will terminate a protracted controversy, the appellate court may pass upon the question presented by the record although no proper motion was made in the court below. Coffman v. Sangston, 21 Gratt. 26.

Or where the parties have expressly waived such objection. Com. v. Levy, 23 Gratt. 21, 31.

Reason of Rule.—The reason of the rule which denies the right of a nonresident to appeal until he has submitted his defence to the inferior court is founded upon the legal principle that the court of appeals is a court of exclusively appellate jurisdiction, confined to the review of the questions of law and fact which have been presented to and passed upon by the inferior court. Haymond v. Camden, 22 W. Va. 180.

What Constitutes Such a Decree.—As to what constitutes a decree by confession, see monographic note on "Decrees" appended to Evans v. Spurgin, 11 Gratt. 615.

Where a decree has been rendered in a cause upon a demurrer to the bill, an answer, a supplemental and amended answer, and replications thereto, upon depositions taken, and the report of a commissioner, which has been excepted to, the exceptions acted upon, and the principles of the cause adjudicated, such decree cannot be reversed upon motion under chapter 134 of the Code. Rader v. Adamson, 37 W. Va. 582, 16 S. E. Rep. 808.

Informal Answer.—Where the informal answer of one defendant has been filed by leave of court in a suit against an administrator and other defendants for a settlement of his account and the sale of land for the payment of debts, and the court has given it the effect of an answer not replied to, and has based its decrees on it, and has decreed against the defendants, such decree is not a decree by default as to him, and he is entitled to have it reversed. White v. Kennedy, 28 W. Va. 221.

When Demurrer Alone Is Filed.—"If a defendant in a bill files no plea or answer but files a demurre:

simply on the ground that the plaintiff on the facts stated in the bill is entitled to no relief against him, and the court below overrules such demurrer and awards a rule against him to answer the bill at a specified time, and he fails to do so, and a decree is rendered against him, and makes no motion to have it reversed or corrected in the court below, and he appeals from such decree, solely on the ground that the court rendered any sort of a decree against him, this court will, though he did not make such motion, entertain his appeal, because such appeal though in form an appeal from the last decree is in substance and in reality an appeal from the decree overruling his demurrer and deciding, that the plaintiff was entitled to relief on the statements in the bill against him, and is therefore not to be regarded as a decree on a bill taken for confessed. But if the appellant in such case does not confine his appeal to the error committed by the court in overruling his demurrer simply carried out in the last decree but insists, that there are in addition thereto other and independent errors in the last decree against him, which should be reversed, even though the appellate court hold that the demurrer was properly overruled, the court of appeals will not entertain such appeal, because, so far as these additional and independent errors are concerned, this last decree is to be regarded as a decree on a bill taken for confessed and cannot be reversed by this court, till a motion to correct it has been made in the court below." Watson v. Wigginton, 28 W. Va. 533; Stewart v. Stewart, 27 W. Va. 167.

Where Exceptions to Report of Sale Are Filed.—So where defendant has filed exceptions to the report of sale, he may have the decree overruling his exceptions reviewed in the appellate court without any motion in the court below, if he does not complain of errors in the decree of sale which was rendered on a bill taken for confessed as to him. Stewart v. Stewart, 27 W. Va. 167; Beatty v. Veon, 18 W. Va. 291.

Judgments by Default.—Likewise in case of judgment by default, under §§ 5, 6, ch. 181, Code of Va. and § 5, ch. 134, Code W. Va., application must first be made to the court in which the judgment was rendered to correct any error for which the judgment might be reversed by an appellate court and such application must be refused before an appellate court can entertain an appeal, writ of error, or supersedeas. Goolsby v. Strother, 21 Gratt. 107; Davis v. Com., 16 Gratt. 134; Smith v. Knight, 14 W. Va. 749; Adamson v. Pearce, 20 W. Va. 59; Capehart v. Cunningham, 12 W. Va. 750; Goolsby v. St. John, 25 Gratt. 146; Watson v. Wigginton, 28 W. Va. 533, 545.

The above section is as applicable to judgments which are a nullity as to other judgments by default. State v. Slack, 28 W. Va. 372.

Section 5, ch. 134, applies as well to judgments by default for fines in misdemeanor cases as in civil cases. State v. Slack, 28 W. Va. 372.

Not Applicable to Judgments by Confession.—But the first clause of § 5, ch. 134, Code W. Va., has no application to a judgment by confession, errors in such judgments, if judicial, and so not amendable under the second clause of same section can only be corrected by writ of error to the appellate court. Stringer v. Anderson, 23 W. Va. 482; Richardson v. Jones, 12 Gratt. 53.

Petition for Rehearing.—In Coffman v. Sangston, 21 Gratt. 262, STAPLES, J., said that the notice in that case, not having been served upon either of the parties-plaintiff, but upon the counsel in the cause and not specifying the errors complained of, nor in any manner disclosing the character of the decree defendant desired, the lower court might properly have refused to entertain the application upon the ground that the notice was not served on the proper parties, or was too vague and indefinite, and the appellate court might dismiss the appeal on the ground that there was no proper motion. But they did not dismiss it in that case on the ground that the parties had submitted the case upon the merits, and a decision would terminate a protracted controversy.

Assignment of Errors.—In Gunn v. Turner, 21 Gratt. 382, it was held that the failure to serve process on all the defendants could not be considered in the appellate court because it had not been assigned as error in the motion to the lower court to amend the judgment although such a motion had been made, but in Saunders v. Griggs, 81 Va. 506, it was explained that the ground of decision was that it was not made to appear affirmatively in the record that process had not been served, not because this error had not been specifically assigned in the motion to amend.

In Laidley v. Bright, 17 W. Va. 779, 801, GREEN, P., while acknowledging that it was unnecessary to the decision of the case, said that he was not satisfied that it was necessary to specify error in the notice of such a motion.

Formal Petition Not Necessary.—When decrees have been rendered against a nonresident defendant upon publication, who did not appear, though he does not file a formal petition for a rehearing, if he files his answer containing substantially what a petition should have stated in the court below without objection, asking that said decree be set aside, this is sufficient, and the appeal will not be dismissed as improvidently granted. It is too late for the appellee to object in the court of appeals for the first time that the appellant was permitted to file his answer without giving security as the law requires. To make such an objection then is to admit and invoke the jurisdiction of that court for the correction of an alleged error in the court below, and this cannot be done on a motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction. Haymond v. Camden, 22 W. Va. 180.

Bill Instead of Petition.—Although a bill is filed to correct the decree by confession instead of a motion being made as provided by statute, and the appeal is from the decree on this bill and not from the original decree, yet, if the bill embraces other grounds which give the court jurisdiction, so that no inconvenience or additional expense results from embracing in it such allegation of error as might have been made the ground of a motion under the statute, and the record in the original case is made a part of the bill, the appellate court may correct any error in the original decree, and a reversal of this decree will have the same effect as a reversal of the original decree. Hill v. Bowyer, 18 Gratt. 364, 377.

Where a nonresident defendant, against whom a decree has been rendered upon publication has filed what he styles a "bill of review" but which has all the elements required for a petition for a rehearing by the statute, he may appeal from the decree refusing to entertain his application for a rehearing and correction of alleged errors, and he may have a review not only of such decree, but also of the decrees entered in the cause before his appearance and sought to be reheard and corrected by his petition. Martin v. Smith, 25 W. Va. 579.

Bill of Review.—It is not proper to treat a bill of review filed to correct errors of law which is barred by the statute of limitations as a notice to correct errors under § 5, ch. 181 of the Code Va. 1860, especially when the decrees sought to be reviewed were not rendered on a bill taken for confessed as to one of the plaintiffs in the bill of review. Amiss v. McGinnis, 12 W. Va. 371, 399.

Limitation on Motion or Petition.—By analogy to the limitation upon the right of appeal from final decrees, the proceeding by motion to correct errors in a final judgment by default or decree on a bill taken for confessed is limited to five years. Kendrick v. Whitney, 28 Gratt. 646.

The proceeding by motion under § 5, ch. 181, Code Va. 1860, to correct even an interlocutory decree is barred after five years, but such motion may, after five years has elapsed be treated as a petition for a rehearing. Kendrick v. Whitney, 28 Gratt. 646.

Where Codefendant Appeals.—In Lenows v. Lenow, 8 Gratt. 352, it was held that though the absent defendant had no right by reason of the statute to appeal, not having sought his rehearing in the court below, yet a codefendant, who had appeared, could nevertheless appeal before such rehearing had been sought, from a joint decree against him and the nonresident defendant, who had not been served with process or appeared. And that such appeal necessarily brings under review the propriety of the whole decree, and devolves upon the court the duty of correcting and reversing it, if erroneous, in favor of both the nonresident defendant, who had not appeared, and the defendant who had. The same principle was followed in the case of The Coal River Navigation Co. v. Webb, 3 W. Va. 488; Watson v. Wigginton, 28 W. Va. 533; White v. Kennedy, 28 W. Va. 221.

Where a bill is taken for confessed, as to one of two joint defendants and both appeal, the appeal will not be dismissed as to the former under §§ 3451-2, where the appeal of the other defendant necessarily brings up the question in which the first defendant is interested; she being interested in it also. Flynn v. Jackson, 98 Va. 341, 25 S. E. Rep. 1.

The principles thus decided are obviously equally applicable to a judgment by default, when process has been served and in which also a rehearing must be sought in the court below, as provided for in the sixth section of chapter one hundred and thirty-four of the Code of West Virginia, before an appeal can be taken. It must follow that in such case, if there be a joint judgment against two, one by default and the other upon issue tried, that the party against whom the judgment was rendered, after the trial of the issue, has a right at once to take his appeal; and in hearing this appeal, the court of appeals must necessarily take under consideration the whole judgment as to both parties, and, if erroneous, reverse it as to both. And it necessarily follows that if not erroneous, it must affirm it as to both.

The sixth section of chapter one hundred and thirty-four of the Code, which requires a party to apply to the court below for the correction of certain errors, before applying to the appellate court, cannot be regarded as in conflict with the right of the appellate court thus to proceed, when once in rightful possession of a case, and with jurisdiction over the parties. Newman v. Mollohan, 10 W. Va. 488.

Absent Defendant May Still Petition for Rehearing before Affirmance.—In a suit in which there is an absent defendant, there is a decree against the home defendant, from which he appeals. Pending the appeal the absent defendant may file his petition in the court below to be permitted to appear and file his answer in the cause, and may have the decree reheard and set aside, if it is erroneous as to him. James River and Kanawha Co. v. Littlejohn, 18 Gratt. 53.

If upon such rehearing the decree, or so much of it as is the subject of appeal, is wholly set aside, the appeal will generally be dismissed. But if an appeal is taken from the decree on the rehearing, before the dismissal of the first appeal, the appellate court may refuse to dismiss it. James River and Kanawha Co. v. Littlejohn, 18 Gratt. 53.

In Newman v. Mollohan, 10 W. Va. 488, 504, it was said that on the authority of the above case that it might be that before the appellate court has decided the case, such petition or other proceeding for the correction of errors might be instituted in the court below and the appellate court would suspend proceedings till the court below had decided whether any correction should be made.

But Not after.—But after the decree has been affirmed, it cannot be again reviewed in whole or in part by the circuit court under the fifth section of chapter one hundred and thirty-four of the Code of West Virginia. Newman v. Mollohan, 10 W. Va. 488.

May Appeal from Denial of Petition.—But where the defendant has made the motion required by § 5, ch. 184, Code W. Va., and it has been overruled, he has the right to appeal. Midkiff v. Lusher, 27 W. Va. 489; Laidley v. Bright, 17 W. Va. 779, 791; Ambler v. Leach, 15 W. Va. 677.

A writ of supersedeas will lie to the judgment overruling such motion. Higginbotham v. Haselden, 3 W. Va. 268; Saunders v. Griggs, 81 Va. 506.

Where a petition to rehear a decree rendered against an absent defendant is denied, the appeal should be from the order denying the petition, not from the original decree. Grinnan v. Edwards, 5 W. Va. 111.

H. VOID DECREES.—A writ of error or appeal will lie to or from a judgment, decree or order of a court, although the same may be void for want of jurisdiction in the court by which it was rendered, or for other cause appearing upon the record. Crane v. Crane, 21 Gratt. 579.

Although a decree is void because rendered against one who was not a party or for other cause, yet he can have such decree reversed on appeal. McCoy v. Allen, 16 W. Va. 724; Cook v. Dorsey, 38 W. Va. 196, 18 S. E. Rep. 468; Monroe v. Bartlett, 6 W. Va. 441.

I. CONSENT DECREE.—An appeal will not lie from a consent decree. Manion v. Fahy, 11 W. Va. 482; Hinton v. Bland, 81 Va. 588; Weekly v. Hardesty, 48 W. Va. 99, 35 S. E. Rep. 880.

Presumption of Assent.—A party may be concluded by his acquiescence in a decree affecting his rights made in the progress of the cause, under which he takes a part of the fund affected by it, and makes no objection to it until after the final decree in the cause made twenty-two years after it. Burton v. Brown, 22 Gratt. 1.

III. WHO MAY APPEAL.

A. PARTIES ONLY CAN APPEAL.—A person who is not a party to the proceeding in which the judgment of the court below complained of was rendered cannot obtain a supersedeas to such judgment. Supervisors of Culpeper Co. v. Gorrell, 20 Gratt. 484, 519; Ex parte Lester, 77 Va. 663; County Court v. Boreman, 34 W. Va. 87, 11 S. E. Rep. 747.

One not a formal party cannot appeal, though affected as a pendente lite purchaser. Stout v. Philippi Mfg., etc., Co., 41 W. Va. 339, 23 S. E. Rep. 571.

A reversioner or remainderman may in some cases. Wingfield v. Crenshaw, 8 H. & M. 245.

Persons filing a petition to set aside a decree in a suit to which they are not parties, have no right to appeal from the decree in such suit on the dismissal of their petition, although the costs of the petition are decreed against them. Campbell v. Bowen, 1 Rob. 241.

No one but a party can appeal but when an entry on the docket reads, "H. Free appeared and filed bond with Frank Burt as security, and asks that an appeal be granted to the Circuit Court of Marion County. Bond approved and appeal granted. J. F. Christy, Justice," and the appeal bond recites the appeal as asked for by Bert Free, it will be presumed that H. Free, not being a party himself was applying for the appeal as agent of a party. York v. Free, 38 W. Va. 336, 18 S. E. Rep. 492.

Interest Not Sufficient.—Even though the record show that he has an interest in the subject-matter of controversy. Renick v. Ludington, 20 W. Va. 511, 137; Board of Supervisors v. Gorrell, 20 Gratt. 484.

A supersedeas, to a judgment of a county court granting leave to erect a mill, will not lie in behalf of a person, who may be interested, but whose name does not appear, as a party, in the record of the county court. Wingfield v. Crenshaw, 8 H. & M. 245.

"Holcomb v. Purcell, etc., decided by this court in 1892, is a strong case upon this head. In that case the court held that a principal obligor in a forthcoming bond, against whom the judgment in the original suit was rendered, but against whom no judgment was rendered on the forthcoming bond, was not entitled to appeal from a judgment against a surety in the forthcoming bond. Upon the face of the record it must have appeared that the principal obligor was collaterally interested, since the surety would be entitled to recover of him the amount of the judgment whenever the surety should discharge the same; but not being immediately a party to the judgment, the court dismissed the appeal." Board of Supervisors v. Gorrell, 20 Gratt. 484.

Such person should make himself a party to the contest before the final decision in the county court, and then it is competent for him to carry the case to a superior tribunal. Wingfield v. Crenshaw, 8 H. & M. 245.

In a contest about a will, a person who was not a party in the county court may, by becoming interested after an appeal to the district court, be admitted a party there, and carry up the cause to the court of appeals; but, on reversing the judgment of the district court, and affirming that of the county court, such party can only recover the costs in the district court. Cogbill v. Cogbill, 2 H. & M. 467.

Must Be a Proper Party.—The commissioner of school lands is neither a necessary nor proper party to a chancery suit brought in the name of the state of West Virginia, under § 6, ch. 24, Acts 1893, to sell lands for delinquent taxes and therefore he is not entitled to appeal from the decree of the circuit court in such suit. Lawson v. Hart, 40 W. Va. 52, 20 S. E. Rep. 819.

In a proceeding to condemn land for public purposes, any indirect interest persons may have in the subject as citizens, taxpayers, and landholders of the county, is not sufficient to make them proper parties. They do not become parties by merely offering to become so, when that offer is rejected. If they become parties to anything, it is merely to the order of rejection; and not to the order confirming the report of the commissioners. And their supersedeas, if they are entitled to any, will only be to the said order of rejection, and not to the order of confirmation. They are not entitled to a supersedeas to the former order, for they are not aggrieved thereby. The order of the county court, made after the rendition of the judgment, suspending it for thirty days to allow the exceptants to apply for an appeal and supersedeas, does not make them parties to the proceeding in the county court. To give it that effect would be to make the court do, indirectly, what it had just before expressly refused to do. Board of Supervisors v. Gorrell, 20 Gratt. 484; Ex parte Lester, 77 Va. 663.

Under the statute of March 6, 1882, touching the granting of liquor licenses, a right of appeal to the circuit court is given to the applicant alone, and in his case only to the circuit court, hence those opposing the granting of the license cannot appeal to the circuit court having no interest in the matter such as would entitle them to have themselves made parties. If they do appeal and obtain a writ of error or supersedeas, a writ of prohibition will be awarded to the applicant by the supreme court, commanding them to proceed no further on such writ of error or supersedeas. Ailstock v. Page, 77 Va. 386; Ex parte Lester, 77 Va. 663.

The proceedings for the sale of forfeited lands for the benefit of the school fund under the statute of W. Va., ch. 134, Acts 1872-3, are not judicial, but administrative in their character nor are they technically proceedings either in rem against the land, or in personam against the former owner; such lands are the absolute property of the state and she alone has any interest in the proceedings for their sale; the effect of the fifth section of article 13 of our Constitution, giving to the former owner of such lands the surplus proceeds of the sale over the taxes, etc., is a gratuity and his claim thereto is confined to such proceeds, and no lien upon or interest in the land or the proceedings for its sale is conferred by said provision upon such former owner; and having no interest in, or lien upon the land, he is not entitled to be a party to the proceedings for the sale; and consequently has no right to appeal to the court of appeals. McClure v. Maitland, 24 W. Va. 561; Auvil v. Jaeger, 24 W. Va. 583.

B. WHO ARE PARTIES.

Personal Representative of Deceased Party.—The personal representative may obtain a writ of error upon showing that his intestate has died since the judgment; although the plaintiff has not revived the suit. The court saying: "It is true, that it is a general rule, that no person can bring a writ of error, who is not a party or a privy to the record; but the right to bring the writ of error in case of the death of the party, against whom the judgment was rendered, will be in the personal representative without a revival of the judgment, because the personal representative stands in the shoes of the deceased and has the same rights, as his intestate had, with reference to the judgment." Phares v. Saunders, 18 W. Va. 336.

An administrator is entitled to prosecute an appeal from an adverse decree against his decedent in a suit to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of land necessary to pay debts of the estate. O'Connor v. O'Connor, 45 W. Va. 351, 32 S. E. Rep. 276.

An appeal can be taken by a personal representative as of right, in like manner, as other suitors, under chapter 136, Code of West Virginia. And a petition to the court of appeals or a judge thereof, by a personal representative is not necessary, unless he would be relieved from giving the undertaking required by that chapter. Hutchinson v. Landcraft, 4 W. Va. 812.

Purchaser at a Judicial Sale.—Although a purchaser at a judicial sale cannot appeal from the decree directing the sale nor from any other order or decree of the court made in the cause prior to his bid; yet a bidder at such sale, who has made a cash payment, becomes thereby so far a "party to the controversy" under § 1, ch. 17, Acts 1872-3, as to entitle him to take an appeal from a decree setting aside such sale. Kable v. Mitchell, 9 W. Va. 492; Roberts v. Roberts, 13 Gratt. 639.

The purchaser of property at a judicial sale, who has complied with the terms thereof, becomes a party to the suit from the time of his purchase, and acquires an inchoate right, which entitles him to a hearing upon the question whether the sale should be set aside, and if the court err by setting aside the sale improperly, the purchaser will in a proper case, have the right to appeal to a higher tribunal. Childs v. Hurd, 25 W. Va. 530.

So he may appeal from a decree confirming the sale. Talley v. Starke, 6 Gratt. 339, 349.

A purchaser can only appeal from a decree erroneously affirming or disaffirming the sale, at which she purchased; errors in the subsequent proceedings are matters in which she has no concern and from which she has no right to appeal. Bank v. Ewing, 21 W. Va. 208.

Where a person who bid at a judicial sale of land and refused to comply with the terms of the sale, at a resale, attempted to bid through an agent, in disregard of the terms of sale, it was held that, such person had no standing to appeal from a decree confirming the sale to another person. Hildreth v. Turner, 89 Va. 858, 17 S. E. Rep. 471.

Where a sale of property has been made under a decree of a court of equity, and before the same has been confirmed, the court has set the same aside and ordered the property to be reoffered for sale, the purchaser at such first sale cannot appeal from the decree setting the same aside, before such resale has been made and confirmed. Childs v. Hurd, 25 W. Va. 530.

County Court Not a Party in Proceeding for Reassessment of Land.—A county court is not a party to an appeal taken, under § 7, ch. 36, Acts 1891, for reassessment of lands, by a landowner, from the decision of a county court refusing to reduce the valuation of his land made by a commissioner under said act, and cannot maintain a writ of error from the court of appeals to the decision of a circuit court upon such appeal. Mackin v. Taylor County Court, 88 W. Va. 338, 18 S. E. Rep. 632.

Receiver.—A receiver or commissioner, is but an officer of the court and he has no right to intermeddle in questions affecting the rights of the parties or the disposition of the property or funds in his hands. His holding is the holding of the court for him, from whom the possession is taken, and he has no more right to interfere in the litigation or ask for a revision of a decree or order affecting the rights or claims of the parties than an entire stranger to the cause. But where his own accounts or his personal rights are affected he must necessarily have the same means of redress that any other party so affected would have. Ruhl v. Ruhl, 24 W. Va. 279.

Where a court makes a void decree by which it directs its receiver to pay over funds in his hands and, because he fails to obey such void decree, attaches and imprisons him for an indefinite time, the receiver is entitled to have such order of imprisonment reviewed. If the decree was void he was not bound to obey it, and he certainly could not be punished for refusing to do what he was under no legal obligation to do. Ruhl v. Ruhl, 24 W. Va. 279.

Other Party May Appeal.—The fact that a receiver appointed by a court cannot appeal from the judgment of that court, will not prevent the other party or parties to the action from appealing. Melendy v. Barbour, 78 Va. 544, 555.

Amicus Curiae.—An amicus curiae cannot appeal. Dunlop v. Com., 2 Call 284; Board of Supervisors of Culpeper Co. v. Gorrell, 20 Gratt. 484, 521.

Attorney in Fact.—A person appearing as attorney in fact for certain creditors of the intestate, and opposing the grant of administration, may appeal, though not interested, in any other respect, in the subject of controversy. Bohn v. Sheppard, 4 Munf. 408.

Appointee of Court.—GREEN, J., in Colman v. Oil Co., 25 W. Va. 148, 178, said that there was only one case in which a United States court could appoint any one to prosecute a writ of error in the appellate state court, that was under the bankrupt act when the plaintiff in error was a bankrupt and there was a judgment in the inferior court against him, which the assignee or court thinks should be reversed.

Councilmen of a City.—The councilmen of a city in their corporate capacity alone can apply for a writ of error to a mandamus ordering them to make a levy of taxes. Osborne v. Kammer, 96 Va. 228, 31 S. E. Rep. 19.

Creditor.—No creditor can prosecute a writ of error in the name of his debtor, or prevent the debtor from dismissing his writ of error when he pleases, even though the court has advanced funds from the hands of a receiver to enable the appellant to print the record in order to obtain his writ of error. Colman v. Oil Co., 25 W. Va. 148, 175.

C. MUST BE AGGRIEVED.—A person must not only be a party to the proceeding in the court below, but he must also be aggrieved by the judgment rendered therein, to entitle him to obtain a supersedeas to such judgment. Board of Supervisors of Culpeper Co. v. Gorrell, 20 Gratt. 484, 519; Ex parte Lester, 77 Va. 663; McKinney v. Kirk, 9 W. Va. 28; Edmunds v. Scott, 78 Va. 720; Little v. Bowen, 76 Va. 724; Handy v. Scott, 26 W. Va. 710; Hollingsworth v. Brooks, 7 W. Va. 559; Clark v. Johnston, 15 W. Va. 804; Miller v. Rose, 21 W. Va. 291; County Court v. Armstrong, 84 W. Va. 326, 12 S. E. Rep. 488.

Where a bill is dismissed on demurrer, any party aggrieved by the decree may appeal though he be a defendant in form. Atkinson v. McCormick, 76 Va. 791.

An appeal or supersedeas to a judgment ought not to be granted to any person not appearing to be interested in the matter in controversy. Sayre v. Grymes, 1 H. & M. 404.

And the appellant's interest must appear by the record. Colman v. Oil Co., 25 W. Va. 148, 174.

Where an order does not affect the right or the remedy of the appellant, he cannot appeal, e. g. an order dismissing a petition for a summons against the commonwealth and making the auditor defendant instead. Parsons v. Com., 80 Va. 163.

Interest Must Be Immediate.—An appellate court will not reverse a decree, though erroneous, at the instance of a party not interested in the property involved in the suit. It is not sufficient that he may be interested in the question litigated, or that by the determination of the question litigated, he may be a party in interest to some other suit, growing out of the decision of that question. Elcan v. Lancasterian School, 2 P. & H. 53.

Personal Representative.—A personal representative cannot appeal from a decree of sale of testator's lands, not being interested therein. Edmunds v. Scott, 78 Va. 720.

Where, on a bill for specific performance, the administrator of deceased party to contract answers and the heirs suffer default, where no personal judgment is rendered the administrator is not affected by the decree, and has no right of appeal. Ferrell v. Camden, 49 W. Va. 252, 38 S. E. Rep. 581.

An administrator has a sufficient interest, as the representative of his testator's personal estate to appeal from an improper decree of sale of land, though the infant heirs have not appealed, where the personal estate is liable to make up any inadequacy of the proceeds. Cocke v. Gilpin, 1 Rob. 20, 42.

It is well settled that where an executor, as such appeals from a decree which does not aggrieve the estate, the question cannot be considered whether he is aggrieved as an individual. Swann v. Housman, 90 Va. 816, 20 S. E. Rep. 830.

Surety.—A surety has a right to appeal not only from a decree ordering the sale of his principal's real estate, but from all prior decrees upon the correctness of which the correctness of said decree depends. Camden v. Haymond, 9 W. Va. 681; Steenrod v. Railroad Co., 25 W. Va. 133.

Bankrupt.—Pending a suit by judgment creditors against their debtor and others, to set aside a deed of trust or subject the surplus to payment of their debts, the debtor is declared a bankrupt on his own petition, and in the suit he claims his exemption and homestead out of the surplus of the purchase money of the land, after satisfying the debt secured by the deed of trust. The circuit court dismisses the debtor's application, and makes a decree distributing the fund. The bankrupt has such an interest in the case as entitles him to take an appeal. Barger v. Buckland, 28 Gratt. 850.

Deed of Trust Creditors.—Where, in a suit by the grantor in a deed of trust and of the cestuis against the trustee and others, a reference is made by the court to ascertain and report the amount of the trust debts, each trust creditor, who is a party has a right to appear before the commissioner and contest the claims of other creditors and is entitled to appeal from the decision of the commissioners. Fearnster v. Withrow, 9 W. Va. 296, 323; Temple v. Wright, 94 Va. 338, 26 S. E. Rep. 844.

Former Owner of Forfeited Lands.—In proceedings by the commissioner of school lands, under ch. 134, Acts 1872-73, for the sale of forfeited lands for the benefit of the school fund, the former owner of such lands, or other persons claiming title thereto, having no rights to be affected, and no interest in the proceedings, are not entitled to be made parties in the circuit court; and, if they be inadvertently made parties in that court, that will not give any of them the right to appeal to the court of appeals. McClure v. Manperture, 29 W. Va. 633, 2 S. E. Rep. 761.

Fraudulent Grantor.—Upon a bill to subject land in the hands of alleged fraudulent grantees to the lien of a judgment, the grantor cannot appeal from a decree adjudging them fraudulent, since he is not interested in the matter. Price v. Thrash, 30 Gratt. 515.

Forfeiture of Appellant's Interest.—The fact that after the judgment and before the writ of error was granted, the interest of the defendants in land, which is the subject of an action of ejectment, had been divested by forfeiture and vested in the state and enured to the benefit of the plaintiff is, no ground for an order of dismissal, but only for an affirmance of the decree or judgment, because no error to the prejudice of the appellant appears. Bradley v. Ewart, 18 W. Va. 598.

Effect of Assignment of Interest.

Right of Assignor.—When the sole plaintiff in a suit parts with his interest in whole or in part pendente lite, he may still apply for and prosecute an appeal from a decree in such suit, especially where the defendant had obtained a rule against the plaintiff and the alleged assignee to show cause why an order should not be entered that the said assignee file a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of revivor or that the suit be dismissed, and such rule has been discharged on account of the laches of the defendant in making his objections to the further proceeding of the cause. Zane v. Fink, 18 W. Va. 693, 739.

Right of Assignee.—Where land subject to a mechanic's lien is conveyed to a third party, such assignee has a right to prosecute an appeal in the name of his assignor from a decree holding the land subject to the lien. Hendricks v. Fields, 26 Gratt. 447.

The assignees, pendente lite, of the assets of a bank, have a right to prosecute an appeal in the name of the bank, even though the corporate rights of the bank have ceased by dissolution. Hall v. Bank of Virginia, 14 W. Va. 584, 604.

Where co-demandants bring a writ of right and recover against the tenants, but fearing a reversal on appeal, one demandant buys the claim of the tenants and obtains a supersedeas to the judgment in the name of his vendors, the supersedeas will not be dismissed on the motion of his co-demandant. Genin v. Ingersoll, 2 W. Va. 558.

Appeal by Successful Party.—A writ of error may be brought by the plaintiff to reverse his own judgment, if erroneous or given for a less sum than he has a right to demand in order to enable him to bring another action. Ballard v. Whitlock, 18 Gratt. 235.

D. THE COMMONWEALTH.

In Criminal Cases.

Generally.—No appeal lies in criminal cases, or prosecutions by indictments on behalf of the commonwealth. Com. v. Highland Crowe, 1 Va. Cas. 125; Com. v. Harrison, 2 Va. Cas. 202.

No appeal or writ of supersedeas is grantable in any case wherein the commonwealth is plaintiff upon a penal statute, which is considered in the nature of a criminal prosecution. Vide Temple's Case, 1 Va. Cas. 163; Com. v. Vawter, 1 Va. Cas. 127.

In Revenue Cases.—A writ of error lies, for the state, from the circuit court to a judgment of the county court, if the case be for the violation of a law relating to the revenue. State v. Kyle, 8 W. Va. 711.

A writ of error lies for the state, from the supreme court of appeals to a judgment of the circuit court, if the case be for the violation of a law relating to the revenue. State v. Allen, 8 W. Va. 680.

Since the adoption of the constitutional amendment of 1880 there is no doubt, that in revenue cases the state has equal right with the defendant to exceptions in the court below and review on writ of error. State v. Thompson, 26 W. Va. 149.

In a prosecution for selling ardent spirits by retail to be drunk at the place where sold, without having first obtained a license to keep an ordinary, a writ of error lies for the commonwealth from the judgment of an inferior court. Com. v. Scott, 10 Gratt. 749; Com. v. Coe, 9 Leigh 620.

On an indictment for a violation of the condition of a bond given by the applicant for a liquor license conditioned not to allow any person to drink to intoxication on the premises, etc., a writ of error lies on the part of the state, on the ground that is for a violation of the law relating to the revenue. State v. Church, 4 W. Va. 745.

The state has a right to a writ of error in an action by it on a bond given under § 22, ch. 32, Code 1891, to obtain license to sell liquors, if regarded as a criminal case, as it concerns the revenue. But in law it is a civil action, with right of appeal in the state. State v. Nutter, 44 W. Va. 385, 30 S. E. Rep. 67.

Constitutionality.—The statute, § 3, ch. 100, Code 1868, which authorizes a writ of error for the state to a judgment of the circuit court, from the supreme court of appeals, if the case be for the violation of a law relating to the revenue, is not repugnant to the constitution. State v. Fitzpatrick, 8 W. Va. 707; State v. Allen, 8 W. Va. 680; State v. Cooper, 26 W. Va. 338.

Section 3, art. 8, of the Constitution, does not limit the appellate power of the supreme court of appeals, in criminal cases, merely to cases where there has been a conviction of felony or misdemeanor. The legislature may confer on said court appellate power in cases of misdemeanor for violation of law relating to revenue where there has been no conviction. State v. Allen, 8 W. Va. 680.

On Petition for Proceeds of Sale of Forfeited Vessels.—Where vessels have been forfeited to the commonwealth for violation of the oyster laws and sold under order of court, and the proceeds remain, under the court's control and parties entitled to the proceeds petition therefor, the proceedings are civil not criminal and the commonwealth is entitled to an appeal from a judgment in favor of the petitioner under Code 1873, ch. 178, § 3, if the amount in controversy exceeds the jurisdictional sum. Com. v. Mister, 79 Va. 5.

E. JOINT APPEALS.—Different creditors, parties to a suit attacking a conveyance as fraudulent, may unite in an appeal from a decree holding it valid to their prejudice. Frank v. Zeigler, 46 W. Va. 614, 33 S. E. Rep. 761.

All parties against whom a decree is pronounced, interested in the main question decided, may unite in an appeal, though their interests are separate, or affected differently by the decree. Frank v. Zeigler, 46 W. Va. 614, 33 S. E. Rep. 761.

F. ESTOPPEL TO APPEAL.—The mere statement of an appellant to an appellee that he did not intend to or would not appeal, does not prevent an appeal, unless there was a consideration for the statement, or the appellee has acted on it to his prejudice. Southern R. Co. v. Glenn, 98 Va. 309, 36 S. E. Rep. 395.

Where a decree is entered for a less sum than the party claims, receiving payment of the sum so decreed is not a waiver of errors, nor does it estop him from appealing from the decree as to sums not allowed. Southern R. Co. v. Glenn, 98 Va. 309, 36 S. E. Rep. 395.

IV. TRANSFER OF CAUSE.

A. GENERALLY.—Writs of error or supersedeas and appeals, allowed by the court of appeals or a judge thereof in vacation, are prayed for by petition, in which the errors complained of are assigned or set forth; and process is issued and served upon the adverse party, and a hearing is had after appearance by counsel, or in case of default, without appellate pleadings unless of some extrinsic matter in bar. Reid v. Strider, 7 Gratt. 76.

The time and manner of proceeding in order to give the court of appeals cognizance of a cause, is as essential as the nature, or amount of the matter in controversy. Clarke v. Conn, 1 Munf. 160.

B. STAY OF PROCEEDINGS.—Under the statute, ch. 178, § 11, Code Va. 1873, the court or judge to whom the petition for appeal is presented may stay the proceedings "in part," as well as "in whole." Cralle v. Cralle, 81 Va. 773.

C. NOTICE OF APPEAL.—In Dunbar v. Dunbar, 5 W. Va. 567, the court intimated that, where the noting of the fact that an undertaking for an appeal has been filed with the clerk is resisted by the appellee, the object of such noting was accomplished, it being merely to give notice of the appeal to the opposite party.

Notice ought to be given of an intention to take up an appeal at the first term of the court of appeals in a chancery case. Lee v. Frame, 1 H. & M. 21.

Statute Not Retroactive.—Section 3457, Code 1887, requiring notice to be given of the intention to appeal, under penalty of dismissal of the appeal, has no application to appeals from decrees rendered prior to said act. Blanton v. Carroll, 86 Va. 539, 10 S. E. Rep. 329.

Merely Directory.—The provisions of § 3457 of the Code requiring a party intending to apply for a writ of error or appeal to give notice to the opposite party or his counsel of his intention to apply for a transcript of the record, and forbidding the clerk to make out and deliver such transcript until it appears that such notice has been given, which fact the clerk is required to certify with the record, are directory only, and a lack of the required certificate to that effect does not avoid the transcript, but it is a plain violation of official duty for the clerk to make out and deliver a transcript until it appears that notice has been given as required by law. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Dunnaway, 98 Va. 29, 34 S. E. Rep. 698; Mears v. Dexter, 86 Va. 828, 11 S. E. Rep. 538.

D. PETITION FOR APPEAL.—The petitioner for an appeal, supersedeas or writ of error should state distinctly in his petition what relief or assistance he desires, and as to what judgment, decree or order of the court he asks for an appeal, supersedeas or writ of error, as the case may be. The failure to do so must in the very nature of things not unfrequently lead to mistakes or serious difficulty and confusion in the granting of appeals, supersedeas or writs of error; and this case is a fair illustration of the fact. Beard v. Arbuckle, 13 W. Va. 732; Steenrod v. Railroad Co., 25 W. Va. 133.

When a petition for an appeal is presented to the court of appeals, it is examined by one of the members of the court, and, if he thinks the appeal should be granted, an order is made by the court granting such appeal, the other members of the court not examining the record. But if the judge, who examines the record, thinks that the appeal should not be granted, he hands the record to each of the other judges of the court in succession; and if any one of them is of opinion, that the appeal should be granted, an order of the court is made granting the appeal. If all the judges are of opinion, that the appeal asked ought not to be granted, an order is entered refusing to grant the appeal; and if each of the members of the court thinks, that the decree complained of is plainly right, the court may state in the order refusing to grant the appeal, that this refusal is because the order complained of is plainly right.

Whenever this is done, by section 11 of chapter 7 of Acts of 1872-3 and by section 11 of chapter 157 of Acts of 1882, the court of appeals is prohibited from ever entertaining a petition for an appeal therein afterwards. Moore v. Johnson, 24 W. Va. 549.

Assignment of Error.—A petition for an appeal is in the nature of a pleading, and should state clearly and distinctly all the errors relied on for a reversal of the decree. Otherwise the appeal, if granted, should be dismissed. But a motion to dismiss for this cause will not be granted after the lapse of more than three years when the right of appeal has become barred by limitation. Orr v. Pennington, 93 Va. 268, 24 S. E. Rep. 928.

Yet it is the well known practice for appellate courts not to confine themselves to the errors specified in the petition, but to reverse the decree complained of for any substantial error disclosed by the record, whether mentioned in the petition or not. Saunders v. Griggs, 81 Va. 506.

The following is not such an assignment of error as is required by § 3464, Va. Code: "Your petitioner avers that there was manifest error in dismissing said bill, and rendering said judgment for costs against your petitioner; and he therefore prays an appeal from the said decree and that a supersedeas be awarded." Orr v. Pennington, 93 Va. 268, 24 S. E. Rep. 928.

Grounds of Objection Must Be Stated.—The court of appeals will not consider assignments of error for which no grounds of objection are stated, either in the petition for the writ of error or in the brief of counsel. Atlantic & D. R. Co. v. Reiger, 95 Va. 418, 23 S. E. Rep. 590.

E. APPELLATE PROCESS.

1. WHEN OBTAINABLE.

From Courts of Law.—An appeal can be allowed from a judgment at law, only by the court pronouncing the judgment, and during the term of the court at which the judgment was pronounced. The same court, at a subsequent term, or the judge thereof, in vacation, cannot, under any circumstances, allow an appeal; nor can an appeal be allowed in such case, by an appellate court, or a judge thereof, under any circumstances. The judgment can be brought before an appellate court, only by a writ of error, or a supersedeas, awarded by the appellate court, or a judge thereof. Morris v. Deshazo, 4 Rand. 460.

Where the judge of a circuit court, in vacation, allowed a writ of error to a judgment of a county court; but the writ of error was dismissed at the next term of the circuit court as improvidently allowed, since the judge in vacation had no authority to allow it; then, a writ of error was prayed in term time, and denied, it was held the writ of error allowed by the judge in vacation was properly dismissed; but as the judgment of the county court was erroneous, it was error in the circuit court not to allow the writ prayed in term time. Amis v. Koger, 7 Leigh 221.

In Criminal Cases.—A writ of error cannot be granted by a judge, in vacation, to a defendant, against whom there has been a judgment in behalf of the commonwealth, for a misdemeanor. Jones v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 224.

From Courts of Chancery.—An appeal from a court of common law cannot be allowed, with condition to give bond and security, after the term at which the judgment was obtained; but a court of chancery has power to grant an appeal, if bond and security be given within a reasonable and limited time, in the next vacation after the term at which the decree was rendered. Morris v. Deshazo, 4 Rand. 460.

The chancellor may grant an appeal from his own decree during the term, with an allowance of time to the appellant to give security after the expiration of the term. Stealy v. Jackson, 1 Rand. 413.

Prior to the act of 1807, the court of appeals had power to grant appeals from, or writs of supersedeas to the decrees of the several superior courts of chancery, at any time within three years after the same were pronounced; and, since the said act, any judge of the court of appeals, out of court, has the same power. Tomlinson v. Dillard, 3 H. & M. 199.

The power of the superior courts of chancery to grant appeals from interlocutory decrees, in certain cases, is not limited to the terms at which such decrees were rendered; but may be exercised at any subsequent term. Wright v. Dawney, 3 H. & M. 259.

But the judges of the several superior courts of chancery cannot grant appeals from interlocutory decrees in vacation; but in court only. Fairfax v. Muse, 2 H. & M. 557; Goodwin v. Miller, 2 Munf. 43; Dawney v. Wright, 2 H. & M. 12.

In Criminal Cases.—A writ of error in a criminal cause may be awarded by the court of appeals during the term, returnable to a day in the same term; and the cause may be heard at the same term. Lazier's Case, 10 Gratt. 708.

A judge in vacation may not award a writ of error in a criminal case. Baker v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 353.

Allowance Must Be Entered on Record.—Where a judgment has been rendered in a court of law, and the record omits to state that an appeal was allowed, no evidence can be received at a subsequent term, that the appeal had been, in fact, allowed, but that the clerk had neglected to enter it on the record. Burch v. White, 3 Rand. 104.

2. SERVICE OF WRIT.—A writ of supersedeas, to a judgment obtained in the name of the governor, for the benefit of a relator, ought to be served on such relator, and not on the governor. Newell v. Wood, 1 Munf. 555.

A party to the record in the lower court can appear and defend in the higher court and should be served with process upon an appeal, writ of error or supersedeas, but he renders himself liable for costs and may recover costs, as in other cases. Leighton v. Maury, 76 Va. 865.

F. THE RECORD.

1. PRINTING OF THE RECORD.

Direction of Judge.—Where, under § 3459 of the Code, a question as to what parts of the record shall be copied, is referred to the judge by whom the appeal is allowed, and he directs a complete record to be made out in one case to serve as the record in several similar cases, but directs also that each case show the names of the parties litigant, amounts and dates and the record only contains the names in the other cases, the court cannot consider them, and the appeal must be dismissed as to them. Litchford v. Day, 87 Va. 71, 12 S. E. Rep. 107.

2. RECORD AT LAW.

a What Constitutes Ordinarily.—"The record is made up of the writ (for the purpose of amending by if necessary); the whole pleadings between the parties; papers of which profert is made or over demanded, and such as have been specially submitted to the consideration of the court by a bill of exceptions, a demurrer to evidence, or a special verdict, or are inseparably connected with some paper or evidence so referred to. These, with the several proceedings at the rules or in court, until the rendition of the judgment, constitute the record in common-law suits, and no others." Roanoke Land & Imp. Co. v. Karn, 80 Va. 589.

Where there is error in the declaration, pleadings, or judgment, committed against the protest or over the demurrer or other objection, of a party, the same may be reviewed and corrected in the court of appeals, although no motion has been made for a new trial in the court below, and no exception was reserved by bills of exceptions or otherwise. Spence v. Robinson, 35 W. Va. 313, 13 S. E. Rep. 1004.

Nothing else that transpired during the trial in the court below will be considered a part of the record in the appellate court, unless made so by a bill of exceptions or order of the court; and the mere statement on the record that certain pleas were rejected and that parties excepted to various rulings of the court, is not sufficient. Lawrence's Case, 86 Va. 573, 10 S. E. Rep. 840. See monographic note on "Bills of Exception" appended to Stoneman v. Com., 25 Gratt. 887.

The case must be heard and considered in the court of appeals upon the errors apparent upon the face of the record. If no exceptions are taken to any supposed errors of the court which tries the case, these acts are not in the record, and cannot appear in the transcript thereof, and the party aggrieved remains as at common law, without relief. Johnson v. Norton Land & Imp. Co., 90 Va. 267, 18 S. E. Rep. 36.

In Caveat Cases.—In a case of caveat all the facts agreed by the parties, or found by the jury, or, if a jury is dispensed with, ascertained by the court, necessarily become and should be made a part of the record of the cause. Hamilton v. McNeil, 13 Gratt. 389.

Execution.—An execution of the same court used as evidence upon the trial of a cause, will be regarded by the court of appeals as part of the record without a certiorari. Preston v. Auditor, 1 Call 471.

Upon a motion to dissolve an injunction awarded on a bill filed to enjoin the sale of personal property under executions levied thereon, the court of necessity must consider the executions, and, where, upon the evidence, it appears that they were considered, they are properly copied into the record of the cause. Ford v. Watts, 95 Va. 192, 28 S. E. Rep. 179.

Writ and Inquisition.—Upon a motion to quash a writ and inquisition founded on a judgment at law, which motion is sustained, the writ and inquisition are a part of the record, although no bill of exceptions is taken; and they will be so treated by an appellate court. Wallop v. Scarbrugh, 5 Gratt. 1.

Affidavit and Order of Attachment.—Wherever the validity of an attachment is involved, or the jurisdiction questioned, the affidavit and order of attachment are parts of the record, though not mentioned in declaration or bill. Miller v. White, 46 W. Va. 67, 33 S. E. Rep. 832.

Forthcoming Bonds and Declarations of Assurance.—In a motion on a forthcoming bond, the bond is a part of the record without being spread upon it by bill of exceptions, and the bond certified by the clerk is taken to be that on which judgment was given, so the declaration, filed in a motion by the Mutual Assurance Society, and referred to in the motion which is spread on the record, is a part of the record. Skipwith v. Mut. Ass'n Soc., 10 Leigh 502.

Venire Facias.—If there is an error on the face of the writ of venire facias, and the prisoner moves to quash it, though he does not specify the error, it may be taken advantage of in the appellate court. Wash v. Com., 16 Gratt. 530.

Warrants.—A superior court has a right to look into the warrant summoning the magistrates of the examining court, which is part of the record; but not into the warrant of commitment, which is not a part of the record. Com. v. John M'Caul, 1 Va. Cas. 271.

Caption of indictment.—The caption of an indictment is a part of the record, though no part of the indictment, and may be looked to in order to ascertain whether the inferior court had jurisdiction. Robinson v. Com., 88 Va. 900, 14 S. E. Rep. 627.

Notice of Motion.—Notice of a motion must be made a part of the record by bill of exceptions. Beale v. Wilson, 4 Munf. 380.

Affidavit in Support of Motion.—An affidavit filed in support of a motion for a continuance which was overruled, is not a part of the record, unless it be made so by a bill of exceptions. Garland v. Bugg, 1 H. & M. 374.

Pleadings—Rejection.—If a rejected plea is by order of the court made a part of the record, and the order book shows that its rejection was excepted to, the supreme court of appeals will review the action of the court in rejecting such plea, though no formal bill of exceptions was taken to the rejection of such plea. Sweeney v. Baker, 13 W. Va. 158.

Allowance.—A party may take advantage in the appellate court of an error committed by the trial court in permitting a plea to be filed where the record shows that such party objected to the filing of such plea in the trial court, and he need not in such case take a bill of exceptions or except to the action of the court overruling his objection. Bank v. Kimberlands, 16 W. Va. 557; Perry v. Horn, 22 W. Va. 381.

This rule is equally applicable to the filing of a replication. Bank v. Showacre, 26 W. Va. 50.

Evidence.—To make available in the appellate court an objection taken during the trial to the admission of evidence, the point must be made, and properly saved by some bill of exception. It is not enough merely to note the objection and exception in the certificate of evidence. State v. Harr, 38 W.

Va. 58, 17 S. E. Rep. 794; Poling v. Ohio River R. Co., 38 W. Va. 645, 18 S. E. Rep. 782.

Instructions.—An instruction to be reviewed in the appellate court, must be made a part of the record by bill of exceptions. Ferguson v. Wills, 88 Va. 136, 13 S. E. Rep. 392.

Error based on the giving or refusal of instructions ought to be shown by bill of exceptions giving the instructions and enough of the evidence to show whether they were proper; but where the record otherwise identifies the instruction, and shows an exception, and the whole evidence appears, that will suffice, without such bill of exceptions. Hughes v. Frum, 41 W. Va. 445, 23 S. E. Rep. 804.

Dissatisfaction of Court with Verdict.—If the court, before which the issues are tried, is dissatisfied with the verdict, this dissatisfaction must be certified on the record by the court; or if refused, it should be put on the record by a bill of exceptions; it is not to be supplied by affidavit, especially of counsel in the cause. Stannard v. Graves, 2 Call 369.

Entries in Private Memorandum Book of Retired Judge or Clerk.—Entries in the private memorandum book of a judge no longer in office and entries on the docket of a clerk no longer in office are not parts of the record. Ruffner v. Hill, 21 W. Va. 152.

b. Certificate of Clerk.—Nothing, not made part of the record by bill of exceptions or by order of the court, can be regarded as such by the appellate court. The clerk cannot add to or detract from the record and his certificate that a deposition or other paper copied by him was evidence whereon the judgment was founded, does not make them part of the record. Roanoke Land & Imp. Co. v. Karn & Hickson, 80 Va. 589; Watson v. Com., 85 Va. 867, 9 S. E. Rep. 418.

As the clerk can add nothing to the record, agreed facts copied by him into the record and certified as the facts, whereon the judgment rested, cannot be considered in the court of appeals and the case cannot be reviewed in the absence of a bill of exceptions to the supposed errors of the trial court. Johnson v. Norton Land & Imp. Co., 90 Va. 267, 18 S. E. Rep. 36.

c. Order of Court.—Where the order of the lower court sets out that a bond was executed in conformity with a former order and acknowledged and certified, such bond is a part of the record. Beery v. Homan, 8 Gratt. 48.

Aliter when the bond is not mentioned in the order of court. Justices v. Williamson, 12 Leigh 93.

d. Papers Merely Copied into the Record.—Papers inserted in the record by the clerk, cannot be considered as part of the record, unless they are made so by the party wishing to avail himself of them. Cunningham v. Mitchell, 4 Rand. 189.

Facts copied into the transcript by the clerk but not made a part of the record by bill of exceptions or otherwise, are not a part of the record. Wright v. Wood, 88 Va. 1037, 14 S. E. Rep. 914.

Bill of Exceptions.—Unless that which purports to be a bill of exceptions and copied into the record as such, is, by some order or memorandum of the trial court entered on the order book, made a part of the record, the court of appeals cannot regard it or treat it as a part of the record in the case, but will wholly disregard it. Bank v. Showacre, 26 W. Va. 53; Pegram v. Stortz, 31 W. Va. 220, 6 S. E. Rep. 485; Winters v. Null, 31 W. Va. 450, 7 S. E. Rep. 443.

Where a bill of exceptions or any document in the record on appeal is not a part thereof, the fact may be shown in the supreme court. Wells v. Smith, 49 W. Va. 78, 38 S. E. Rep. 547.

Deposition.—Nor is a deposition a part of the record in the absence of a bill of exceptions, though copied in the transcript and certified by the trial court and clerk. Johnson v. Norton Land & Imp. Co., 90 Va. 267, 18 S. E. Rep. 36.

The fact that depositions taken prior to the decision of the court to be read at the trial are found among the papers of the cause and copied into the record by the clerk, is not sufficient to authorize the court of appeals to consider such depositions as having been given in evidence before the court below at the hearing of the case, where they are not certified and made a part of the record by bill of exceptions or otherwise. Ramsburg v. Erb, 16 W. Va. 777.

Instructions.—Instructions copied into the record, when there is no bill of exceptions or order of the court referring to them, will not be regarded as any part of the record. Winters v. Null, 31 W. Va. 450, 7 S. E. Rep. 443; Trump v. Coal Co., 46 W. Va. 238, 32 S. E. Rep. 1035.

Certificate of Overruling of Demurrer.—Where there is copied by the clerk in the record a certificate, signed by the judge, stating, that a demurrer to a declaration had been filed and overruled by the court, but that the clerk had not entered the filing of the demurrer on the record, this memorandum is no part of the record. Sweeney v. Baker, 13 W. Va. 158.

Amended Declaration.—Where an amended declaration, in an action of ejectment, whereby a new party plaintiff is introduced, is copied into the record by the clerk, but no order of the court had been entered permitting it to be filed, nor any order in any manner recognizing it as filed, such amended declaration is no part of the record, though it was placed among the papers of the case in the court below, and indorsed by the clerk as filed on a particular day. Williams v. Ewart, 29 W. Va. 659, 2 S. E. Rep. 881.

3. RECORD IN CHANCERY.

Generally.—Papers upon which a cause was not heard in the trial court constitute no part of the record of the cause, and cannot be considered in the appellate court. Florance v. Morien, 98 Va. 26, 34 S. E. Rep. 890.

Reference in Decree Sufficient.—Where a plea or answer is referred to in a decree or order in chancery as having come under the cognizance of the court, either for the purpose of filing or rejecting it, it thereby becomes a part of the record, and no further action, by way of exception or otherwise, is necessary upon the part of the defendant to enable him to prosecute an appeal upon the rejection of his plea or answer. Barrett v. McAllister, 35 W. Va. 103, 12 S. E. Rep. 1106.

Although an answer was not regularly filed yet if the final decree recite it as one of the papers upon which the cause was heard, it is a part of the record. Rosset v. Greer, 3 W. Va. 1.

If the caption of the decree names, as defendants to the cause, certain persons whose answers are filed, and the decree states that the cause was heard upon the bill, answers and exhibits, it may be inferred that the answers of those persons were noticed by the court. Pickett v. Chilton, 5 Munf. 467.

The clerk's stating in the transcript of the record that certain answers, which are filed, and copied in such transcript, were not noticed by the court, is

F. THE RECORD.

1. PRINTING OF THE RECORD.

Direction of Judge.—Where, under § 3459 of the Code, a question as to what parts of the record shall be copied, is referred to the judge by whom the appeal is allowed, and he directs a complete record to be made out in one case to serve as the record in several similar cases, but directs also that each case show the names of the parties litigant, amounts and dates and the record only contains the names in the other cases, the court cannot consider them, and the appeal must be dismissed as to them. Litchford v. Day, 87 Va. 71, 12 S. E. Rep. 107.

2. RECORD AT LAW.

a What Constitutes Ordinarily.—"The record is made up of the writ (for the purpose of amending by if necessary): the whole pleadings between the parties: papers of which profert is made or oyer demanded, and such as have been specially submitted to the consideration of the court by a bill of exceptions, a demurrer to evidence, or a special verdict, or are inseparably connected with some paper or evidence so referred to. These, with the several proceedings at the rules or in court, until the rendition of the judgment, constitute the record in common-law suits, and no others." Roanoke Land & Imp. Co. v. Karn, 80 Va. 589.

Where there is error in the declaration, pleadings, or judgment, committed against the protest or over the demurrer or other objection, of a party, the same may be reviewed and corrected in the court of appeals, although no motion has been made for a new trial in the court below, and no exception was reserved by bills of exceptions or otherwise. Spence v. Robinson, 85 W. Va. 318, 13 S. E. Rep. 1004.

Nothing else that transpired during the trial in the court below will be considered a part of the record in the appellate court, unless made so by a bill of exceptions or order of the court; and the mere statement on the record that certain pleas were rejected and that parties excepted to various rulings of the court, is not sufficient. Lawrence's Case, 86 Va. 573, 10 S. E. Rep. 840. See monographic note on "Bills of Exception" appended to Stoneman v. Com., 25 Gratt. 887.

The case must be heard and considered in the court of appeals upon the errors apparent upon the face of the record. If no exceptions are taken to any supposed errors of the court which tries the case, these acts are not in the record, and cannot appear in the transcript thereof, and the party aggrieved remains as at common law, without relief. Johnson v. Norton Land & Imp. Co., 90 Va. 267, 18 S. E. Rep. 86.

In Caveat Cases.—In a case of caveat all the facts agreed by the parties, or found by the jury, or, if a jury is dispensed with, ascertained by the court, necessarily become and should be made a part of the record of the cause. Hamilton v. McNeil, 13 Gratt. 389.

Execution.—An execution of the same court used as evidence upon the trial of a cause, will be regarded by the court of appeals as part of the record without a certiorari. Preston v. Auditor, 1 Call 471.

Upon a motion to dissolve an injunction awarded on a bill filed to enjoin the sale of personal property under executions levied thereon, the court of necessity must consider the executions, and, where, upon the evidence, it appears that they were considered, they are properly copied into the record of the cause. Ford v. Watts, 95 Va. 192, 28 S. E. Rep. 179.

Writ and Inquisition.—Upon a motion to quash a writ and inquisition founded on a judgment at law, which motion is sustained, the writ and inquisition are a part of the record, although no bill of exceptions is taken; and they will be so treated by an appellate court. Wallop v. Scarbrugh, 5 Gratt. 1.

Affidavit and Order of Attachment.—Wherever the validity of an attachment is involved, or the jurisdiction questioned, the affidavit and order of attachment are parts of the record, though not mentioned in declaration or bill. Miller v. White, 46 W. Va. 67, 33 S. E. Rep. 332.

Forthcoming Bonds and Declarations of Assurance.—In a motion on a forthcoming bond, the bond is a part of the record without being spread upon it by bill of exceptions, and the bond certified by the clerk is taken to be that on which judgment was given, so the declaration, filed in a motion by the Mutual Assurance Society, and referred to in the motion which is spread on the record, is a part of the record. Skipwith v. Mut. Ass'n Soc., 10 Leigh 502.

Venire Facias.—If there is an error on the face of the writ of venire facias, and the prisoner moves to quash it, though he does not specify the error, it may be taken advantage of in the appellate court. Wash v. Com., 16 Gratt. 530.

Warrants.—A superior court has a right to look into the warrant summoning the magistrates of the examining court, which is part of the record; but not into the warrant of commitment, which is not a part of the record. Com. v. John M'Caul, 1 Va. Cas. 271.

Caption of Indictment.—The caption of an indictment is a part of the record, though no part of the indictment, and may be looked to in order to ascertain whether the inferior court had jurisdiction. Robinson v. Com., 88 Va. 900, 14 S. E. Rep. 627.

Notice of Motion.—Notice of a motion must be made a part of the record by bill of exceptions. Beale v. Wilson, 4 Munf. 380.

Affidavit in Support of Motion.—An affidavit filed in support of a motion for a continuance which was overruled, is not a part of the record, unless it be made so by a bill of exceptions. Garland v. Bugg, 1 H. & M. 374.

Pleadings—Rejection.—If a rejected plea is by order of the court made a part of the record, and the order book shows that its rejection was excepted to, the supreme court of appeals will review the action of the court in rejecting such plea, though no formal bill of exceptions was taken to the rejection of such plea. Sweeney v. Baker, 13 W. Va. 158.

Allowance.—A party may take advantage in the appellate court of an error committed by the trial court in permitting a plea to be filed where the record shows that such party objected to the filing of such plea in the trial court, and he need not in such case take a bill of exceptions or except to the action of the court overruling his objection. Bank v. Kimberlands, 16 W. Va. 557; Perry v. Horn, 22 W. Va. 381.

This rule is equally applicable to the filing of a replication. Bank v. Showacre, 26 W. Va. 50.

Evidence.—To make available in the appellate court an objection taken during the trial to the admission of evidence, the point must be made, and properly saved by some bill of exception. It is not enough merely to note the objection and exception in the certificate of evidence. State v. Harr, 38 W.

Va. 58, 17 S. E. Rep. 794; Poling v. Ohio River R. Co., 38 W. Va. 645, 18 S. E. Rep. 782.

Instructions.—An instruction to be reviewed in the appellate court, must be made a part of the record by bill of exceptions. Ferguson v. Wills, 88 Va. 136, 13 S. E. Rep. 392.

Error based on the giving or refusal of instructions ought to be shown by bill of exceptions giving the instructions and enough of the evidence to show whether they were proper; but where the record otherwise identifies the instruction, and shows an exception, and the whole evidence appears, that will suffice, without such bill of exceptions. Hughes v. Frum, 41 W. Va. 445, 23 S. E. Rep. 604.

Dissatisfaction of Court with Verdict.—If the court, before which the issues are tried, is dissatisfied with the verdict, this dissatisfaction must be certified on the record by the court; or if refused, it should be put on the record by a bill of exceptions; it is not to be supplied by affidavit, especially of counsel in the cause. Stannard v. Graves, 2 Call 309.

Entries in Private Memorandum Book of Retired Judge or Clerk.—Entries in the private memorandum book of a judge no longer in office and entries on the docket of a clerk no longer in office are not parts of the record. Ruffner v. Hill, 21 W. Va. 152.

b. Certificate of Clerk.—Nothing, not made part of the record by bill of exceptions or by order of the court, can be regarded as such by the appellate court. The clerk cannot add to or detract from the record and his certificate that a deposition or other paper copied by him was evidence whereon the judgment was founded, does not make them part of the record. Roanoke Land & Imp. Co. v. Karn & Hickson, 80 Va. 589; Watson v. Com., 85 Va. 667, 9 S. E. Rep. 418.

As the clerk can add nothing to the record, agreed facts copied by him into the record and certified as the facts, whereon the judgment rested, cannot be considered in the court of appeals and the case cannot be reviewed in the absence of a bill of exceptions to the supposed errors of the trial court. Johnson v. Norton Land & Imp. Co., 90 Va. 267, 18 S. E. Rep. 36.

c. Order of Court.—Where the order of the lower court sets out that a bond was executed in conformity with a former order and acknowledged and certified, such bond is a part of the record. Beery v. Homan, 8 Gratt. 48.

Aliter when the bond is not mentioned in the order of court. Justices v. Williamson, 12 Leigh 93.

d. Papers Merely Copied into the Record.—Papers inserted in the record by the clerk, cannot be considered as part of the record, unless they are made so by the party wishing to avail himself of them. Cunningham v. Mitchell, 4 Rand. 189.

Facts copied into the transcript by the clerk but not made a part of the record by bill of exceptions or otherwise, are not a part of the record. Wright v. Wood, 88 Va. 1037, 14 S. E. Rep. 914.

Bill of Exceptions.—Unless that which purports to be a bill of exceptions and copied into the record as such, is, by some order or memorandum of the trial court entered on the order book, made a part of the record, the court of appeals cannot regard it or treat it as a part of the record in the case, but will wholly disregard it. Bank v. Showacre, 26 W. Va. 53; Pegram v. Stortz, 31 W. Va. 220, 6 S. E. Rep. 485; Winters v. Null, 31 W. Va. 450, 7 S. E. Rep. 443.

Where a bill of exceptions or any document in the record on appeal is not a part thereof, the fact may be shown in the supreme court. Wells v. Smith, 49 W. Va. 78, 38 S. E. Rep. 547.

Deposition.—Nor is a deposition a part of the record in the absence of a bill of exceptions, though copied in the transcript and certified by the trial court and clerk. Johnson v. Norton Land & Imp. Co., 90 Va. 267, 18 S. E. Rep. 36.

The fact that depositions taken prior to the decision of the court to be read at the trial are found among the papers of the cause and copied into the record by the clerk, is not sufficient to authorize the court of appeals to consider such depositions as having been given in evidence before the court below at the hearing of the case, where they are not certified and made a part of the record by bill of exceptions or otherwise. Ramsburg v. Erb, 16 W. Va. 777.

Instructions.—Instructions copied into the record, when there is no bill of exceptions or order of the court referring to them, will not be regarded as any part of the record. Winters v. Null, 31 W. Va. 450, 7 S. E. Rep. 443; Trump v. Coal Co., 46 W. Va. 238, 32 S. E. Rep. 1035.

Certificate of Overruling of Demurrer.—Where there is copied by the clerk in the record a certificate, signed by the judge, stating, that a demurrer to a declaration had been filed and overruled by the court, but that the clerk had not entered the filing of the demurrer on the record, this memorandum is no part of the record. Sweeney v. Baker, 13 W. Va. 158.

Amended Declaration.—Where an amended declaration, in an action of ejectment, whereby a new party plaintiff is introduced, is copied into the record by the clerk, but no order of the court had been entered permitting it to be filed, nor any order in any manner recognizing it as filed, such amended declaration is no part of the record, though it was placed among the papers of the case in the court below, and indorsed by the clerk as filed on a particular day. Williams v. Ewart, 29 W. Va. 659, 2 S. E. Rep. 881.

3. RECORD IN CHANCERY.

Generally.—Papers upon which a cause was not heard in the trial court constitute no part of the record of the cause, and cannot be considered in the appellate court. Florance v. Morien, 98 Va. 26, 34 S. E. Rep. 890.

Reference in Decree Sufficient.—Where a plea or answer is referred to in a decree or order in chancery as having come under the cognizance of the court, either for the purpose of filing or rejecting it, it thereby becomes a part of the record, and no further action, by way of exception or otherwise, is necessary upon the part of the defendant to enable him to prosecute an appeal upon the rejection of his plea or answer. Barrett v. McAllister, 35 W. Va. 103, 12 S. E. Rep. 1106.

Although an answer was not regularly filed yet if the final decree recite it as one of the papers upon which the cause was heard, it is a part of the record. Rosset v. Greer, 3 W. Va. 1.

If the caption of the decree names, as defendants to the cause, certain persons whose answers are filed, and the decree states that the cause was heard upon the bill, answers and exhibits, it may be inferred that the answers of those persons were noticed by the court. Pickett v. Chilton, 5 Munf. 467.

The clerk's stating in the transcript of the record that certain answers, which are filed, and copied in such transcript, were not noticed by the court, is the omission is caused by the failure or neglect of the appellant to accompany his petition for an appeal with a transcript sufficiently full to show affirmatively the facts which present the grounds of error on which he relies in his petition. Fisher v. McNulty, 30 W. Va. 186, 3 S. E. Rep. 593; Hinchman v. Morris, 29 W. Va. 678, 2 S. E. Rep. 868.

V. EFFECT OF APPEAL.

A. LAW GOVERNING.—The effect of an appeal is governed by the law of the state where the appeal is allowed. Evans v. Taylor, 28 W. Va. 184.

B. TECHNICAL APPEAL.—Where an undertaking for appeal has been duly filed with the clerk of the circuit court, in accordance with § 1, ch. 135, Code W. Va., and notice given to the appellee, the appeal is pending in the appellate court, and all further proceedings in the circuit court are stayed, and that whether the decree or order was legally appealable or not, as the circuit court had no jurisdiction to determine that question. Dunbar v. Dunbar, 5 W. Va. 567.

Until the appeal bond is given, the appellee may proceed to enforce the judgment or decree of the court below. Williamson v. Gayle, 4 Gratt. 180.

Errors for the want of necessary parties cannot be corrected in the lower court by an amended and supplemental bill and bill in the nature of a bill of review, after an appeal is allowed and while it is pending in the appellate court. Almond v. Rothgeb, 1 Va. Dec. 138.

Although, perhaps, an appeal in a chancery cause does not here, any more than in England, stop the proceedings under the decree from which the appeal is taken, yet there can be no manner of doubt but that the effect of an appeal, when fully perfected by the execution of the proper supersedeas bond, is to deprive the subordinate court of all power over the parties and subject-matter of controversy, until the cause is remanded back for its further action; and the only orders, therefore, which that court can rightfully make are such as are needful for the preservation of the res and rights of the parties pending the appeal. Cralle v. Cralle, 81 Va. 773; Crawford v. Flickey, 41 W. Va. 544, 23 S. E. Rep. 662.

Commissioners proceeding to execute a decree after an appeal to the court of appeals has been taken, and the process has been served upon them, are guilty of a contempt of the appellate court; and their acts are null and void as to the rights of the parties to the appeal. M'Laughlin v. Janney, 6 Gratt. 609.

Where, after appeal allowed, commissioners sell lands decreed to be sold (sale never confirmed—decree afterwards annulled), and the so-called purchasers take possession, appropriate the profits, and claim to be treated as receivers and allowed the commissions paid in cash and compensation for expenses and services in managing the lands. Held, they are mere intruders, with no claim to compensation in any way, but are accountable for a fair rental. Strayer v. Long, 83 Va. 715, 3 S. E. Rep. 372.

Where appellees take possession of property belonging to the appellant's intestate, pending the suit, the appellate court will compel them to give bond in a penalty of twice the value of the property, with sufficient security, conditioned to indemnify the appellant and have the property forthcoming, or to deliver it to the appellant. Wright v. Wright, 4 H. & M. 452.

The court of appeals will not award an attachment against a sheriff for proceeding to carry into effect an execution under a decree, from which an appeal has been granted by the judge who pronounced it, although he had notice of the appeal. If such proceeding took place before the record was brought up. Cheshire v. Atkinson, 1 H. & M. 209.

May Make Orders for Preservation of Property.—After a decree for the sale of real estate to satisfy creditors having liens thereon, and an appeal from that decree by the debtor, the court below in which the suit was pending, may appoint a receiver to take possession of the property and rent it out, and collect the rents, until the further order of the court, etc. Moran v. Johnston, 26 Gratt. 108; Bristow v. Home Bldg. Co., 91 Va. 18, 80, 20 S. E. Rep. 946, 947. Or may simply order them to be rented out. Edmunds v. Scott, 78 Va. 720, 730.

A fortiori is this true where the appeal is from an interlocutory decree, and hence, the cause has not been removed from the docket of the lower court. In such case, not even a formal petition praying the restoration of the cause to the docket is necessary. Adkins v. Edwards, 83 Va. 316, 2 S. E. Rep. 439.

But the lower court has no authority to make a decree allowing temporary maintenances and counsel fees. Cralle v. Cralle, 81 Va. 773.

Lower Court Cannot Dismiss Appeal.—Where security for an appeal is given within the required time, after the lapse of the period allowed for an appeal, the case is in the appellate court and the lower court has no longer any control over it and cannot disallow the appeal because the appellant does not give other security, the appellate court is the judge of the sufficiency of the security in that case. Anderson v. Anderson, 2 Call 198.

On a Dissolved Injunction.—A dissolved injunction is revived by an appeal taken by the plaintiff in the court of chancery; and it is improper in the appellee to take out an execution, so long as the appeal is pending. Turner v. Scott, 5 Rand. 332.

On Contempt Proceedings.—Where a receiver has been appointed by the court of appeals and the circuit judge has declined to enforce the order, and the court of appeals has issued a mandamus to compel its enforcement, and "contempt proceedings" have been instituted against said circuit judge, held, an appeal from the order appointing such receiver stays all proceedings under such order, and said mandamus and "contempt proceedings" should be dismissed. Va., etc., Co. v. Wilder, 88 Va. 942, 14 S. E. Rep. 806.

On Supersedeas in Same Cause.—Where the judgment of a county court has been twice reversed by the superior court, and the first judgment of reversal has been acquiesced in till after the second judgment of the superior court reversing the second judgment of the county, and an appeal has been taken from such second judgment, a supersedeas taken then from the first judgment of the superior court will be quashed, since it is necessary to bring up the whole proceedings and the appeal does that. Jones v. Raine, 4 Rand. 386.

Estoppel.—The court is of opinion that, although an appeal once allowed cannot be regularly dismissed from the appellate court, but in the mode prescribed by the statute, yet that the party obtaining it may, by his express consent, or by acts indicating such consent, estop himself from objecting the pendency thereof, and may by such acts, or consent, with the concurrence of the adverse party, restore the jurisdiction of the court below. Fairfax v. Muse, 4 Munf. 129; Williamson v. Gayle, 4 Gratt. 180. Where it appears, that the appellant moved in the court below to amend an order, for the sale of land, by adding two other commissioners to those therein named, that he never prosecuted his appeal taken from the order aforesaid, even up to the present time, and stood by and permitted the sale to take place without objection, and even encouraged others to purchase, by bidding for the land himself; these and other acts, which equally tended to lull the vigilance of the appellee, and prevent him from dismissing the said appeal for want of prosecution, and manifested a dereliction of that appeal on the part of the appellant, ought in equity to estop and preclude him from relying on the pendency thereof. Fairfax v. Muse, 4 Munf. 129.

C. WRIT OF ERROR.

In Civil Cases.—A writ of error is so far a supersedeas to the judgment that an execution cannot regularly be issued on it and if issued, will be quashed, but an action of debt may nevertheless be brought upon it and unless for some cause deemed adequate by the court, the proceedings be suspended, the plaintiff will be entitled to his judgment. On the judgment so obtained an execution will not generally be permitted until the writ of error is determined but the rule is not uniform, but depends upon circumstances. Newcomb v. Drummond, 4 Leigh 57.

Where Record Is Destroyed.—In Newcomb v. Drummond, 4 Leigh 57, an appeal was taken from a judgment but before the appeal was or could be prosecuted the office of the clerk of the court and with it the record of the judgment were destroyed by fire, and therefore the appeal was never prosecuted. An action of debt being brought on the judgment, the record of which was so destroyed, it was held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover notwithstanding the appeal and the circumstances that prevented the prosecution thereof.

Writ of Error of Foreign Court.—Where an action is brought in Virginia on a judgment of a Texas court while a writ of error to such judgment is pending in the higher court of Texas, the same effect will be given to such writ of error as is given to it in Texas, but in the absence of proof to the contrary the law of Texas will be presumed to be the same as that of Virginia, i. e. the bond being only given for costs the writ of error has not the effect of a supersedeas, but the court may order that no execution issue, provided defendant give bond and security in a penalty at least double the amount of the judgment, with condition to perform the judgment and also to pay all damages, costs and fees which might be awarded against or incurred by the defendant, in case the writ of error thus pending in the supreme court of Texas should be determined against him. Ins. Co. v. Ray, 75 Va. 821.

In Criminal Cases.—A writ of error in a criminal case, does not of itself have the effect of a supersedeas; in each case, the court will direct by an endorsement that it shall have that effect, if it is proper. Conner v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 30; State v. Conners, 20 W. Va. 1, 10.

In West Virginia, a writ of error to a judgment in a criminal case operates as a stay of proceedings in the case until the decision of the supreme court of appeals, when the writ issues from that court. Acts 1872-3, ch. 174, § 6; Acts 1882, ch. 128, § 2.

The court saying: "The writ of error does not in fact supersede the judgment of conviction in a felony case, but under our law only operates a stay of proceedings in the case, after the writ issues, etc., until the decision of the supreme court of appeals. Therefore if a judgment of conviction of a felony, be rendered by a circuit court upon the verdict of a jury finding the prisoner guilty of a felony and fixing his term of imprisonment in the penitentiary be not executed before the writ of error issues, the prisoner is not taken to the penitentiary by the sheriff or other officer, until after the judgment of conviction is affirmed by the supreme court of appeals, etc. If the judgment of conviction is reversed, and a new trial is awarded, then ordinarily the prisoner is again tried for the offence, of which he is indicted, though in some cases for legal cause he is acquitted and discharged of the offence after reversal of the judgment without another trial. But if the prisoner has been delivered in the penitentiary, before the writ of error issues, etc., he remains there to abide the decision and action of the supreme court of appeals upon the writ of error in the case." State v. Conners, 20 W. Va. 1.

D. SUPERSEDEAS.

When It Is the Only Process.—Where supersedeas is the only process, it will merely remove the record to the appellate court for review, if the judgment is executed; if not executed, it will also stay the proceedings. White v. Jones, 1 Wash. 116.

When Merely Auxiliary.—When merely auxiliary, a supersedeas can have no effect after the decree or judgment is carried into execution, since it can only stay the proceedings in the state in which they are; yet the suit goes on in the superior court by the other process; and if the judgment be reversed a writ of restitution issues to restore the party to that of which he has been dispossessed by the execution. Morriss v. Garland, 78 Va. 215, 229; White v. Jones, 1 Wash. 116.

A supersedeas to a decree for the payment of money does not vacate, or annul conditionally, the decree, but only stays further proceedings thereon, and leaves matters in the condition in which they were when the supersedeas took effect, until the appellate court can hear the case and pass upon the questions involved in the appeal. Martin v. South Salem Land Co., 94 Va. 28, 26 S. E. Rep. 591.

So that where execution on a judgment is suspended in order to give time to obtain a supersedeas, but no supersedeas is allowed during the period of suspension and after its expiration an execution is sued out, and possession of the property delivered, no writ of restitution can be granted until the cause is decided. Kreglo v. Fulk, 8 W. Va. 74.

On Cause Remanded for a New Trial.—A writ of supersedeas to the judgment of the superior court reversing the judgment of the county court and sending the case back for a new trial, if obtained before the second trial in the county court will stop proceedings there, until the decision in the court of appeals upon the supersedeas. Jones v. Raine, 4 Rand. 386.

On Forthcoming Bond.—If a supersedeas to a judgment, execution being levied, and a forthcoming bond taken, be issued before the day of sale, and thereupon the property be not forthcoming, the penalty of the bond is saved, and no motion lies upon it. Rucker v. Harrison, 6 Munf. 181.

In Spencer v. Pilcher, 8 Leigh 565, the court said that a supersedeas to the original judgment was no bar to an action on a forfeited forthcoming bond, but in that case it was held that there was no sufficient foundation for the objection, as the supersupersedeas bond alone was given in evidence and not the writ.

The original judgment and the judgment on a forthcoming bond constitute one proceeding, so far as granting a supersedeas is concerned; and if the judgment on the forthcoming bond has been rendered before the supersedeas is issued and the error exists in the forthcoming bond, the petition ought to pray a supersedeas to both judgments and they should both be embraced in the supersedeas. Laidley v. Bright, 17 W. Va. 779, 788; McCormick v. Bailey, 17 W. Va. 585. A second supersedeas to the judgment on the forthcoming bond is unnecessary. Monroe v. Webb, 4 Munf. 78.

The effect of the supersedeas to the original judgment may even be extended to a judgment subsequently obtained on the forthcoming bond. Bell v. Bugg, 4 Munf. 260; Laidley v. Bright, 17 W. Va. 779, 788.

On Judgment on Delivery Bond.—A supersedeas to the original judgment will supersede a judgment on a delivery bond. State v. Blair, 29 W. Va. 474, 2 S. E. Rep. 333.

On Powers of Receiver Already Appointed.—Where a receiver has been appointed, a supersedeas does not interfere with his powers. Bristow v. Home Bldg. Co., 91 Va. 18, 28, 20 S. E. Rep. 946, 947.

VI. REVIEW OF CAUSE IN APPELLATE COURT.

A. LAW APPLICABLE.—Writs of error in the court of appeals must be disposed of in accordance with the law as it existed at the time of the rendition of the judgment complained of. If, as the law then stood, there is no error in the judgment, it must be affirmed, but, if erroneous, it must be reversed, and such judgment entered as the lower court ought to have entered. Anderson v. Hygeia Hotel Co., 92 Va. 667, 24 S. E. Rep. 269; Feamster v. Withrow, 9 W. Va. 296, 315; Life Ins. Co. v. Rutherford, 2 Va. Dec. 707.

Subsequent acts of assembly cannot be considered. Wilson v. Hundley, 96 Va. 96, 30 S. E. Rep. 492.

B. RULE OF STARE DECISIS.—Adjudged cases can only be safely relied on as precedents, as to points actually in issue between the parties, and not as to such as may be deemed extrajudicial; unless indeed in relation to the latter they shall have ripened into law by various and successive decisions. Lewis v. Thornton, 6 Munf. 87.

Where the principles of a decree of the court of appeals seem to be opposed to its letter, the literal interpretation ought not to be relied on as a binding precedent. Lewis v. Thornton, 6 Munf. 87.

C. COURT EQUALLY DIVIDED.—Where the court of appeals is equally divided, the decision of the lower court should be affirmed. Raines v. Watson, 2 W. Va. 371; Stuart v. Pennis, 2 Va. Dec. 667.

A point in a cause in which the judges of the court of appeals are equally divided, stands affirmed by virtue of the act, Code, ch. 209, § 7, p. 841, Sess. Acts 1866-67, p. 987, as well where it is a ruling of the court below in the progress of the cause, as where it is the final judgment of the court in the case. Chahoon v. Com., 21 Gratt. 822.

When only four judges are sitting and they are equally divided in opinion, as to a part of the decree pronounced by the court below the reversal ought not to be extended farther, than they all (or a majority) concur, that there is error, and the residue ought to be affirmed. Com. v. Beaumarchais, 8 Call 123.

When a decree in chancery is affirmed, the court of appeals being equally divided in opinion, it should be "without prejudice to the legal remedies of the parties." Martin v. Welch, 4 Munf. 60.

D. SCOPE.

1. CONFINED TO THE RECORD.—The court of appeals can only consider a case, on writ of error or appeal, on the record as made in the trial court. If this fails to disclose the errors complained of, they cannot be considered. Barnes v. Com., 92 Va. 794, 23 S. E. Rep. 784; Wright v. Wood, 88 Va. 1037, 14 S. E. Rep. 914.

Matters not presented in the pleadings, or involved in the issues, but only inserted in the petition, or introduced into the argument, will not be considered by the appellate court. Robinson v. Mays' Trustee, 76 Va. 708; Taylor v. Mallory, 96 Va. 18, 30 S. E. Rep. 472.

Alleged errors which are outside of the pleadings and do not appear ever to have been brought to the attention of the trial court, will not be considered on error or appeal, in the court of appeals. Union Bank v. City of Richmond, 94 Va. 316, 26 S. E. Rep. 821.

2. MATTERS NOT ACTED UPON BY LOWER COURT.—The supreme court will not consider questions not yet acted on by the circuit court in the case. Kesler v. Lapham, 46 W. Va. 293, 33 S. E. Rep. 289.

Upon appeals from interlocutory decrees in chancery, only so much of the cause is before the appellate court, as the court of chancery has acted upon. Madden v. Madden, 2 Leigh 377.

Where an appeal is taken from a decree in a suit in which there is an attachment, but the court below did not pass upon the validity of the attachment, but sent the cause to rules to bring the legal title to the property attached before the court, the court of appeals will not pass upon the validity of the attachment. Chapman v. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co., 18 W. Va. 184.

Where a writ of error is only to a judgment refusing to vacate an attachment, the balance of the case remaining undecided in the circuit court, the supreme court will consider only matters arising upon the judgment refusing to abate the attachment. Kesler v. Lapham, 46 W. Va. 293, 33 S. E. Rep. 289.

3. PREVIOUS APPEALABLE DECREES.

Barred by Statute.—The court of appeals or the judge to whom the petition is presented, cannot look into or regard for the purpose of granting the appeal, any errors assigned or complained of in decrees or orders made more than five years before the petition is presented, unless such errors were committed in decrees or orders which were not appealable. The party cannot present his petition for an appeal and have the appeal allowed upon errors assigned in appealable decrees rendered more than five years before the petition is presented, although the errors thus complained of may be the foundation of, and given effect in, a subsequent decree rendered within five years from which an appeal is also prayed. If he is not entitled to an appeal from such subsequent decree for errors committed therein independently of any errors committed in such former appealable decrees and which are merely carried into effect by the subsequent decree, the appeal cannot be allowed, and if inadvertently allowed it will be dismissed. Lloyd v. Kyle, 26 W. Va. 534; Fowler v. Lewis, 86 W. Va. 112, 14 S. E. Rep. 447.

Appealable decrees, not appealed from within the five years prescribed by statute, are irreversible and conclusive, not only as to the matters adjudicated by them but as to all proceedings in the cause prior to the entering of such decrees. Tiernan v. Minghini, 28 W. Va. 314.

Where an appeal is not taken within five years from the rendition of an appealable decree, on an appeal from a subsequent decree the court cannot review the barred decree where there are no errors in the decree appealed from, which are not based on errors in the former decree. Buster v. Holland, 27 W. Va. 510, 523.

No notice can be taken of any error, upon appeal, in any decree rendered more than five years before the appeal was allowed, except so far as such error might be considered upon a bill of review filed in the cause. Middleton v. Selby, 19 W. Va. 167.

No appeal can be taken after the expiration of two years from the date of the rendition of the decree, where the same has been rendered since March 27, 1882; nor can such a decree be reviewed by the court of appeals, though an appeal should be taken from a subsequent decree based on it. Shirey v. Musgrave, 20 W. Va. 181, 11 S. E. Rep. 914; Stout v. Philippi Mfg., etc., Co., 41 W. Va. 339, 23 S. E. Rep. 571.

And in Hoy v. Hughes, 27 W. Va. 778, it was held that, where an appeal was not taken from an appealable decree within the statutory period, whether final or interlocutory, if an appeal was afterwards taken from a subsequent decree, no error in the former barred decree can be considered, whether there is new error in the second decree independent of any errors in the barred decree, or not; so that the rule may now be stated, that on appeal from a subsequent decree no error can be considered in a decree rendered more than two years before under any circumstances whatever. The only errors which the court of appeals can correct are such as are not founded upon and which could not have been corrected on appeal from the barred decree.

Not Barred.—An appeal taken in time will bring up for review every previous appealable decree not barred by the statute. Stout v. Philippi Mfg., etc., Co., 41 W. Va. 339, 23 S. E. Rep. 571.

4. PREVIOUS NONAPPEALABLE DECREES.—An appeal taken in time from a decree will bring up for review every former order or decree not itself appealable, no matter when entered. Stout v. Philippi Mfg., etc., Co., 41 W. Va. 339, 23 S. E. Rep. 571.

As in the case of an appeal, from a final decree, not only any error in that, but any error in the former proceedings, ought to be corrected; so upon an appeal from an interlocutory order, not only error in that order, but errors in the former proceedings should be corrected. In either case, the effect of the appeal is to bring up the whole proceedings prior to the decree or order from which the appeal is taken. Burton v. Brown, 22 Gratt. 1; Huston v. Cantril, 11 Leigh 186, 172; Effinger v. Kenney, 79 Va. 551; Morriss v. Garland, 78 Va. 215, 222.

It is not denied that when a party is entitled to, and obtains, an appeal from either a final decree or an appealable interlocutory decree, such appeal will bring with it for review all preceding nonappealable decrees and orders from which have arisen any of the errors complained of in the decree from which the appeal is taken, no matter how long they may have been made before the appeal was taken. Camden v. Haymond, 9 W. Va. 680; Steenrod v. Railroad Co., 25 W. Va. 133. In all such cases, however, the party must be entitled to an appeal, and obtain it, from a decree which was rendered not more than five years previous to the time he presents his petition. Lloyd v. Kyle, 26 W. Va. 534.

An appeal from any final decree by a party entitled to appeal therefrom brings with it for review all the preceding interlocutory decrees, out of which any of the errors complained of in such final decree arose. Camden v. Haymond, 9 W. Va. 680; Watson v. Wigginton, 28 W. Va. 533.

Previous interlocutory decrees may be reviewed upon appeal from an appealable decree without reference to the time elapsed between their date and that of the decree appealed from. Haymond v. Camden, 22 W. Va. 180.

5. CONTEMPT PROCEEDINGS.—An appeal from a decree in a suit in equity will not bring up for review an order discharging a rule to show cause why the party shall not be punished for contempt in disobeying an order of injunction made in such suit. Alderson v. Commissioners, 32 W. Va. 640, 9 S. E. Rep. 868.

6. JUDGMENT SUSTAINING DEMURRER TO ONE COUNT.—Where a demurrer to one count of a declaration has been sustained, and issue taken on other counts, and there has been a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, a writ of error awarded to the defendant does not bring up the action of the trial court in sustaining the demurrer to that count, nor can that count be looked to by the appellate court in order to sustain the verdict and judgment complained of. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. Rutherford, 95 Va. 773, 30 S. E. Rep. 383.

7. PROCEEDINGS SUBSEQUENT TO APPEAL.—This court, considering an appeal from an order granting an injunction, cannot consider any deposition in the cause taken by the appellant subsequent to the time when the order of injunction took effect. Freshwater v. Pittsburg, etc., R. Co., 6 W. Va. 503.

8. JUDGMENT ON FORTHCOMING BOND.—The judgment on a forthcoming or replevy bond is not brought up to the appellate court on a writ of superseas to the original judgment. Moss v. Moss, 4 H. & M. 293, 303; Laidley v. Bright, 17 W. Va. 779, 783.

9. APPEAL FROM ORDER REFUSING TO DISSOLVE INJUNCTION.—On an appeal from an order refusing to dissolve an injunction the court will take notice of any error in the previous proceedings. Lomax v. Picot, 2 Rand. 247.

10. TWO CAUSES HEARD TOGETHER.

One Decree in Both Suits.—So, where two causes are heard together and one decree rendered in both suits; which passes upon the rights of the plaintiffs in both suits, an appeal from this decree, will bring up both causes, and the suit brought by the appellees is as much before the court as the other, since it would be impossible to pass upon the appellants' rights without passing upon those of the appellees. Alexander v. Alexander, 85 Va. 353, 7 S. E. Rep. 335.

Where two causes relating to the same matters are heard together and a decree entered which applies to a great extent to both causes, and the parties to the two causes are the same, except the plaintiffs in one cause are defendants along with others in the other cause, if the plaintiffs appeal from the decree in one case, it takes up both causes, where the parties to both causes are before the court of appeals. Hence the objection that an appeal should have been taken in both cases is groundless. Hill v. Proctor, 10 W. Va. 59, 73.

"This is because of the relation of the causes to each other, the identity of the questions involved, the hearing of the causes together, and the entering of the one decree, which in many material particulars, except as to costs, adjudicates the same questions in one case as the other. If the decree had been entered in a different form, perhaps, an appeal might have been from so much of the decree as applied to one case alone in all material respects. As these causes were heard together, and final decrees sought in each by the parties, on account of their peculiar relation and the form and nature of said decree, if there be any construction of the pleadings, or otherwise which will enable this court to consider and pass upon said decree so far as it applies to both of said causes upon this appeal, such construction should be given." Hill v. Proctor, 10 W. Va. 59.

Separate Decrees.—But where causes are heard together merely because they seek to subject the same fund but there is no conflict between the claims and they are entirely independent of each other, the appellants may appeal from the decrees in one cause only. Hall v. Bank of Virginia, 14 W. Va. 584, 614.

Though the records in all the other cases are brought up by certiorari, the court of appeals cannot examine the other causes, where the appeal is from one of the causes only. Hall v. Bank of Va., 14 W. Va. 584, 614.

Where an appeal is thus taken in one cause only, it is not error to describe in their undertaking the decrees appealed from as rendered in one of the causes, where there is no difficulty in identifying the decrees from which the appeals were taken, and the form of the undertaking at the same time shows that an appeal was taken in that cause only. Hall v. Bank of Va., 14 W. Va. 584, 615.

But where two suits, one of which is a foreign attachment, in the same court, by different plaintiffs, but against the same defendants, claiming to subject the same fund, proceed together and are heard together, and the court makes a decree in each case, giving to each plaintiff a portion of the fund, and one of the plain iffs, who claims the whole fund, takes an appeal from the decree, it was held that the appeal brought up both cases, though the appellant was not a party in the other case, which was the attachment case, and the appellate court may reverse the decree in the second case. Anderson v. De Soer, 6 Gratt. 363.

11. APPEAL FROM DECREE REFUSING TO ALLOW BILL OF REVIEW TO BE FILED.—An appeal from the decree of the court refusing to allow a bill of review to be filed, if the decree sought to be reviewed was final, brings up for consideration the correctness of the first decree; and if the first decree was interlocutory, brings up the whole case. Ambrouse v. Keller, 22 Gratt. 769.

12. APPEAL FROM JUDGMENT QUASHING EXECUTION.—Where a judgment was entered by the circuit court, fining a party $25 for contempt, an execution was issued upon this judgment, and subsequently such party moved said court to quash the execution, which the court refused to do, and the party then obtained a writ of error from the court of appeals to the order refusing to quash said execution, it was held that such writ of error did not bring before the court of appeals for review the original judgment imposing the fine. State v. Blair, 29 W. Va. 474, 2 S. E. Rep. 333.

E CORRECTION OF ERRORS AGAINST APPELLEE.

1. WHERE HE CROSS-ASSIGNS ERROR.—An appellee

is entitled to avail himself of his adversary's appeal to correct any error in a judgment at law or decree in chancery, prejudicial to him. The whole record is before the appellate court, and it must correct any error disclosed, even in favor of the appellee. Boulware v. Newton, 18 Gratt. 708; Day v. Murdoch, 1 Munf. 460; Defarges v. Lipscomb, 2 Munf. 451; Lomax v. Picot, 2 Rand. 247; Burton v. Brown, 22 Gratt. 1, 16; Little v. Bowen, 76 Va. 724; Frazier v. Frazier, 77 Va. 775; Garrett v. Carr, 3 Leigh 407, 418; Gaines v. Merryman, 95 Va. 660, 29 S. E. Rep. 733.

The court of appeals has since, to wit, on the 2d of October, 1811, established the following rule: "It is the opinion of this court, founded as well on a full consideration of the law, as on various decisions which have heretofore been had, that, in future, where a judgment or decree is reversed neither in the whole, nor in part, on the ground of error against the appellant, or plaintiff, in any appeal, writ of error, or supersedeas; yet, if error is perceived against the appellee, or defendant, the court will consider the whole record as before them, and will reverse the proceedings, either in whole, or in part, in the same manner as they would do, were the appellee or defendant also to bring the same before them, either by appeal, writ of error, or supersedeas; unless such error be waived by the appellee, or defendant, which waiver shall be considered a release of all errors as to him." Day v. Murdoch, 1 Munf. 460.

Under this rule an appellee may assign as error a decision adverse to his interest in the decree appealed from, although he failed to appeal when he might have done so from a former decree against him in the same suit, determining the same question. Osborne v. Big Stone Gap Colliery Co., 96 Va. 58, 30 S. E. Rep. 446.

And even though another party has appealed and his appeal has been dismissed for failure to mature it, still such party may assign error in the decree on the appeal of another party if they stand on the same ground. Nicholson v. Gloucester Charity School, 93 Va. 101, 24 S. E. Rep. 899.

Rule 10 Supreme Court of West Virginia.—"In any appeal or writ of error, if error is perceived against the appellee or defendant in error the court will consider the whole record as being before it, and will reverse the proceedings, either in whole or in part, in the same manner as it would, were the appellee or defendant in error, to assign error, and bring the case before the court, unless such error be waived by the party prejudiced thereby, which waiver shall be considered as a release of all error committed against him. It is, however, advisable for the appellee or defendant in error, if he is of the opinion that there is error in the record to his prejudice, to call attention to the same by a formal counter-assignment of error, filed at the hearing of the case, or by pointing out and complaining of the same in his brief." Atkinson v. Beckett, 34 W. Va. 584, 12 S. E. Rep. 717; Morgan v. Ohio, etc., R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588; Newman v. Mollohan, 10 W. Va. 488.

Any error to the appellee's prejudice may be corrected, though his interest be not identical with that of the appellant, but hostile, and though the writ of error may be only to a certain judgment, and the error to his prejudice be in either that or another. Morgan v. Ohio, etc., R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588.

This rule, by which the court will look, under certain circumstances there set forth, into the whole case, and settle the rights of parties, as well those not appealing, as those appealing, applies with still greater force to the case of a joint judgment, when the parties interested have all been summoned, and where the judgment must be affirmed as to all, or reversed as to all. Newman v. Mollohan, 10 W. Va. 488.

Under § 12, ch. 135, Code, requiring all parties except appellant to be summoned to appear to the appeal or writ of error, all are deemed appellees, and so bound. Morgan v. Ohio, etc., R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588.

Failure to Assign Error.—And if the appellee does not ask for such correction, he will be held to have waived the error and cannot afterwards appeal on his own behalf. Burton v. Brown, 23 Gratt. 1, 17; Logan v. Dils, 4 W. Va. 397.

So, an appellee cannot assign errors in a former decree, in which he acquiesced, upon an appeal by another party from a decree in which he had no interest, and to which he was not even a party. Simmons v. Lyles, 27 Gratt. 922.

2. JOINT JUDGMENTS.—A joint judgment cannot be reversed as to one defendant and affirmed as to another, but if erroneous as to one, must be reversed as to both. Jones v. Raine, 4 Rand. 386; Gray v. Stuart, 33 Gratt. 351; Vandiver v. Roberts, 4 W. Va. 498; Vance Shoe Co. v. Haught, 41 W. Va. 275, 23 S. E. Rep. 553; Lyman v. Thompson, 11 W. Va. 427, 44; Arrington v. Cheatham, 2 Rob. 492; Newman v. Mollohan, 10 W. Va. 488, 495.

Where the principal and sureties are sued jointly and the judgment is erroneous as to the sureties it must be reversed as to all, though the judgment would have been good against the principal, if he had been sued alone. Munford v. Overseers, 2 Rand. 313. See also, Cole v. Pennell, 2 Rand. 174.

Where one of several joint defendants has taken a writ of error to a joint judgment, all the other defendants are bound by the judgment of the court of appeals and no other appeal can ever be taken by any of them. Newman v. Mollohan, 10 W. Va. 488, 500.

Where a bill is dismissed as to two executors and one of them appeals, if the decree is reversed it must be reversed as to both. Garrett v. Carr, 3 Leigh 407, 418.

Joint defendants who do not appeal are entitled to the benefit of defences which are not personal to the appellant, e. g. the statute of limitations, and the decree if erroneous will be reversed as to all. Ashby v. Bell, 80 Va. 811.

Upon a bill against two joint owners of land, for the specific execution, or for the rescission of a joint contract made by them for the sale of the land, one of them answers the bill and sets up a defence equally applicable to both; and the bill is taken for confessed against the other. There being a decree against both for a rescission of the contract and a repayment of the purchase money, the party as to whom the bill has been taken for confessed, may appeal; and if the decree is erroneous, it will be reversed as to both. Purcell v. McCleary, 10 Gratt. 246.

But where a joint judgment is void as to one of the defendants for want of service of process the rule had no application and a bill brought to enforce such judgment should be dismissed as to him by the court of appeals, but not as to the other defendants. Gray v. Stuart, 33 Gratt. 351.

The law authorizing separate judgments in an action of ejectment, if one judgment is appealed from, it may be reversed and the other left undisturbed. Strader v. Goff, 6 W. Va. 257.

A judgment against two defendants on the confession of one being erroneous, the court of appeals will direct the proper judgment to be entered against the one who confessed and further proceedings as to the other. Ward v. Johnston, 1 Munf. 45.

By Statute.—But § 26, ch. 135, Code of W. Va., authorizing the court of appeals to reverse in whole or in part, changes the common-law rule, so that where parties appealing stand on a different ground from those not appealing, a joint decree will be reversed as to them alone. Vance Shoe Co. v. Haught, 41 W. Va. 275, 23 S. E. Rep. 553. See also, Gray v. Stuart, 33 Gratt. 351.

3. APPELLEES STANDING ON SAME GROUND WITH APPELLANTS.—Where the parties appealing and the parties not appealing stand upon the same ground, and their rights are involved in the same question, and equally affected by the same decree or judgment, the court of appeals will consider the whole case, and settle the rights of the parties not appealing as well as those who bring their case up by appeal. Walker v. Page, 21 Gratt. 636; Vance Shoe Co. v. Haught, 41 W. Va. 275, 23 S. E. Rep. 553; Arrington v. Cheatham, 2 Rob. 492; Lyman v. Thompson, 11 W. Va. 427, 444; Morgan v. Ohio River R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588; Newman v. Mollohan, 10 W. Va. 488, 499; Burton v. Brown, 22 Gratt. 1.

And that though the party not appealing is unable to do so. Lenows v. Lenow, 8 Gratt. 349.

The appellate court having set aside the sale of certain parcels of land at the instance of purchasers, who were the appellants in the cause, and the ground of the objection to the sale being such as the infant vendors may make to all the sales, the court will set aside the whole decree confirming the sale of all the parcels, though the other purchasers are satisfied with their purchases, and are not parties to the appeal; and will send the cause back, for the court below to determine whether these last mentioned sales ought to be set aside, or confirmed with the consent of the purchasers, and for the benefit of the infant defendants. Talley v. Starke, 6 Gratt. 339.

4. APPELLEES STANDING ON DIFFERENT GROUND.—Where the parties in a cause stand upon distinct and unconnected grounds, where their rights are separate, and not equally affected by the same decree or judgment, then the appeal of one will not bring up for adjudication the rights or claims of the other. Walker v. Page, 21 Gratt. 636; Tate v. Liggat, 2 Leigh 84, 108; Lewis v. Thornton, 6 Munf. 87, 97; Vance Shoe Co. v. Haught, 41 W. Va. 275, 23 S. E. Rep. 553; Arrington v. Cheatham, 2 Rob. 492; Morgan v. Ohio River R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588; Newman v. Mollohan, 10 W. Va. 488, 500; Burton v. Brown, 22 Gratt. 1; Rorer v. Roanoke Nat. Bank, 83 Va. 589, 608, 4 S. E. Rep. 820.

As, where a bill, filed against a person as administrator and guardian and against his sureties in those capacities is dismissed as to his sureties as guardian and they do not appeal, on an appeal by the administrator from a decree for resettling his accounts, the appellees cannot ask the correction of the decree dismissing the bill as to the sureties as guardian. Blackwell v. Bragg, 78 Va. 529.

5. RULES AS TO APPELLATE JURISDICTION APPLY.—An appellee whose claim is less than $500, cannot assign error under Rule IX of the court of appeals. This rule was not intended to enlarge or extend the

But if there was no objection made in the court below as to the manner in which the order of publication was issued, or executed so as to bring the matter before the inferior court and have the question as to the sufficiency of the order of publication passed upon by that court, and the decree recites that the order of publication as to the absent defendant was "duly executed," the objection that it was not so executed will not be entertained by the appellate court. Scott v. Ludington, 14 W. Va. 387; Craig v. Sebrell, 9 Gratt. 131.

Writ of Ad Quod Damnum and Inquest.—In proceedings to change a road the defendant not having made any motion to quash the writ and inquest in the county court, but going to trial on the merits, he waived the objection to the writ and inquest; and it is too late to move to quash them or any other of the proceedings in the circuit court. Mitchell v. Thorne, 21 Gratt. 164.

Sheriff's Return.—An objection to a defective return of the service of process, made for the first time in the court of appeals, is too late. S. V. R. Co. v. Griffith, 76 Va. 913.

After a judgment by default a party cannot object in the appellate court to the truth of the sheriff's return. Cunningham v. Mitchell, 4 Rand. 189.

Attachments.—Though the service of an attachment upon garnishees, and the return thereon be irregular, yet if the garnishees appear to the action and defend it, without objecting to the irregularity, they cannot afterwards make the objection in the appellate court. Pulliam v. Aler, 15 Gratt. 54.

When the garnishee appeared and made no objection in the court below, it is too late to object in the appellate court that an attachment or the officer's return thereon are insufficient or that the attachment was returned at a later term than that to which it was made returnable. Joseph v. Pyle, 2 W. Va. 449.

An objection to an attachment proceeding on the ground that the summons was made improperly returnable may be taken for the first time on appeal. McAllister v. Guggenheimer, 91 Va. 317, 21 S. E. Rep. 475.

h. Sufficiency of Presentment.—Upon a rule to show cause why an information should not be filed, the defendant appears and moves the court to quash the presentment on the ground that it does not charge any offense against him: but the motion is overruled. The information is then filed, and he pleads "not guilty"; and on the trial there is a verdict and judgment against him. Upon a writ of error to the appellate court, he may object to the sufficiency of the presentment. Bishop v. Com., 13 Gratt. 785.

i. Filing of Bill.—If there be a doubt as to the right to file a supplemental bill, the objection cannot be raised for the first time in the appellate court. The failure to demur, or otherwise object to the filing of the bill, and joining issue thereon, constitutes a waiver of objections thereto. Wilson v. Wilson, 98 Va. 546, 25 S. E. Rep. 596.

j. Bill Materially Defective.—Where a bill is materially defective, though no demurrer is put in, yet a decree based on it may be reversed on appeal. Cook v. Dorsey, 38 W. Va. 196, 18 S. E. Rep. 468.

k. Misnomer of Corporation.—A mere misnomer of a corporation cannot be taken advantage of for the first time in the appellate court. Farmers' Bank v. Willis, 7 W. Va. 31, 51.

Aliter where there is no such corporation. Mason v. Bank, 12 Leigh 84.

l. Want of Formal Order of Consolidation.—Where two causes of the same nature and between the same parties are tried together by consent of parties and one verdict and judgment are rendered, it cannot be objected in the appellate court that there was no formal order of consolidation. Eagles v. Hook, 22 Gratt. 510.

m. Trying Joint Action Separately.—Where, in an action against joint defendants, the case is first tried as to one and then revived and tried against the heir of the other, it is too late to object for the first time in the appellate court that it was error to try the cases separately. Kenna v. Quarrier, 3 W. Va. 210.

n. Jurors.—An objection that jurors summoned in a criminal case were not free from exception cannot be made in the appellate court, where it does not appear that the objection was made in the trial court, or that the accused was injured thereby. Acts 1893-94, ch. 43; Barnes v. Com., 92 Va. 794, 23 S. E. Rep. 784.

Objection cannot be made for the first time in the appellate court that a person served on the jury without being selected by the court or summoned by the sheriff. Short's Case, 90 Va. 96, 17 S. E. Rep. 786.

Oath of Jury.—It cannot be assigned as error in the appellate court that the record fails to show that the jury were sworn to try the issue, but only states that they were sworn according to law, where no objection was made in the court below and the verdict of the jury was responsive to the issues, it will be presumed that the proper oath was administered, the contrary not appearing by the record. Douglass v. Land Co., 12 W. Va. 502.

o. Premature Hearing of Cause.—Where a cause is prematurely set for hearing at rules, if the record shows that the defendant appeared at the hearing, the appellate court may imply, in the absence of objection appearing on the record, that the objection was waived. Poling v. Johnson, 2 Rob. 255.

Two executors file a bill against the creditors of their testator, to have the assets of the estate administered in equity. The executorial account is taken, charging the executors as upon a joint administration without objection; and the exceptions thereto are passed upon by the court. Then one of the executors dies, and his death is suggested, but the cause is not revived either by or against his representative; and at the same term of the court, the cause comes on for final hearing, without objection by either party, and the court makes a decree against the surviving executor, who takes an appeal to the court of appeals. Held, it is too late for the appellant to object in the court of appeals, that the cause was not ready for hearing, because the representative of his co-executor was not a party. Kee v. Kee, 2 Gratt. 116.

p. Pleadings.

Declaration.—Where no demurrer is filed to a declaration which states a good cause of action, no errors can be assigned in the court of appeals because of its supposed defects. Alvey v. Cahoon, 86 Va. 173, 9 S. E. Rep. 994.

Plea of Breach of Warranty.—In action on notes for price of certain wagons where breach of warranty is pleaded under Code, § 3299, it was held too late to object in the court of appeals for the first time that the wagons were warranted as "farm wagons" and were used for other purposes. Milburn Wagon Co. v. Nisewarner, 90 Va. 714, 19 S. E. Rep. 846.

Want of Plea.—In an action of unlawful detainer, the defendant appears; but, though the case is continued for years, he does not file any plea. The cause is proceeded in precisely as if there was a plea filed—the jury are sworn to try the issue joined, and the defendant makes full defence. There having been a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant cannot set up the want of the plea and issue thereon in the appellate court. Bartley v. McKinney, 28 Gratt. 750.

Nonjoinder of issue.—In an action on the case for damages to plaintiff's land, there is a plea of not guilty, on which issue is joined, and there is a special plea, to which there is a special replication concluding to the country. To this there is no rejoinder, and the record does not say that issue was joined upon it; but the parties go to trial, and the subject of the special plea and replication are contested before the jury, which renders a verdict for the plaintiff. No objection having been taken to the want of joinder of issue in the court below, it seems that the objection cannot be taken in the appellate court. Southside R. R. Co. v. Daniel, 20 Gratt. 244.

Defective Plea.—Where a plea is so defective, as not to raise a substantial defence to the action, the plea is bad even under the statute of jeofails, and a replader ought to be awarded by the appellate court, though no objection was raised to the plea in the court below, and issue had been joined thereon. State v. Seabright, 15 W. Va. 592.

On the other hand, where the improper or defective plea raises a substantial defence to the action, and it is not objected to in the court below, and issue is thereon joined, after verdict or judgment it is too late to object, the defect being cured by the statute of jeofails. State v. Seabright, 15 W. Va. 592.

Failure to Join in Demurrer.—An objection for failure to join in a demurrer to an indictment cannot be made for the first time in the court of appeals. Crump's Case, 98 Va. 833, 23 S. E. Rep. 760.

Pleading to Merits.—Where a plea of payment has been filed without objection, it is too late to object in the appellate court that it was too late to set aside the office judgment by pleading to the merits. Dickinson v. Dickinson, 25 Gratt. 331.

Variance.—Objection for variance between the pleadings and the proof cannot be made for the first time in the appellate court. Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. Rep. 869; Shenandoah, etc., R. Co. v. Moose, 88 Va. 827, 3 S. E. Rep. 796.

Where a judgment upon a forthcoming bond is obtained against a defendant, having legal notice, and appearing by attorney, but not moving to quash the bond, nor stating by plea or bill of exceptions, any variance between it and the execution, the appellate court cannot reverse the judgment on the ground of such variance. See Downman v. Chinn, 2 Wash. 189; Jones v. Hull, 1 H. & M. 211; Bronaugh v. Freeman, 2 Munf. 266.

r. Affidavits.

Want of.—Whether an affidavit is necessary under 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 83, to a plea that a power of attorney was not executed by the defendants, or not, this objection cannot be made for the first time in the appellate court, a general demurrer having been put in. Wilson v. Bank, 6 Leigh 570.

Where in debt on a bond, defendant pleads that bond was delivered as escrow upon conditions which were not performed, et sic non est factum; and the plea is not verified by affidavit of the party according to statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 83, but plaintiff makes no objection for want of such affidavit, and the plea is received by the court, issue joined upon it, trial, verdict and judgment had for defendant, it was held that the want of the affidavit to the plea was not a good ground of objection to the judgment in an appellate court. Hicks v. Goode, 12 Leigh 479.

When no exception or objection was taken in the court below, so far as the record shows, to the filing of an answer in chancery, because not verified by affidavit, or because the affidavit is defective, it is too late to make the objection in the appellate court. Arnold v. Slaughter, 36 W. Va. 589, 15 S. E. Rep. 250.

Objection to an attachment because not supported by an affidavit, or because the affidavit is defective, is ground for a motion to abate the attachment, but the objection must be made in the court below, and cannot be made for the first time in the court of appeals. Sims v. Tyrer, 96 Va. 5, 26 S. E. Rep. 508.

Objections to.—An affidavit taken without notice, if read without objection in the court below, will be considered as evidence in the appellate court; but it will not have the weight it might have had if regularly taken on notice. Adams v. Hubbard, 25 Gratt. 129.

A decree of the court below, founded on an affidavit and statement handed to the court at the time of the decree, and to which the appellants had no opportunity to except, may be objected to by them in the appellate court. Beckwith v. Avery, 31 Gratt. 533.

Where an affidavit is filed with a petition for rehearing a cause, and no objection is made in the court below, it cannot be objected to in the appellate court. Purdie v. Jones, 32 Gratt. 827.

Notice.—Defects in notice, or in service of notice, by subcontractor to owner under mechanic's lien law, cannot be objected to for the first time in appellate court. S. V. R. R. Co. v. Miller, 80 Va. 821.

It is too late to object in the appellate court that the notice to reverse or correct a judgment by default was insufficient, when the parties appeared and made no objection in the court below. Dillard v. Thornton, 29 Gratt. 392; Ballard v. Whitlock, 18 Gratt. 235.

So in case of notice to the person upon whose land a public landing is sought to be established. Muire v. Falconer, 10 Gratt. 12; or a mill, Bernard v. Brewer, 3 Wash. 77.

Admission or Exclusion of Evidence.—Objections to the introduction of evidence not made in the trial court cannot be raised or considered in the appellate court. Campbell Co. v. Angus, 91 Va. 438, 22 S. E. Rep. 167; Colvert v. Millstead, 5 Leigh 88; Russell's Case, 78 Va. 400; Lamberts v. Cooper, 29 Gratt. 61; Smith v. Burton, 94 Va. 158, 26 S. E. Rep. 412.

Where a party intends to review in the appellate court, the action of the trial court in rejecting or admitting evidence, he must make such ruling the subject-matter of a formal bill of exceptions, or he must in some way distinctly and specifically make such ruling a ground of his motion for a new trial. Halstead v. Horton, 38 W. Va. 727, 18 S. E. Rep. 953.

Though an exception is taken and entered at the time that a question asked of a witness is leading, the exceptant should bring it to the attention of the court and obtain an order for the suppression of the objectionable testimony; and if he fails to do this, the exception will not be regarded in the appellate court. Summers v. Darne, 31 Gratt. 791.

If parties without objection permit a contract to be proved by oral testimony, which, under some statute, could only be proved by writing, and the cause is heard and decided on such testimony, they will be deemed to have waived the right to require a writing, and will not be allowed to insist on a different rule in the court of appeals. The case must be heard and determined upon the same evidence in both courts. Eaves v. Vial, 98 Va. 184, 84 S. E. Rep. 978.

Secondary evidence having been admitted in the court below without objection, it cannot be objected to in the appellate court. Shue v. Turk, 15 Gratt. 256; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Powell, 94 Va. 208, 20 S. E. Rep. 828.

Where the record of a suit by legatees against an executor and his sureties, is referred to as an exhibit with the bill of the sureties against the executor and purchasers of assets from him, and the evidence in that record is relied on in the circuit court without objection in the suit by the sureties, it is too late to object to it in the appellate court. Jones v. Clark, 25 Gratt. 642.

A party will not be allowed to specify one or more grounds of objection to evidence offered in the trial court, and rely upon other grounds in the appellate court. He is regarded as having waived all other objections to the evidence except those which he pointed out specifically. Warren v. Warren, 98 Va. 78, 24 S. E. Rep. 918.

Where a question is put, and the court refuses to allow it to be answered, and the question itself does not plainly import that the answer will prove a material fact, what was proposed and expected to be proven must appear by a bill of exceptions, else there is no error apparent; and, if the question objected to is answered, the answer must be shown, else there is no error apparent. Sesler v. Rolfe Coal & Coke Co. (W. Va.), 41 S. E. Rep. 216.

Reading Record in Former Suit.—The circumstance, that the "writings and evidence" in a former suit were read at the hearing of another case, without any exception taken at that time appearing on the record, is no proof that this was done by consent of parties, and does not preclude the objection from being taken in the appellate court; the defendant in his answer having objected to the admission of the verdict and other proceedings in the former suit, but offered to agree that the depositions only might be read; to which offer no assent appeared on the part of the plaintiff. Chapmans v. Chapman, 1 Munf. 398.

Hearing Evidence at Separate Terms.—When part of the evidence is heard at one term and the rest at another, objection cannot be made for the first time in the appellate court. Wagon Co. v. Peterson, 27 W. Va. 316.

u. Depositions.—Depositions must be excepted to in the lower court except for incompetency, and the grounds must be specified in the exception. Long v. Perine, 41 W. Va. 314, 23 S. E. Rep. 611; Linsey v. McGannon, 9 W. Va. 154; Vanscoy v. Stinchcomb, 29 W. Va. 263, 11 S. E. Rep. 927; Dickenson v. Davis, 2 Leigh 406; Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 187; Hill v. Proctor, 10 W. Va. 59; Pollard v. Lively, 2 Gratt. 216.

But objections for incompetency may be made for the first time in the appellate court. Long v. Perine, 41 W. Va. 314, 23 S. E. Rep. 611; Rose v. Brown, 11 W. Va. 122; Taylor v. McDonald (Va.), 41 S. E. Rep. 946.

But in Colvert v. Millstead, 5 Leigh 88, and Baxter v. Moore, 5 Leigh 219, it was held that objection could not be made for the first time in the appellate court, even on the ground of incompetency. See foot-note to Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 187. See monographic note on "Depositions" appended to Fild v. Brown, 24 Gratt. 74.

But if the facts appear on the record, while the depositions cannot be excluded, yet it will weaken their effect. Dickenson v. Davis, 2 Leigh 401.

v. Failure to Sign Bill.—An objection to a bill in chancery, made for the first time in the court of appeals for the reason that it is not signed by counsel, will not be entertained. Jones v. Shufflin, 45 W. Va. 729, 31 S. E. Rep. 975.

w. Setting Aside Nonsuit.—Defendant, not having taken advantage of a nonsuit entered below and thereafter set aside, was held estopped, after trial and judgment, from raising the question on appeal. Connolly v. Bruner, 48 W. Va. 71, 35 S. E. Rep. 927.

x. Nonproduction of Exhibits.—The appellant cannot object, in the court of appeals to the nonproduction of papers made exhibits in the bill, when he did not call for them in the court below and in his answer did not deny their existence or contest their validity. Chapman v. Pittsburg, etc., R. Co., 18 W. Va. 184.

y. Failure to Refer Cause to Commissioner.—It is too late to object in the appellate court that the cause should have been sent to a commissioner. Dorr v. Dewing, 36 W. Va. 466, 15 S. E. Rep. 98; Hickman v. Painter, 11 W. Va. 386.

z. Being Compelled to Join in Demurrer to Evidence.—One who objects to being compelled to join in a demurrer to evidence must make his objection thereto in the circuit court, and cannot make it for the first time in the supreme court. Hollandsworth v. Stone, 47 W. Va. 773, 35 S. E. Rep. 864.

aa. Commissioner's Report.—Objection to a decree for errors in the report of a commissioner, not appearing on the face of it, cannot be made in the appellate court, unless founded on exceptions to the report in the lower court. Coffman v. Sangston, 21 Gratt. 263; Peters v. Neville, 26 Gratt. 549.

Where sales-commissioner's report shows that sale was made as decree prescribed and no exception was made below, none can be made in the court of appeals. Smith v. Henkel, 81 Va. 524.

Where the report of an account in chancery is not excepted to by either party, and there is a decree according to the report, and on appeal taken, the report is omitted from the record, according to the statute of 1825-6, ch. 15, § 11, either party may call for the report in the court of appeals, and have it brought up; but if neither party does so, no objections can be considered, which the report would be necessary to explain or to support. Poindexter v. Green, 6 Leigh 504.

And the attention of the court must be called to the exception to the commissioner's report. Hansucker v. Walker, 76 Va. 753.

But errors apparent upon the face of a commissioner's report, will be corrected in the appellate court, though not excepted to in the court below. Wills v. Dunn, 5 Gratt. 384; Dunbar v. Woodcock, 10 Leigh 628.

Where the commissioner in his report, follows the directions of the court, the court of appeals may review such decision without any exception being taken to the commissioner's report. Kyle v. Conrad, 25 W. Va. 760.

One defendant files an exception to the commissioner's report, which is relied on by another defendant, but at the hearing in the court below, this exception is waived. The exception having been waived, cannot be relied upon in the appellate court. Robertson v. Trigg, 32 Gratt. 76. See monographic note on "Commissioners in Chancery" appended to Whitehead v. Whitehead, 23 Gratt. 376.

bb. Report of Viewers.—Upon an application to establish a public landing, if no motion has been made in the county court to quash the report of the viewers, it is too late to object to it in the appellate court. Muire v. Falconer, 10 Gratt. 12; Lewis v. Washington, 5 Gratt. 265.

cc. Instructions.—No exceptions having been taken to the instructions, neither party will be allowed to question in the court of appeals the correctness of the law laid down by the court as applicable to the evidence in the cause. Lamberts v. Cooper, 29 Gratt. 66; Montague v. Allan, 78 Va. 592.

Instructions are to be interpreted in the light of the evidence in the case, and it is not to be presumed that the jury considered other evidence not introduced in the cause. If the instruction was applicable to evidence introduced in the trial court without exception, an objection to the instruction solely on the ground that there was no relevant evidence to support it cannot be made for the first time in the appellate court. New York, etc., R. Co. v. Thomas, 92 Va. 606, 24 S. E. Rep. 264.

See generally, monographic note on "Instructions" appended to Womack v. Circle, 29 Gratt. 192.

dd. Improper Abatement of Suit on Return of Sheriff.—Although the lower court erred in abating a suit on a return of the sheriff of "not found in my bailiwick" yet, where two trials were had without objection on that ground, the objection will be deemed waived in the appellate court. Shrewsbury v. Miller, 10 W. Va. 114.

ee. Verdict.

Not Responsive to Issues.—A judgment will be reversed where the verdict is not responsive to the issues, even though the objection is not taken in the court below, and a venire facias directed. Brown v. Hendersons, 4 Munf. 492.

Verdict in Issue Out of Chancery.—Where an issue is directed in a chancery cause, and a verdict is found to which no exception is taken, and a decree is rendered thereon, the facts found in the verdict must be regarded in the appellate court, as the established facts of the case. Lee v. Boak, 11 Gratt. 182.

f. Statements in Bill.—Where, in a bill by a widow against her husband's administrator and his sureties to recover her distributive share, to which no other distributee is made a party, it is stated that her husband's brother was the only other distributee in the United States, and that he had been paid and had left the United States and his residence was unknown, this statement must be taken as true, if not controverted in the lower court and the objection that the other distributees were not made parties cannot be made in the appellate court. Moore v. George, 10 Leigh 228.

Plaintiffs sue as heirs at law of K. and the defendant answers, and does not question their right to sue in that character, and no question is made or suggested in the court below of their right to sue as such heirs; and throughout the proceedings it is implied, if not expressly conceded, that they are properly before the court as such heirs. It is too late to object in the appellate court, to the decree, for the want of the proof of the fact. Buchanan v. King, 23 Gratt. 414.

gg. Excessive Damages.—If no objection appear, by bill of exceptions taken to the overruling of a motion for a new trial, to have been made in the trial court, to the excessiveness of damages, it is too late to make such objection in the court of appeals. Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. George, 88 Va. 223, 18 S. E.

Rep. 429; James River & Kanawha Co. v. Adams, 17 Gratt. 427; Law v. Law, 2 Gratt. 366.

It is too late for a grantor in a fraudulent deed to urge in appellate court that a judgment is excessive in a suit to annul the deed and subject the property to such judgment. Wray v. Davenport, 79 Va. 19.

hh. Failure to Point Out Errors in a Settlement.—Where defendant relies upon a settlement which the evidence tends to show was coerced from the plaintiff, and was grossly erroneous, but does not ask the court to require the plaintiff to point out the errors in the settlement of which he complains, and the jury find a verdict for the plaintiff disregarding the settlement, he cannot complain of the want of such a statement of the plaintiff's objection to the settlement. Varner v. Core, 20 W. Va. 472.

ii. Defects in Vendor's Title.—On a bill by vendee against vendor for specific execution, if no objection to the vendor's title be made in the court of chancery, in any form, he cannot be heard to make such objection in the court of appeals. Brockenbrough v. Blythe, 3 Leigh 619.

jj. Failure to Record Decree.—The objection that a decree had not been recorded in the county where the land lies not having been taken in the court below cannot be made for the first time in the appellate court. Wynn v. Harman, 5 Gratt. 157.

kk. Revival of Cause.—The record stating that by consent of parties the cause was revived, against the persons therein named, heirs at law of the defendant who had died, and no objection having been made on this ground in the circuit court, the appellate court must presume the revival regularly entered, with the consent of the proper parties. Buchanan v. King, 23 Gratt. 414.

An appellant has no right to complain that a cause was not duly revived in the name of the heirs of the plaintiff, he having died pending the suit, the decree being in the name and in favor of the said heirs and they being parties to it and defending the appeal. Mustard v. Wohlford, 15 Gratt. 329.

Where an action of debt was brought against the maker and two indorsers of negotiable notes and there was an office judgment at rules against all the defendants and at the next rules the office judgment was confirmed as to the maker and one indorser and the death of the other was suggested and at the next term of the court there was a judgment against the maker and the first indorser and afterwards a scire facias is issued and served on the executrix of the other indorser to revive the action, and she appears and pleads nil debit and obtains a continuance and this is repeated and there are three trials and verdict in her favor, it was held, that the executrix not having made any question in the court below, as to the revival of the suit against her by scire facias she must be held to have waived the question and she cannot make it in the appellate court. Slaughters v. Farland, 31 Gratt. 134.

ll. Multifariousness.—An appellate court will not reverse a decree on the ground of multifariousness alone, where that objection was not raised in the lower court. Hill v. Bowyer, 18 Gratt. 364, 381.

mm. Laches.—After an account has been taken in a suit against an administrator for an account and he submits to the account and a decree rendered thereon, objection on account of laches cannot be made in the appellate court. Wills v. Dunn, 5 Gratt. 386.

nn. Deeds.

Recitals.—Where, on a bill by cestuis que trustent to sell land, the land is sold, but the purchaser fails to pay all the purchase money, and on a rule against him to show cause why the land should not be resold to pay the balance, he objects to the title on the ground that the trustees were not made parties, and then one of the trustees styling himself the surviving trustee files a release deed, no objection having been made in the court below, the purchaser cannot object in the appellate court that it was not shown that he was the surviving trustee. Jones v. Tatum, 19 Gratt. 720.

Acknowledgment.—Where no point was made in the pleading that the acknowledgment of a deed is void because taken by a notary who was the agent of the grantee, such point cannot be considered by the court of appeals, as it can only decree upon the case as made by the pleadings. Shenandoah Val. Railroad Co. v. Dunlop, 86 Va. 346, 10 S. E. Rep. 239.

Signature and Seal of Deed of Corporation.—In a suit in equity among creditors of a corporation, one of them claims under a deed of trust, which is executed by the president and secretary in behalf of the corporation; but the deed is not in the name of the corporation, nor has it the corporate seal. No objection having been made to the deed on these grounds, in any of the pleadings or proceedings in the cause, but only in the petition for an appeal, the objection comes too late, and will not be considered in the appellate court. Wroten v. Armat, 81 Gratt. 228.

pp. Confirmation of Assignment of Dower.—It cannot be objected for the first time in the court of appeals that the order of confirmation of an assignment of dower does not appear from the record to have been made on the motion of an heir or devisee. Parrish v. Parrish, 88 Va. 529, 14 S. E. Rep. 325.

qq. Want of Revenue Stamp.—It cannot be objected for the first time in an appellate court that a title bond in a cause was not stamped with a United States revenue stamp, where no objection was made at the trial by bill of exception or certificate. Hawkins v. Wilson, 1 W. Va. 117.

rr. Conditions of Insurance Policy Not Printed in Type of Required Size.—An objection that the conditions of an insurance policy are not printed in type as large as long primer, as required by the statute, cannot be made for the first time in the appellate court. In the case at bar the company was allowed to rely on the conditions in the policy which rendered it void, and the record failing to disclose that the conditions were not printed in the type prescribed by the statute, the presumption was that the policy conformed to the statutory requirement. Sulphur Mines Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co., 94 Va. 355, 26 S. E. Rep. 856.

ss. Material Alteration in Note.—The objection that a material alteration has been made in a note in suit cannot be made for the first time in the appellate court. Tate v. Bank, 96 Va. 765, 32 S. E. Rep. 476.

tt. To Promise in a Note to Pay Attorney's Fees.—Where for the first time the point is raised in the court of appeals that a promise in a note to pay, in case of a suit, five per cent. collection fees and fifty dollars attorney's fee, is an unenforceable penalty within the ruling of Rixey v. Pearre Bros. & Co., 89 Va. 118, 15 S. E. Rep. 498, it was held that it was too late to raise the point. Ronald v. Bank of Princeton, 90 Va. 813, 20 S. E. Rep. 780.

uu. Absence of Indorsement of Appeal on Justice's Warrant.—It is too late after conviction in the county court for the accused to except to the absence of any endorsement of an appeal on the warrant by the justice. Harrison v. Com., 81 Va. 491.

vv. That Assignment of Assets by Directors to Pay Individual Debts Are Void.—Objection that an assignment of assets made by the directors to pay debts for which they are individually bound, is void, under Code 1873, ch. 57, § 18, which provides that, "No member of the board shall vote on a question in which he is interested, otherwise than as a stockholder," must be made in the court below, and cannot be raised for the first time in the appellate court. Planters Bank of Farmville v. Whittle, 78 Va. 737.

ww. That Conveyance Is Fraudulent.—Where it was not charged in the court below that a conveyance was fraudulent, such charge cannot, for the first time, be made in the court of appeals. Pracht v. Lange, 81 Va. 711; Vance v. Kirk, 29 W. Va. 344, 1 S. E. Rep. 717.

xx. Judicial Sales.

Failure to Enquire Whether Partition Could Be Made.—In a suit for partition, the court has no authority to order a sale of land unless it is made to appear by an enquiry before a commissioner, or otherwise, that partition cannot be made in some of the modes provided by the 2nd and 3d sections of ch. 128, of the Code. But when it did not so appear, and no such enquiry was asked in the court below, a party who prosecuted the suit and at whose instance the decree was made, will not be allowed to raise the objection for the first time in the appellate court. Howery v. Helms, 20 Gratt. 1.

Failure to Enquire as to Sufficiency of Rents and Profits.—Where an interlocutory decree directs a sale of lands to satisfy a debt, in a case where it might have been proper to decree satisfaction out of the rents and profits; but this was not a point controverted in the court below, or in any way brought to the notice of the court, and, though the party had ample opportunity to apply to the court to alter the decree in that particular, he did not apply for such alteration; upon appeal to the court of appeals it was held that the decree should not be reversed for such cause, but affirmed, and the cause remanded, with direction to alter the decree, and direct satisfaction out of the rents and profits, if such alterations were asked, and if the debt could be satisfied out of the rents and profits within a reasonable time. Manns v. Flinn, 10 Leigh 93.

yy. Lack of Evidence.

Of Acceptance of a Promise.—It cannot be objected in the appellate court that there is no evidence that a promise has been accepted where no objection on the ground appears in the bill of exceptions to have been made below. Colgin v. Henley, 6 Leigh 85.

Of Execution of an Order.—A plaintiff in equity files with his bill, as the ground of his claim, an order on one of the defendants, which has not been accepted. No proof of the execution of the order is given, but its genuineness is not questioned in the court below, and it is made the basis of a decree in favor of the plaintiff. It is too late to make objection in the appellate court, to the want of proof of the order. James River & Kanawha Co. v. Littlejohn, 18 Gratt. 53.

Making or Endorsement of Bill of Exchange.—Where no proof of the making or indorsement of a bill of exchange, under which plaintiffs claim as equitable assignees of a legacy, is called for in the court below, objection to the want of such evidence cannot be taken in the appellate court. Anderson v. De Soer, 6 Gratt. 763.

Of Identity of Note Sued on.—It cannot be assigned as error for the first time upon a second appeal that the note set up in the suit is not the one mentioned in a deed of trust, where they have been treated as the same by the court below and on the first appeal and have been so treated by all the parties as a result of the pleadings. Atkinson v. Beckett, 36 W. Va. 438, 15 S. E. Rep. 179.

Of Demand on Sheriff.—Objection cannot be made for the first time in the appellate court that a demand had not been made upon a sheriff in a proceeding by motion against a sheriff and his sureties. Cook v. Hays, 9 Gratt. 142.

zz. Compelling Proof of Signature without Affidavit.—When, on trial of a petition and bill of review, filed by defendants, after decree rendered in an action against an administrator and heirs to recover on certain bonds of deceased for unpaid purchase money, on the ground of the discovery of an alleged receipt for a part payment on the bonds, which plaintiffs claim was a forgery, and the genuineness of which they dispute in their answer to said petition, under oath, and the strictest proof is called for, and its genuineness treated by the petitioners throughout as disputed, and by the court, which refers the question to a master, who reports adversely to it, and neither in the exceptions to the report, nor throughout the proceedings in the court below, is it objected that the issue of genuineness was not properly raised, the defendant petitioners cannot avail themselves on appeal, of the objection that the court could not require them to prove the signature to said receipt, in the absence of the affidavit required by Code Va. 1873, ch. 167, § 39, where a substantial compliance is shown with the requirement of the statute. Harnsberger v. Cochran, 82 Va. 727, 1 S. E. Rep. 120.

aaa. A Party's Right to Act as Administrator.—It is too late to object in the court of appeals, that one who has been allowed by the court below to file a bill of revivor as administrator d. b. n. c. t. a. and in whose name the cause has proceeded, is not such administrator in fact. List v. Pumphrey, 8 W. Va. 672.

bbb. Allowance of Commissions.—Where an administrator fails to settle his accounts in the time required by the statute, but is nevertheless allowed a commission during the time of such failure by a commissioner, though no exception is taken thereto in the court below, it may be objected to in the appellate court. Estill v. McClintic, 11 W. Va. 399.

ccc. Order of Liability.—Where in a suit by a guardian to sell his ward's lands a rule was made against the purchaser to show cause why the land should not be resold, the purchase money having been paid to an unbonded commissioner and expended by the guardian without authority, and it is decreed that they pay into court the amount of their purchase or that the land be resold, it is too late to object for the first time in the court of appeals that the guardian and his sureties should have been first exhausted before proceeding against the purchaser. Whitehead v. Bradley, 87 Va. 676, 13 S. E. Rep. 196.

ddd. Failure to Record Finding of Indictment.—The objection that the finding of an indictment was not recorded may be made for the first time in the appellate court. Simmons v. Com., 89 Va. 156, 15 S. E. Rep. 386; Shiffet v. Com., 14 Gratt. 652.

eee. Lack of Authority in Administrators to Sell Land.—A bill filed by administrators for the purpose of enforcing a contract made by them for the sale of their decedent's land which fails to allege their authority to sell the land, and to which the heirs of the owner are not made parties, is bad on demurrer. But if the purchaser makes no objection to these defects, and answers, setting up a defence on the merits, he cannot make the objection for the first time in the court of appeals, especially when it appears from a deed filed as an escrow with the bill that the heirs authorized the sale, were parties to the contract of sale, and made a deed to the purchaser with covenants of general warranty to be delivered to him when all the purchase money is paid. Matney v. Ratliff, 96 Va. 231, 31 S. E. Rep. 512.

fff. Agent Interested on Both Sides.—An objection that an agent for the sale of land, who became a joint purchaser with defendants, was also interested on behalf of the vendor cannot be made for the first time on appeal. Anderson v. Creston Land Co., 96 Va. 257, 31 S. E. Rep. 82.

H. SETTING UP CLAIMS FOR THE FIRST TIME IN APPELLATE COURT.—The administrator of an intestate is also guardian of one of the distributees. Upon the termination of the guardianship, a bill is filed against the guardian and his sureties, to recover what is due upon the guardianship account. An amended bill is afterwards filed against the administrator and his sureties, to recover what is due on the administration account. Reports are made of both accounts. But, for reasons appearing to the court, the guardianship account is recommitted; and then, by consent of parties, the administration account is also recommitted. A further report is made upon the guardianship account, and none upon the administration account. Whereupon the cause is heard as to the guardian and his sureties, upon the further report so made, and a decree is entered against them for the sum deemed by the court to be due upon the guardianship account. From this decree an appeal is taken by a party interested to get rid of or reduce the amount. In the appellate court it is urged by the appellee, that the balance stated as due on the guardian's account should be augmented, by incorporating in it the appellee's share of the balance due on the administration account. Held, this claim cannot be sustained, because no claim was made in the court below by the appellee, to bring into the guardianship account any charge against the guardian arising out of the administration account. Williamson v. Howard, 2 Rob. 39.

Right to Land Set Up by Caveator.—A right to land set up by a caveator in his petition for appeal, but not set up in the court below, cannot be considered by the appellate court. Trotter v. Newton, 30 Gratt. 582.

Claim to Subrogation.—A claim for subrogation being for affirmative relief, cannot be made for the first time in the appellate court. Building Ass'n v. Reed, 96 Va. 345, 31 S. E. Rep. 514.

I. AFFIRMANCE.

1. GENERALLY.—A decree is presumed to be right, and the party appealing must show error. It is not sufficient for the appellate court to doubt the correctness of the decision. It must be satisfied, in order to reverse, that there is error. Shipman v. Fletcher, 91 Va. 473, 22 S. E. Rep. 458; Smith v. Smith, 92 Va. 696, 24 S. E. Rep. 280; Atlantic, etc., R. Co. v. Del. Con. Co., 98 Va. 503, 37 S. E. Rep. 13; Yoke v. Shay, 47 W. Va. 40, 34 S. E. Rep. 748; Spurgen v. Spurgen, 47 W. Va. 38, 34 S. E. Rep. 750; Whipkey v. Nicholas, 47 W. Va. 35, 34 S. E. Rep. 751; Camden v. Dewing, 47 W. Va. 310, 34 S. E. Rep. 911; Hickman v. Painter, 11 W. Va. 386; Douglas v. Spoor, 89 Va. 270, 15 S. E. Rep. 550; Porter v. Christian, 88 Va. 730, 14 S. E. Rep. 183.

Where the court below has upon the evidence determined a question of fact, the court of appeals will not overturn its decision except in cases of manifest error or misconduct. Glaize v. Glaize, 79 Va. 429; Womack v. Tankersley, 78 Va. 242; Shaffer v. Shaffer (W. Va.), 41 S. E. Rep. 166.

Effect on Previous Decrees.—An affirmance of a subsequent decree operates as an affirmance of all prior decrees rendered in the cause which have not been previously reversed. Burton v. Brown, 22 Gratt. 1.

2. WHERE EVIDENCE IS CONFLICTING.—Where the decree sought to be reversed is based upon depositions which are so conflicting, and of such a doubtful and unsatisfactory character, that different minds and different judges might reasonably disagree as to the facts proved by them, or the proper conclusion to be deduced therefrom, the appellate court will decline to reverse the decree, although the testimony may be such that the appellate court might have rendered a different decree if it had acted on the cause in the first instance. Pritchard v. Evans, 31 W. Va. 137, 5 S. E. Rep. 461; Fitzgerald v. Phelps, etc., Co., 42 W. Va. 570, 26 S. E. Rep. 315; Smith v. Yoke, 27 W. Va. 639; Chrislip v. Teter, 43 W. Va. 356, 27 S. E. Rep. 268; Naughton v. Taylor, 50 W. Va. 233, 40 S. E. Rep. 852; Bartlett v. Cleavenger, 35 W. Va. 719, 14 S. E. Rep. 273.

But where the great preponderance of evidence is against the decree, it will be reversed. Rather v. Rather, 88 Va. 875, 14 S. E. Rep. 626.

The court of appeals will not reverse the action of the trial court overruling an exception to a commissioner's report where the evidence is conflicting, and the court cannot see that error has been committed. Triplett v. Woodward, 98 Va. 187, 35 S. E. Rep. 455.

A question of fact determined by a commissioner upon contradictory evidence, and approved by the lower court, cannot be disturbed on appeal, unless the error be palpable. Magarity v. Succop, 90 Va. 561, 19 S. E. Rep. 260; Cann v. Cann, 45 W. Va. 563, 31 S. E. Rep. 923.

In an insurance case where the case is submitted to the court, and the evidence as to the value of the property insured is conflicting, the appellate court cannot interfere with the judgment of the court below on the ground that the judgment is excessive. Southern Mutual Ins. Co. v. Kloeber, 31 Gratt. 739.

When a question of fact is referred to a jury, depending upon the testimony of witnesses conflicting in their statements, and is passed upon by them, and approved by the trial court, unless there be palpable error, the court of appeals must affirm, as, when conflicting statements are made, there is no safe method by which the court can decide between them, seen on paper. It cannot pass upon the credibility of witnesses, or the weight of conflicting testimony, and reverse the trial court, except when the error is palpable and obvious, and the result is without evidence to support it, or plainly against the evidence. Barbour v. Melendy, 88 Va. 525, 14 S. E. Rep. 326.

But where, on the undisputed fixed facts, the verdict is contrary to the evidence, the supreme court can reverse it as contrary to law. Manss-Bruning Shoe Mfg. Co. v. Prince (W. Va.), 41 S. E. Rep. 907.

3. DECISION SUBSTANTIALLY RIGHT.—Though the opinion of the court below appear to be confined to one point, yet if it appear upon the whole record, that the judgment is substantially right, it must be affirmed. Davies v. Miller, 1 Call 127.

Wrong or Insufficient Reason for Decision.—It is not necessary to assign in a decree any reason for the decision, and, if a decree is substantially right, it should be affirmed, although the court below may have given an insufficient reason for its judgment. Ballard v. Chewning, 49 W. Va. 508, 39 S. E. Rep. 170.

Where the decree appealed from is right, the same will not be reversed because the circuit court was incorrect in its reasons for its conclusion. Lee v. Patton, 50 W. Va. 20, 40 S. E. Rep. 353; Boyd v. Cleg-horn, 94 Va. 780, 27 S. E. Rep. 574; Newell v. Wood, 1 Munf. 555; Shrewsbury v. Miller, 10 W. Va. 115.

This only applies where there has been a hearing on the merits, and not when the court refuses to hear at all; for the court of appeals will only consider the questions determined by the circuit court. Clark v. Sayers, 48 W. Va. 83, 35 S. E. Rep. 882.

Adding Explanation.—The court of appeals in affirming a decree, will add any explanation which may be necessary to make it correctly understood. Mayo v. Purcell, 3 Munf. 243.

4. AMENDMENT.

By Consent of Parties.—Where, after an appeal has been allowed in a cause, by consent of parties, a decree is made, modifying, in one respect, the decree appealed from, the appellate court may amend the decree appealed from in that respect and affirm it. Peters v. Neville, 26 Gratt. 549.

To Prevent Delay.—Where the accounts have been discussed, for a long time, in the court of chancery before and after an appeal and have become intricate from the manner of stating them, if a bill of review be applied for to the last decree of the court of chancery purporting to be made in conformity to the decree of the court of appeals, and leave to file the bill be refused, the court of appeals will correct what is erroneous in the report of the commissioner, acting under its own decree, and affirm the residue, in order to prevent further delay, although the affirmance may possibly be injurious in some instances. Ambler v. Macon, 4 Call 605.

For Conformity.—Where there is a judgment in the name of the plaintiff for the benefit of a third party, and plaintiff files a bill in his own name to enforce the lien of the judgment upon land, without making the latter a party, and there is no objection to this in the circuit court, and the decree is in favor of the plaintiff, this is not error; but for conformity it may be amended by the appellate court and affirmed. Hale v. Horne, 21 Gratt. 112.

Harmless Errors.—Where innocent errors are committed by the circuit court,—not sufficient to justify the reversal of its judgment—the judgment will be amended and affirmed. Doheny v. Atlantic Dynamite Co., 41 W. Va. 1, 23 S. E. Rep. 525.

Clerical Errors.—The appellate court will not reverse a judgment for a mere clerical error which might have been corrected in the court below, or by the judge, in vacation, upon motion; but will amend and affirm the judgment, if there is no other error. Tyree v. Donnally, 9 Gratt. 64.

In the court below, there having been a clerical misprision in decreeing jointly against two defendants as administrators of a decedent, when the pleadings indicated that one of them was sole administrator, and the decree for costs having through oversight been entered against him, as well as against certain heirs of the deceased, de bonis pro- gratia, the appellate court amended the decree in these particulars. Blessing v. Beatty, 1 Rob. 287.

Dismissal of Bill.—Where a judge in vacation not only makes an order dissolving an injunction, as he has a right to do, Code 1860, ch. 179, § 12, but goes further and dismisses the bill, as he has no authority to do, the latter order will be expunged and the decree affirmed as amended. Muller v. Bayly, 21 Gratt. 521.

Where the court below decrees a sum of money in favor of defendant, and dismisses the bill, and upon appeal by plaintiff, the court of appeals affirms the money decree, it will correct that part dismissing the bill, and affirm the decree with costs. Kraker v. Shields, 20 Gratt. 377.

Absolute Dismissal.—So when the appellant's bill was dismissed absolutely, when it should have been dismissed without prejudice, the decree will be merely corrected and affirmed. Jones v. Pilcher, 6 Munf. 425; Stott v. Baskerville, 6 Munf. 20; Rootes v. Holliday, 6 Munf. 251; Ellis v. Baird, 6 Munf. 456. See also, Rankin v. Bradford, 1 Leigh 163; Lewis v. Billips, 1 Leigh 358; Stuart v. Pennis, 2 Va. Dec. 667.

Failure to Dismiss.—If, in a decree of a superior court of chancery, reversing that of a county court, there be no error, but an omission to direct the bill to be dismissed, the court of appeals will affirm the decree and add the proper direction. Hefner v. Miller, 2 Munf. 42.

Declaring Conveyance Void Absolutely and Not as to Creditors Only.—When a decree declares a conveyance void and sets it aside absolutely when it should have done so only as to the creditors, whose debts were contracted before the conveyance, the decree will be corrected in this respect, but not reversed. Linsey v. McGannon, 9 W. Va. 154.

Omission of Credit.—A commissioner having by mistake omitted a credit in ascertaining the amount due upon a bond, the appellate court will correct the decree in this respect, and affirm it with costs. Tazewell v. Saunders, 13 Gratt. 354.

In Boyce v. Smith, 9 Gratt. 704, a decree was corrected on the admission of the bill, by the allowance of a credit, and thus affirmed.

Omission to Dispose of Small Sum in Decree.—A commissioner's report made in the cause showing that there is a small sum in the hands of an administrator, which the court below omitted to decree to be paid to the creditors in exoneration pro tanto of a certain person, the court will amend the decree in this respect, and affirm it with costs to the appellees. Williamson v. Goodwyn, 9 Gratt. 503.

Mistake as to Amount Shown Due by Report.—Where the lower court mistakes the amount shown to be due by a commissioner's report, the appellate court will merely correct the decree and affirm it with costs to appellee. Kent v. Matthews, 12 Leigh 590.

Failure to Require Refunding Bond.—Where a decree in favor of a legatee against an executor omits to require a refunding bond, this is not an error for which the decree will be reversed, but where it is apparent that such error resulted entirely from inadvertence, an appellate court, if the decree be correct in other respects, will affirm it so far as it has gone with costs to the appellee and then will proceed to make such further decree in relation to a refunding bond as the court below ought to have made. Handly v. Snodgrass, 9 Leigh 484.

Larger Damages Than Declaration Calls for.—Upon appeal from a judgment rendered for more than the amount of damages laid in the declaration, the appellate court may correct and affirm the judgment. Lewis v. Arnold, 13 Gratt. 454.

Absence of Parties.—Although the lower court errs in directing a sale of land, when the heirs of the vendor are not before the court, yet where they have only the bare legal title, and there is no obstacle to obtaining such title, the decree will be amended so as to require said heirs to be brought before the court by some proper proceeding before sale is made and so affirmed. Mott v. Carter, 26 Gratt. 127.

Failure to Reserve Liberty to Apply to Court.—Where a decree fails to reserve liberty to the plaintiff to apply by motion on petition for the sale of property if a personal decree fail to produce the money, the appellate court will correct the decree in this respect and affirm it. Kraker v. Shields, 20 Gratt. 377.

Failure to Provide for Account.—A commissioner settling accounts, between tenants in common in a lead mine, reports a considerable sum as due from plaintiffs to defendant, and then says—"The complainants will hereafter render an account of a remnant of the business in their hands." There are exceptions by both parties to the accounts as stated; but the court overrules all the exceptions, confirms the report, and makes a final decree in favor of the defendant. It being not probable that the further account referred to by the commissioner will lessen the amount due the defendant, if there be no other error, the appellate court may amend the decree by providing for the further account, and affirm it. Graham v. Pierce, 19 Gratt. 28.

Failure to Direct Release.—The appellate court being of opinion that what was declared in a decree would, by necessary implication, relieve the certain heirs from responsibility for certain land, but that it would have been more regular to direct a release of that land, will decree such release accordingly. And the decree, being thus amended, will be affirmed. Blessing v. Beatty, 1 Rob. 287.

Failure to Direct Excluded Evidence to Be Received.—If a superior court of common law, in reversing a judgment and awarding a new trial, assign the reason to be that certain evidence should have been received on the former trial, but fail to direct that, upon the new trial, such evidence shall be received, the court of appeals, in affirming its judgment, will add the proper direction concerning the evidence. Brooke v. Shelly, 4 H. & M. 266.

General Judgment Where Some Counts Are Faulty.—There being three counts in a presentment, and the jury having found the defendant guilty on the first count and assessed his fine, and not guilty on the second and third counts, the judgment should be for the commonwealth on the first count, and for the defendant on the second and third counts.

In such case there having been a general judgment for the commonwealth, the court of appeals will amend and affirm it. Sledd v. Com., 19 Gratt. 813.

5. DAMAGES.

Act Not Retroactive.—The act of the 20th of January, 1804, which gives damages and interest on the affirmance of appeals from decrees in chancery, does not apply to appeals depending at its commencement. Beatty v. Smith, 2 H. & M. 395.

The act of assembly allowing damages on the affirmance of decrees in chancery, does not authorize the recovery of such damages of a security in a bond bearing date before that act. Woodson v. Johns, 3 Munf. 230.

A petition for an appeal having been presented to the court before the 1st of July, 1850, though the appeal was not allowed until after that date, no damages are to be allowed upon affirming the judgment. Price v. Kyle, 9 Gratt. 247.

When Not Allowed against Personal Representative.—Where the appellant dies, and the appeal being revived against his executor, the judgment is affirmed. Damages ought not to be awarded against the proper estate of the executor, in case of deficiency of that of the testator. Hudson v. Ross, 1 Wash. 74.

Decree for Costs Merely.—Damages ought not to be given upon the affirmance of a decree dismissing a bill with costs, such decree not being rendered "for any sum of money or quantity of tobacco," except the costs. See Acts of 1808, ch. 116, Ed. 1808, ch. 29, § 2, p. 29; R. C. 1819, ch. 66, § 59, p. 208; Williamson v. Bowie, 6 Munf. 176.

Judgment for a Fine.—The statute allowing damages on affirmance (Acts of 1830-31, ch. 11, § 82, Suppl. to R. C. p. 149) does not apply to the affirmance of a judgment imposing an amercement or fine; the amercement or fine not being a debt or damages, within the meaning of that act. But though the judgment of affirmance in such case award damages according to law for retarding the execution, yet as no specific damages are thereby adjudged, and the law gives none, the error is merely formal, and the appellate court will disregard it. Abrahams v. Com., 1 Rob. 675.

J. REVERSAL.

1. GENERAL RULE.—Where an appellate court reverses the decision of the lower court, "it shall enter such judgment, decree or order as the court whose error is sought to be corrected, ought to have entered." Walker v. Page, 21 Gratt. 636, 652; Arrington v. Cheatham, 2 Rob. 492; Darby v. Henderson, 3 Munf. 115; Mantz v. Hendley, 2 H. & M. 308; Blane v. Sansum, 2 Call 495; Janey v. Blake, 8 Leigh 88; Baird v. Mattox, 1 Call 257; Smith v. Walker, 1 Wash. 135; Hill v. Harvey, 2 Munf. 525; Machine Works v. Craig, 18 W. Va. 559.

Where a paper signed and endorsed in blank, is filled up as a common promissory note, and value paid for it, and, pending an action against the endorser, the endorsement is filled up as a guaranty, but it is counted on both as an original promise and a guaranty, and there is a judgment for the defendant on a case agreed, on appeal the judgment will be reversed, and a judgment given against him as an original surety, without sending the case back to have the endorsement erased and filled up as an original promise. Orrick v. Colston, 7 Gratt. 189.

On Demurrer to Evidence.—If the lower court sets aside a demurrer to evidence and awards a new trial, the demurrant may appeal, and the court of appeals will set aside such judgment and enter such judgment as the lower court should have entered. Knox v. Garland, 2 Call 242. See also, monographic note on "Demurrer to the Evidence" appended to Tutt v. Slaughter, 5 Gratt. 364.

Cause Tried by the Court.—Where a cause is tried by the court in lieu of a jury, if the court of appeals should come to the conclusion that the judgment of the court below was plainly erroneous, it will not remand the case for a new trial, unless under the circumstances the court below ought to have awarded a new trial, but will render such judgment upon the law and evidence as the court below should have rendered. Nutter v. Sydenstricker, 11 W. Va. 535. See monographic note on "Juries" appended to Chahoon v. Com., 20 Gratt. 733.

On Motion in Arrest of Judgment.—After verdict for the plaintiff, the defendant moves for a new trial, and also in arrest of judgment. The court below, without deciding upon the motion for a new trial, is of opinion for the defendant upon the motion in arrest, and enters judgment in his favor, which is reversed in an appellate court. That court, upon overruling the motion in arrest, will not send the cause back for a decision upon the motion for a new trial but will proceed to give final judgment for the plaintiff. Sims v. Alderson, 8 Leigh 479.

On Demurrer.—Where a demurrer to a plea is sustained in the lower court and judgment given for the plaintiff, the court of appeals, if of opinion that the demurrer should have been overruled will enter judgment for the defendant. Wilson v. Bank, 6 Leigh 570; Hite v. Long, 6 Rand. 457; Lewis v. Weldon, 8 Rand. 71. See monographic note on "Demurrers" appended to Com. v. Jackson, 2 Va. Cas. 501.

Decree Refusing Bill of Review.—Where a bill of review or petition for rehearing is dismissed in the circuit court, and an appeal is taken, the court of appeals may correct the error complained of without sending the cause back to allow the bill of review or petition to be heard. Bank v. Shirley, 26 W. Va. 563.

Where Bill Should Have Been Dismissed.—Where upon appeal, the appellate court holds that the bill should have been dismissed by the lower court, it will enter a decree dismissing the bill. Saunders v. Griggs, 81 Va. 506.

Greater Damages Than Pleadings Call for.—Where verdict and judgment are rendered for a greater amount than is warranted by the declaration, though the appellate court will reverse the judgment, it will not direct a new trial if the plaintiff below will release the excess, but will enter judgment for the proper amount. Gibson v. Stewart, 11 Leigh 600.

The court below having given judgment for the plaintiff in a scire facias against bail, for too large an amount, the court of appeals will reverse the judgment and enter judgment for the proper sum. Bowyer v. Hewitt, 2 Gratt. 193.

Where a decree is reversed because founded on matters not stated in the bill, if it appears from the record that the bill cannot be amended so as to justify any decree thereon, the bill will be dismissed. Bier v. Smith, 25 W. Va. 830.

2. WHEN CAUSE WILL BE REMANDED.

Where No Inquiry into Merits in Lower Court.—Where the circuit court has not acted on the merits of the case but dismissed it for supposed want of jurisdiction, it is not proper for the supreme court of appeals to consider the case on its merits; but should remand it to the circuit court to be there proceeded with in accordance with its directions. Bd. of Ed. v. Hopkins, 19 W. Va. 89.

Want of Proper Parties.—Where a plaintiff in equity has shown no right to relief, and his bill is dismissed, an appellate court will not reverse the decree, to enable him to introduce new parties, and thereby make a new case upon the merits. Where the plaintiff has shown a right to relief against parties before the court, but has omitted to make other necessary parties, there the bill will not be dismissed; but he will be permitted to amend his bill, and add the necessary parties. And in such a case, the appellate court, if there be a defect of parties, will send the case back to the court below. Jameson v. Deshields, 3 Gratt. 4; Londons v. Echols, 17 Gratt.

15; Graves v. Hedrick, 44 W. Va. 550, 29 S. E. Rep. 1013; Cunningham v. Patteson, 3 Rand. 66; Miller v. Morrison, 47 W. Va. 664, 35 S. E. Rep. 905; Gall v. Gall, 50 W. Va. 523, 40 S. E. Rep. 380.

On an appeal from an interlocutory decree, if proper parties appear to be wanting, the court of appeals will not leave it to the chancellor but will itself direct such parties to be made. Hooper v. Royster, 1 Munf. 119.

Judgment on Demurrer.

Sustained in Lower Court.—Where the inferior court properly sustains a demurrer to a declaration, and enters judgment in the action for the defendant, without giving leave to the plaintiff to amend, the court of appeals will, if the defect in the declaration appears to be amendable, reverse the judgment, and remand the case, with directions to grant leave to the plaintiff to amend if he elects to do so. But if, in such case, the record shows that the plaintiff declined to amend his declaration, then this court will not reverse the judgment, although it distinctly appears that the defect in the declaration could have been readily amended if the plaintiff had chosen to do so, but the judgment will be affirmed. Rigg v. Parsons, 29 W. Va. 522, 2 S. E. Rep. 81.

Where plaintiffs demur to pleas, and the demurrer is sustained, but upon appeal the judgment is reversed, the cause will be sent back with directions to permit the plaintiffs to withdraw the demurrer and reply, if they shall ask leave to do so. Hamtramck v. Selden, 12 Gratt. 28.

Where the trial court has, upon the prayer of a defendant, treated his answer (to which no replication has been filed) as a cross bill, and, subsequently, has erroneously sustained a demurrer to such cross bill, and treated the paper so filed as eliminated from the record for all purposes, the court of appeals although reversing the ruling on the demurrer, will not give the defendant the relief to which he would have been entitled as upon an answer to which there was no replication, but will remand the cause to the trial court, with leave to the complainants to answer the cross bill, and set up their defence, if any they may have. Spoor v. Tilson, 97 Va. 279, 23 S. E. Rep. 609.

Overruled in Lower Court.—Where a demurrer to a declaration, overruled in the lower court is sustained in the appellate court, the cause will be remanded with leave to the plaintiff to amend. Fitzhugh v. Fitzhugh, 11 Gratt. 300; Strange v. Floyd, 9 Gratt. 474. See monographic note on "Demurrers" appended to Com. v. Jackson, 2 Va. Cas. 501.

When a bill contains sufficient allegations for one character of relief sought, and insufficient for others, and the circuit court overrules a demurrer thereto, and grants relief to the full extent of the prayer of such bill, the court of appeals will reverse the decrees entered, sustain the demurrer in part, and remand the cause, with leave to the plaintiff to amend. Billingsley v. Menear, 44 W. Va. 651, 30 S. E. Rep. 61.

Where on a demurrer to the evidence by the defendant, the facts proven sustain the case of the plaintiff, but it is so defectively stated in the declaration that the court, on the demurrer to the declaration, ought to have sustained the demurrer, the court of appeals should set aside the judgment for the plaintiff, and remand the cause, with directions that the plaintiff have leave to amend his declaration, if advised so to do. Quarrier v. Ins. Co., 10 W. Va. 509.

Where Appellate Court Has No Jurisdiction.—Where an inferior appellate court entertains an appeal in a case over which it has no jurisdiction and reverses the judgment of the lower court, a higher appellate court on appeal will reverse the judgment of the inferior appellate court without examining into the merits, itself not having jurisdiction of such cases. Cooper v. Saunders, 1 H. & M. 418.

The judge of a circuit court, having no authority to render a final decree in vacation, upon an appeal from such decree, the appellate court will not dismiss the appeal, but will take jurisdiction so far and so far only as to reverse the decree and remand the cause to the circuit court, there to be proceeded with according to the rules of courts of equity. Monroe v. Bartlett, 6 W. Va. 441; Rollins v. Fisher, 17 W. Va. 578.

So where a judge has entered a decree rendered by another judge not authorized to decide the case. Johnson v. Young, 11 W. Va. 678.

Cause Prematurely Heard.—Where a case is prematurely heard and decided in the lower court and an erroneous decision rendered, while the decree must be reversed, the cause will be remanded with leave to the plaintiff to file an amended bill. Harrison v. Loneberger, 11 W. Va. 175.

Cause Prematurely Dismissed.—When a circuit court prematurely dismisses an action, the judgment will be reversed, and the case remanded, to be tried in accordance with the rules of law and principles governing courts of justice. Junkins v. Hamilton Lumber Co., 44 W. Va. 641, 29 S. E. Rep. 1017.

Failure to Allow Continuance.—Where a judgment is reversed for failure to grant a continuance in a proper case, the appellate court should not enter final judgment, but should send the cause back for a new hearing. Clements v. Powell, 9 Leigh 1.

Excessive Damages.—If it appears to the appellate court that the verdict of the jury and the judgment of the trial court are plainly right, except only that the amount is excessive, and the record shows plainly the amount of such excess, the judgment will be reversed and set aside, and the cause remanded to the trial court, with instructions to put the successful party on terms to release the excess or to award a new trial, and, if such excess is released, to enter judgment for the corrected amount. Buena Vista Co. v. McCandlish, 92 Va. 297, 23 S. E. Rep. 781.

Where Lower Court Failed to Decide All the Questions.—If the defendant is sued as heir and devisee, and pleads that he hath no "assets by descent," on which the plaintiff takes issue, and a verdict be found for the defendant, a repleader will be awarded by the appellate court, though not prayed in the court below; because the issue has only tried the right as to the descent but not as to the devise. Baird v. Mattox, 1 Call 257.

Decree Disregarding Commissioner's Report.—When a circuit court wholly disregards a commissioner's report and numerous exceptions thereto, and enters a decree on an entirely different basis from that presented in such report, and the court of appeals, reverses such decree, it will remand the cause to the circuit court, with directions to pass upon and dispose of such exceptions seriatim, and either to reform or recommit such report. Holt v. Holt, 46 W. Va. 397, 35 S. E. Rep. 19.

Where It Appears That Defects May Be Remedied.

Want of Evidence.—Where a judgment creditor, in his bill to enforce his judgment lien, alleges that he filed as part of his bill copies of his judgment and of the lien docket marked "Exhibit B" and "C," but "Exhibit B," the copy of the judgment, is not found among the papers, or copied as part of the record, it is so probable that "Exhibit B" never was filed, but exists, and it is so necessary to a just decision of the cause, that the court of appeals will remand the case to the court below in order that the plaintiff may have an opportunity to supply said exhibit. Love v. Tinsley, 32 W. Va. 25, 9 S. E. Rep. 44.

Where a decree for plaintiff was reversed by the court of appeals because the allegations of the bill were not proved by competent evidence, it appearing probable that the defect could be supplied, the cause was remanded to the inferior court, to afford plaintiff opportunity of adducing other proof. Sitlington v. Brown, 7 Leigh 271.

A court of chancery directs issues of fact to be tried at law, without evidence regularly taken before the court, touching the facts to which the issues relate; but there was evidence, which, if regular, would have rendered the order for the issues proper. Held, that if the appellate court should set aside the issues, for being, in the actual state of the case, improperly ordered, it should, under such circumstances, remand the cause to the court of chancery, where the evidence may be regularly taken, and thereupon the issues ordered anew. Watkins v. Carlton, 10 Leigh 560.

While a bill would ordinarily be dismissed, for failure to produce necessary evidence on a point in a case, yet where this is largely due to the conduct of the defendants, the cause will be remanded for further proceedings. Darnall v. Smith, 26 Gratt. 878.

Where a bill filed to subject heirs to the payment of the bond of their ancestor, does not allege that the heirs are bound in the bond: but makes the bond an exhibit with the bill, and the answer does not admit or deny that the heirs are bound in the bond; and before the cause is heard the bond is lost out of the papers in the cause, but there is proof of the existence of the bond, but no proofs on the question whether the heirs were bound by it; nor is that question made in the court below: but a decree is made against the heir, it was held that although the court of appeals would reverse the decree for want of proof that the heir was bound, the cause would be sent back to give the plaintiff an opportunity to amend his bill, and show that the heir was bound in the bond. Piper v. Douglas, 3 Gratt. 371.

Where the circuit court sustains exceptions to depositions, and erroneously excludes material and important evidence before passing on the case, and then finds contrary to what its decision might have been, had such evidence not been excluded, the court of appeals will reverse the case for such erroneous ruling alone, and remand it for further proceedings. Farmers' Bank of Fairmont v. Gould, 42 W. Va. 132, 24 S. E. Rep. 547.

Where plaintiff in equity sets up claim against a mercantile house, and the only question put in issue is, whether the house is liable, or only an individual member of it, and plaintiff obtains a decree against the house; and, on appeal, the decree is reversed, because, in the opinion of appellate court, there is no proof of the liability of the house, but only of the individual partner; the appellate court will not remand the cause as to all the parties, in order to give plaintiff opportunity to adduce further proof of the liability of the house, but will dismiss the bill as to the partners held not liable, and remand the cause for further proceedings against the partner only who is liable. Cunningham v. Smithson, 12 Leigh 33.

Where the contract proved varies from that set up in the bill, and the contract proved is clear and certain in its terms, and is such as a court of equity might properly enforce, and the court below decrees a specific execution of the contract set out in the bill, the decree must be reversed; but the appellate court will not dismiss the bill, but will remand the cause to the court below, to put the plaintiff to his election, whether to have a specific performance of the "contract as proved," or to have the same rescinded, and the parties put in statu quo. Baldenberg v. Warden, 14 W. Va. 397.

Where a bill of review of a decree for errors of law is dismissed by the court of chancery, and the decree dismissing the bill of review is reversed by the court of appeals, and the original decree reversed, but it appears that the plaintiff in the original cause may have a just claim, the original cause will be remanded for further proceedings. Thornton v. Stewart, 7 Leigh 128. See also, Clark v. Sayres, 48 W. Va. 33, 35 S. E. Rep. 882.

Where the court of appeals reverses the judgment of the lower court overruling a motion for judgment on a forthcoming bond on the ground that the bond is informal and defective, it should not enter judgment for the appellant unless it appears that the defendant had no other defence to make to the bond than that upon which the appellate court has decided. Irvin v. Eldridge, 1 Wash. 161; Lewis v. Thompson, 2 H. & M. 100; Anderson v. Leitch, 1 Leigh 462.

Declaration Defective.—When a declaration is defective and the judgment upon it is therefore reversed, and yet the declaration shows a just demand, if properly asserted, plaintiff will not be turned out of the court, but the cause will be remanded for further and correct proceedings. Shelton v. Welsh, 7 Leigh 175.

Bill Insufficient.—Where the bill is insufficient, but the proof shows the plaintiff is entitled to relief upon the cause of action imperfectly stated in the bill, and the decree is reversed, the cause will be remanded, with leave to amend the bill. McClain v. Batton, 50 W. Va. 121, 40 S. E. Rep. 509.

Suing in Wrong Character.—If the plaintiff has an interest in the subject of a suit, though he has sued in a wrong character, the appellate court, whilst it will reverse a decree in his favor, will not dismiss the bill, but will send it back that it may be amended as to the parties. Sillings v. Bumgardner, 9 Gratt. 273.

Failure of Nonresident to Give Security in Attachment.—The plaintiff in an attachment in equity is a nonresident of the state, and in the progress of the cause is required to give security for the costs within sixty days. He does not give it, but the court proceeds to decree in his favor. On appeal the decree is reversed. In remanding the cause the appellate court will not direct the suit to be dismissed, but will direct that he be allowed a reasonable time to comply with the order. Anderson v. Johnson, 32 Gratt. 558.

Want of Reference.—When a decree, in favor of the vendor, against the purchaser of lands, and sundry personal property, is reversed, and the cause remanded for a reference of the title, and a survey to be made before commissioners, the court of appeals will direct that the appellant have liberty to show, and prove to them, if he can, what parts of the personal property stipulated for were not delivered under the contract, and the value thereof; although the court would not have remanded the cause for that purpose alone. Beverley v. Lawson, 3 Munf. 317.

Pleadings Uncertain.—Where in a suit in equity, the rights of the parties involve the decision of questions which were not put in issue by the pleadings, or were so vague and uncertain as not to inform the opposite party of what were the issues, between them, so as to prepare his case in a way to secure a full investigation by the court, and a decision according to the very right of the case, and which would do justice to all concerned, the appellate court will reverse the decree of the court below, and send the cause back, with leave to the parties to amend their pleadings. Nash v. Nash, 28 Gratt. 686.

3. EFFECT OF REVERSAL ON DEPENDENT, DECREES AND JUDGMENTS.—Where there is an appeal from the decrees in two causes, one a decree for money and the other a decree to enforce the former, a reversal of the decree for the money will operate as an implied reversal of the decree in the latter. Roanoke St. Ry. Co. v. Hicks (Va.), 32 S. E. Rep. 790.

Where a subsequent decree is based solely upon a previous decree in the same cause, the reversal of the earlier decree will necessarily result in the reversal of the latter. Jones v. Gillespie, 32 W. Va. 343, 9 S. E. Rep. 235.

Where a decree is reversed, the judgment on a forthcoming bond should also be set aside. McCormick v. Bailey, 17 W. Va. 585.

Reversal in Part.—It is familiar doctrine that where a decree is reversed in part, and affirmed as to the residue, such reversal does not destroy the lien of so much of the decree as is affirmed. Shepherd v. Chapman, 83 Va. 215, 2 S. E. Rep. 273; Moss v. Moorman, 24 Gratt. 97.

4. RESTITUTION.—"The record in the appellate court seldom presents the facts on which to base a specific order of restitution. The power of the lower court to repair the injury occasioned by its own wrongful adjudication is not derived from, or dependent upon, a mandate of restitution issued by the appellate court upon reversal of the lower court, but is substantially the same which the lower court exercises when its own process has been abused or used without authority. Hence the performance of the reversed decree being made to appear, as was done in this case, by the record in the lower court, an order or decree of restitution may be made upon motion, a rule in the nature of a scire facias, on proper pleadings, with notice to, or appearance by or for, the parties in interest." Keck v. Allender, 42 W. Va. 420, 26 S. E. Rep. 437.

In a decree of reversal, the appellate court will if requested, farther direct that in case the money and costs recovered by the appellee shall have been paid, the same be refunded, with lawful interest from the time of payment. Stanard v. Brownlow, 3 Munf. 229.

Where, in a suit by a turnpike company, plaintiff fails to prove its incorporation and there is a sale of defendant's land under a decree in the cause and a final decree directing the purchaser to pay the purchase money to the plaintiff and the defendant appeals, the court of appeals would reverse the decree and dismiss the bill but for the injury that such a decree would do to the appellant; but, the purchase money being in the hands of the purchaser the court of appeals will reverse so much of the decree as directs the purchase money to be paid to the plaintiff and remand the cause with direction to have the purchase money collected and paid to the appellant and then to dismiss the bill at the cost of the plaintiff. Bowyer v. Giles, etc., Turnpike Co., 9 Gratt. 109.

Where a court of equity erroneously cancelled deeds, and ordered a conveyance to be made to the plaintiffs and directed a writ of possession to issue to put them in possession of the land, and the court of appeals reversed the decree on appeal granted without supersedeas, it will not dismiss the bill, but will remand the cause with instructions to place the parties in statu quo and then dismiss the bill. Wilson v. Harper, 25 W. Va. 179.

Appellants entitled to restitution will not be compelled to wait until a fund, the existence of which is uncertain, is ascertained by a commissioner, when there is another fund, which they have a right to have restored, already ascertained. Keck v. Allender, 42 W. Va. 420, 26 S. E. Rep. 437.

Where judgment is recovered by a plaintiff in an action of unlawful detainer before a justice, and under it a writ of possession issues, and the defendant is turned out of possession, and then an appeal is granted, and then, before trial of the case, the plaintiff moves the dismissal of his action, and declares that he will not farther prosecute it, the court, if asked, should award a writ of possession to restore possession of the land to the defendant, and it is not error to refuse such dismissal except on condition of the plaintiff making such restitution. The dismissal may be entered later. McCormick v. Short, 49 W. Va. 1, 37 S. E. Rep. 769.

No statute of limitation can run so as to bar an order of restitution in a cause which has been a pending cause continuously down to the entering of the decree complained of. Keck v. Allender, 42 W. Va. 420, 26 S. E. Rep. 437.

In Criminal Cases.—When a pecuniary judgment has been rendered against a defendant in a criminal case, and he pays it, and upon appeal the judgment is reversed, the cause will be remanded to the court below, for an order of restitution to be made therein, if the money is yet in the hands or power of the court. Old's Case, 18 Gratt. 915.

Action at Law.—Money levied by the sheriff upon a judgment which is afterwards reversed, cannot be recovered back by general indebitatus assumpsit for money had and received, without proof that the money was actually received by the plaintiff, or applied to his use. Isom v. Johns, 2 Munf. 272; Eubank v. Ralls, 4 Leigh 308.

K. EXECUTION OF DECREE.—"When the supreme court of appeals has executed its power, in a cause before it, and its final decree or judgment requires some further act to be done, it cannot issue an execution, but will send its decree to the court below to be executed. Whatever was before the court, and disposed of, is considered finally settled. The inferior court is bound by the decree, as the law of the case, and must carry it into execution according to the mandate. They can examine it for no other purpose than execution, or give any other or further relief, or review it on any matter, decided on appeal, for error apparent, or intermeddle with it, further than to settle so much, as has been remanded." Henry v. Davis, 18 W. Va. 230; Mason v. Bridge Co., 20 W. Va. 223.

A judgment or decree of the court of appeal takes effect, at latest, from its date, not from the receipt and recordation of the mandate in the office of the court below. Long v. Perine, 44 W. Va. 243, 28 S. E. Rep. 701.

Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel the circuit judge or court to comply with the mandate of the court of appeals. Koonce v. Doolittle, 48 W. Va. 502, 37 S. E. Rep. 644.

L. COSTS IN APPELLATE COURT.—For principles governing costs in the appellate court, see monographic note on "Costs" appended to Jones v. Tatum, 19 Gratt. 720.

Certification of Judgment to Lower Court.—The provision of § 4060 of the Code requiring the judgment of the appellate court to be certified to the trial court and entered by the latter as its judgment, is substantially complied with by simply transcribing the judgment of the appellate court on the order book of the trial court. Reed's Case, 98 Va. 817, 36 S. E. Rep. 399.

VII. PRESUMPTIONS ON APPEAL.

1. GENERALLY.—Where the contrary does not appear by the record, by bill of exceptions or otherwise, the judgment or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, will always be presumed, on appeal, to be right and founded on sufficient evidence. Harman v. City of Lynchburg, 83 Gratt. 37; Saunders v. Griggs, 81 Va. 506; Joslyn v. Bank, 86 Va. 287, 10 S. E. Rep. 166; Cunningham v. Mitchell, 4 Rand. 189; Wright v. Smith, 81 Va. 777; Board of Supervisors v. Dunn, 27 Gratt. 608, 619; Spotts v. Com., 85 Va. 531, 8 S. E. Rep. 375; Fry v. Leslie, 87 Va. 269, 282, 12 S. E. Rep. 671; Shipman v. Fletcher, 91 Va. 473, 22 S. E. Rep. 458; Sargeant v. Irving, 3 Va. Dec. 338; Mairs v. Gallahue, 9 Gratt. 94; Neale v. Farinholt, 79 Va. 54; McClure-Mable Lumber Co. v. Brooks, 46 W. Va. 732, 34 S. E. Rep. 921; Robertson v. Harmon, 47 W. Va. 500, 35 S. E. Rep. 832; Tully v. Despard, 31 W. Va. 370, 6 S. E. Rep. 927; Reinhard v. Baker, 13 W. Va. 811; Campbell v. Hughes, 13 W. Va. 210; Richardson v. Donehoo, 16 W. Va. 685; King v. Burdett, 12 W. Va. 688; Camden v. Haymond, 9 W. Va. 680, 692; Shrewsbury v. Miller, 10 W. Va. 115; Kuykendall v. Ruckman, 2 W. Va. 332; Probst v. Braeunlich, 24 W. Va. 356; Griffith v. Corrothers, 42 W. Va. 59, 24 S. E. Rep. 569.

The presumption in favor of the regularity of the proceedings in a court of general jurisdiction is as strong in an appellate court, as where the judgment is collaterally attacked. Hill v. Woodward, 78 Va. 765.

The presumption in favor of the regularity of the proceedings of courts extends to every step and part thereof, and the burden is on him who alleges irregularity to show affirmatively by the record that the irregularity exists. Dove v. Com., 82 Va. 301; Smith v. Hutchinson, 78 Va. 683.

But this principle has no application in a case where the decision of the lower court proceeded, not upon the credit to be given to the witnesses, but upon a rule of law supposed by it to be correct, but in fact erroneous. Cheatham v. Hatcher, 30 Gratt. 56.

Error Must Appear by the Record.—Upon a supersedeas being obtained to a judgment, it is the duty of the appellants to take a certificate of the facts proved, or a bill of exceptions containing the evidence and thus show affirmatively that there is error in the judgment, otherwise the appellate court is bound to conclude that the decision was warranted by the evidence adduced on the trial. Gunn v. Turner, 21 Gratt. 382; Cooper v. Hepburn, 15 Gratt. 551; Ball v. Cox, 29 W. Va. 407, 1 S. E. Rep. 673.

the record to have been filed to any ruling which was made prior to the rendition of the verdict, add. all exceptions or points saved, during the trial, must be considered as having been abandoned. Whalen's Case, 90 Va. 544, 19 S. E. Rep. 182.

Cannot Supply Essential Part of Record.—It is a settled principle that the presumption that a court of general jurisdiction acts rightly cannot supply an essential part of the record in a felony case. Spurgeon's Case, 86 Va. 652, 10 S. E. Rep. 979; Shelton v. Com., 89 Va. 450, 16 S. E. Rep. 355.

The rule that a court of general jurisdiction, acting within the scope of its authority, is presumed to act rightly and to have jurisdiction to render the judgment it pronounces, until the contrary appears, applies only as to those matters concerning which the record is silent; nor can it operate to supply jurisdictional facts which the return, according to the statute, must show affirmatively, e. g. that service of process on an officer of a corporation was in the county of his residence, which is required to be shown by the return. Shenandoah V. R. Co. v. Ashby, 86 Va. 232, 9 S. E. Rep. 1003.

4. PROCESS.

Form.—Plaintiff having sued out a summons against defendant to answer her action, and judgment being entered by default, it does not expressly appear of record, that the defendant was a person against whom the summons was the proper process under the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 123, § 66, but defendant appeared in term to have proceedings at rules corrected, and did not object to the summons as improper process. Held, the court will presume it was the proper process. Wynn v. Wyatt, 11 Leigh 584.

Service.—In the absence of evidence showing affirmatively that process had not been executed on one of the parties defendant, the court below, being a court of competent jurisdiction, and both the subject-matter and parties being within that jurisdiction, the judgment "is presumed to be right until the contrary is shown."

It is not sufficient merely to raise a doubt, nor is it necessary that there be an express averment in the record that the party was served with process. Hill v. Woodward, 78 Va. 765; Saunders v. Griggs, 81 Va. 506.

5. PLEADINGS.

Allowance.—A special plea is offered, and the plaintiff objects to its being filed, but the ground of his objection does not appear. The record only shows that the special plea was filed a year after the general issue had been pleaded. An appellate court cannot say that the plea was improperly received. Maggort v. Hansbarger, 8 Leigh 532; Williams v. Knights, 7 W. Va. 335.

Rejection.—The decision in White v. Toncray, 9 Leigh 347, that where pleas are rejected, an appellate court will take it to have been rightly done unless the defendant has excepted, approved and acted on. Herrington v. Harkins, 1 Rob. 591.

Filing of Pleadings.—Where pleadings are found among the papers in a cause, and are mentioned in the cross-bill as having been filed, though there is no note of how or when they came into the record, it will be presumed that they were duly filed, where it is not denied in the pleadings and the depositions show that such parties were represented by counsel. Smith v. Proffitt, 82 Va. 832, 1 S. E. Rep. 67.

When it appears of record that the infant defendants appeared and answered by their guardian ad litem, and that there was a general replication thereto, it will be presumed in the court of appeals that the answer was regularly filed, though the answer itself is not found among the papers in the record. Smith v. Henkel, 81 Va. 524.

Where the record does not show when an amended bill and answer were filed, and the court below proceeds to hear the cause upon them without objection, the appellate court will consider them as properly filed. Henderson v. Alderson, 7 W. Va. 217.

Overruling of Demurrer.—Where it appears that the court has adjudged the principles of a cause in favor of the plaintiff, it will be presumed that a demurrer was overruled though the record does not show what was done with it. Smith v. Proffitt, 82 Va. 882, 855, 1 S. E. Rep. 67; Matthews v. Jenkins, 80 Va. 463; Hinchman v. Ballard, 7 W. Va. 152; Hood v. Maxwell, 1 W. Va. 219, 237; Bantz v. Basnett, 12 W. Va. 777. See monographic note on "Demurrers" appended to Com. v. Jackson, 3 Va. Cas. 501.

Sustaining Demurrer.—Where the court below sustains a demurrer to the declaration, but does not state the ground on which it acted, if the judgment is right for any reason, the court of appeals will presume that the court below acted on that reason and affirm its judgment. Rigg v. Parsons, 20 W. Va. 522, 2 S. E. Rep. 81.

Petition for Rehearing or Bill of Review—Compliance with Requirements.—Where a writ of error is taken to the action of the lower court in overruling a petition for rehearing or bill of review, it will be presumed that such petition or motion was in writing, presented in due form and containing the requisite averments. Scott v. Rowland, 82 Va. 484, 4 S. E. Rep. 595.

6. EVIDENCE.

Admission.—A party complaining of the admission of improper evidence, must state the facts or the evidence in his bill of exceptions, from which it will appear affirmatively to the appellate court that the evidence was improper, otherwise it will be presumed that the lower court did not err in the admission of the evidence. Carlton, etc., v. Mays, 8 W. Va. 245; Johnson v. Jennings, 10 Gratt. 1.

A deposition having been taken, after the cause was set for hearing in the superior court of chancery, and no objection appearing to have been made in that court, the court of appeals will presume that good cause was shown for admitting it. Stubbs v. Burwell, 2 H. & M. 536.

Where evidence is admitted of the general reputation of the prosecutrix in rape for chastity it will be presumed that her character had been attacked when the contrary does not appear by the record. Coleman v. Com., 84 Va. 1, 3 S. E. Rep. 878.

Rejection.—Where the evidence is not set forth in the record, it will be presumed that the trial court acted properly in rejecting it. Fry v. Leslie, 87 Va. 289, 292, 12 S. E. Rep. 671.

Assignment of error in refusing to allow a witness to answer a certain question is unavailable in the appellate court where the record does not show what the answer would have been. Taylor's Case, 80 Va. 109, 17 S. E. Rep. 812.

Where parol evidence is excluded, which might be proper when connected with a record, the bill of exception should state that such record was offered. Otherwise, it will be presumed that the parol evidence alone was offered. M'Dowell v. Burwell, 4 Rand. 317.

Sufficiency.—Unless the evidence relied on to reverse a judgment is made a part of the record the appellate court will presume that the judgment was supported by sufficient evidence. Preston v. Auditor, 1 Call 471; Winston v. Overseers, 4 Call 357.

Upon the hearing of a rule against a person to show cause why he should not give up possession of a certain tract of land which had been sold to another under a decree of court, the court makes a decree which shows that the court heard the cause upon the rule, the answer thereto, * * * and upon the depositions taken upon the rule, and the evidence of the witnesses adduced in open court, but the record does not show what "the evidence of the witnesses adduced in open court" was. Held:

The appellate court will not assume that the court below erred in its decree when the testimony that was had before that court has not been preserved and is not before the appellate court. Paxton v. Rucker, 15 W. Va. 547.

Where the bill of exceptions fails to give the evidence before the jury, the court of appeals will presume that the verdict was correct even though there are depositions in the record, if it does not appear that they were the only evidence. Ayres v. Robins, 30 Gratt. 105.

Where all the evidence is not certified, it will be presumed that there was some evidence not set out in the record which justified the verdict of the jury. Adams v. Hays, 86 Va. 153, 9 S. E. Rep. 1019.

Upon a bill for a new trial of an action at law, on the ground of after-discovered evidence, the record of the case at law not showing what evidence was before the jury, or what facts were proved on the trial, and the chancery record not giving that information; and the same judge who tried the cause at law, having dissolved the injunction and dismissed the bill, the appellate court has not the materials to enable them to review the decree; but must presume it to be correct. Markham v. Boyd, 23 Gratt. 544.

Where a judgment was rendered against a party as principal on a bond who claims that he was surety, in the absence of any evidence in the record on the subject it will be presumed that the lower court had evidence that he was principal and not surety. Cunningham v. Mitchell, 4 Rand. 189.

Where accused was indicted for selling liquor at Prillman's precinct, in the county of Franklin, without a license, the jury found him guilty, and he moved to arrest the judgment because the proof was not that he sold at the house or within the curtilage at Prillman's precinct, but in the woods some three or four hundred yards from the house, and the court overruled the motion and rendered judgment on the verdict, it not appearing that the bill of exceptions contained all the evidence, the court of appeals must presume that there was proof that the sale of liquor was at Prillman's precinct, and that it was in the county of Franklin. Massie's Case, 30 Gratt. 841.

But where in an action on a negotiable note the lower court certifies that the certificate of the evidence contains all the evidence adduced, and it does not appear by the certificate that the note was offered in evidence, it cannot be presumed that it was offered. Davis v. Poland, 92 Va. 225, 23 S. E. Rep. 292.

Where the court below certifies the facts proved, the finding of the jury in favor of the plaintiff, does not raise the presumption that there was evidence before the jury of a fact essential to the plaintiff's case, where such fact is not certified, and the certificate purports to set out all the facts proved. Anglin v. Bottom, 8 Gratt. 1.

7. INSTRUCTIONS.—Until the contrary appears by bill of exceptions it will be presumed that the action of the court below in giving or refusing an instruction was correct. Shepherd v. McQuilkin, 2 W. Va. 90; Wise v. Postlewait, 3 W. Va. 452; Fitzhugh v. Fitzhugh, 11 Gratt. 800; Hood v. Maxwell, 1 W. Va. 219, 238. See also, monographic note on "Instructions" appended to Womack v. Circle, 29 Gratt. 192.

Where the court refuses an instruction to the jury, the appellate court would not reverse the judgment, unless enough of the evidence had been set out in the exception to show the relevancy and propriety of the instruction, because error must affirmatively appear; and for the same reason, if the court gives the instruction, before the appellate court will reverse the judgment the record must show the instruction wrong, or that it could not, in any aspect of the case be properly given. Kinsley v. Monongalia County, 81 W. Va. 464, 7 S. E. Rep. 445; Powell v. Tarry, 77 Va. 250.

Where a court refuses to give an instruction asked, and its opinion is excepted to, if the bill of exceptions does not state that evidence was offered tending to prove the case supposed by the instruction, and the court has simply declined to give the instruction, such refusal may perhaps be justified, on the ground that the case was merely hypothetical, and the instruction asked on an abstract question. But if the court not only declines to give the instruction asked, but proceeds to give another in lieu thereof, the inference is a reasonable one, that there was evidence tending to prove the case supposed, and the appellate court will not only enquire whether the law is correctly expounded in the instruction given, but will also enquire whether it is correctly stated in the instruction asked. Chapman v. Wilson, 1 Rob. 207.

8. ORDER SUMMONING GRAND JURY.—Where the record does not affirmatively show, that an order to summon a grand jury was made, in the silence of the record, it will be presumed that such an order was made. The order itself is not a necessary part of the record of the case, since the commencement of the case was the finding of the indictment, and that was necessarily subsequent to the making of the order. Robinson v. Com., 88 Va. 900, 14 S. E. Rep. 627.

9. CHANGE OF DATE OF OFFENSE IN INDICTMENT.—Where an original indictment is brought before the appellate court, and it appears upon inspection thereof that the date of the year in which the offense is charged to have been committed has been changed, the appellate court, in the absence of anything in the record to show when the change was made, will presume that the same was made before the finding of the indictment. State v. Ball, 30 W. Va. 382, 4 S. E. Rep. 645.

10. DENIAL OF RIGHT TO BE TRIED SEPARATELY.—Persons jointly indicted cannot be tried jointly without the concurrent election of themselves and the attorney for the commonwealth. Either has the right to demand a separate trial. But even if it were otherwise, and the accused had the election to be tried separately or jointly where the record is silent on the subject of election, the appellate court will not presume that any right has been denied the accused, where she has been tried separately, in the absence of anything in the record to show that she elected to be tried jointly and that the right was denied her. Barnes v. Com., 92 Va. 794, 23 S. E. Rep. 784.

11. DENIAL OF RIGHT TO HAVE COUNSEL.—Every person accused of crime has a right to have counsel to aid him in his defence, but no one is compelled to employ counsel. If the record fails to show whether the accused had counsel or not, or even if it shows that he did not have counsel, it is not ground for reversal, unless it further appears that the right to have counsel was denied. It is not to be presumed that the right was denied. Barnes v. Com., 92 Va. 794, 23 S. E. Rep. 784.

Keeping Prisoner in Irons.—When the record is silent as to whether there was or was not any valid excuse for retaining the irons upon the prisoner during trial, the appellate court will presume that the court below exercised a sound and reasonable discretion in not causing them to be removed. State v. Allen, 45 W. Va. 65, 30 S. E. Rep. 209.

12. DISCHARGE OF JURY.—If it does not appear on the record that the defendant objected, it will be presumed in the appellate court, that the court below discharged the jury, empaneled and sworn in the case, for sufficient cause, and with the consent or acquiescence of the defendant. Dye v. Com., 7 Gratt. 662.

13. SPECIAL TERM OF COURT—COMPLIANCE WITH PROVISIONS OF STATUTE.—So where a special term is held under § 3060, Code Va. 1887, it will be presumed that all the provisions of that act were complied with. Harman v. Copenhagen, 89 Va. 896, 17 S. E. Rep. 482.

14. ADJOURNMENT.—If it does not appear affirmatively that adjournments were irregular, in the absence of objection on that ground in the court below, an appellate court will presume that they were regular. Hill v. Bowyer, 18 Gratt. 364, 381.

15. VERDICT.—A verdict of a jury is taken to be correct, in an appellate court, where the record contains none of the evidence before the jury. McClure-Mable Lumber Co. v. Brooks, 46 W. Va. 732, 34 S. E. Rep. 921.

16. REMANDING CAUSE.—Under the statute, § 25, ch. 178, Code 1873, if the record states that the cause was remanded "for good cause shown or by consent," it will be presumed in the absence of evidence to the contrary that such action was correct, yet, if the record does not so state, it will not be presumed that it was "by consent of parties or for good cause shown," and the judgment will be reversed, nor need objection have been made in the lower court, as it would have been unavailing. Wynn v. Heninger, 82 Va. 172.

Where a demurrer is sustained and a cause is remanded to rules with leave to the plaintiff to amend, it will be presumed, the contrary not appearing, that it was remanded at the instance of the plaintiff. White v. Ches., etc., R. Co., 26 W. Va. 800.

17. SETTING ASIDE JUDGMENT.—When a judgment is set aside by the court during the term at which it was rendered, the appellate court will presume that it was rightfully set aside unless the contrary affirmatively appears by the record. Green v. Pittsburg, etc., R. Co., 11 W. Va. 685.

When the bill of exceptions sets out the specific grounds on which the court set aside the verdict of the jury, the court of appeals will presume, unless the contrary appears, that it acted on those grounds alone, and, if those grounds are clearly insufficient, that court will reverse the order setting aside the verdict; but, generally, it takes a stronger case to reverse an order granting, than it does one refusing, a new trial. Probst v. Braeunlich, 24 W. Va. 366.

18. REVIVAL OF CAUSE.—A scire facias to revive an action of detinue against an administrator, should suggest the coming of the property into the hands of the administrator, since the death of the testator, but, the scire facias not being in the record nor in the clerk's office of the court below and no objection appearing to have been taken to it in that court, the court of appeals will presume that it was in all respects regular. Hunt v. Martin, 8 Gratt. 578.

Upon a plea of nul tiel record to a scire facias, as the court below has the whole record before it, in the absence of the record in the appellate court, it will be presumed, that the part of the record recited in the scire facias was before the court below, and that the order reviving the decree is correct. Garrison v. Myers, 12 W. Va. 830.

19. ISSUANCE OF PREVIOUS FI. FA. IN GOOD TIME.—The presumption is, where a f. fa. is issued more than a year after judgment, not that it is the first f. fa., but the contrary. The burden of proof is on the debtor to prove it the first. Spotts v. Com., 85 Va. 531, 8 S. E. Rep. 375.

20. QUASHING INQUISITION OF AD QUOD DAMNUM.—Where a supersedeas is granted to a judgment of the district court affirming a judgment of the county court quashing an inquisition of ad quod damnum on a petition to build a mill, in the absence of a bill of exceptions to the court's opinion it will be presumed that its action was proper and its judgment will be affirmed. Noel v. Sale, 1 Call 495.

21. OVERRULING MOTION TO QUASH RETURN.—When no exception is taken to the action of the court below in overruling a motion to quash a return, it will be presumed that its action was right. Thompson v. Boggs, 8 W. Va. 63.

22. HEARING OF CAUSE.—When the record does not show that any objections were made by the appellant to the hearing of the cause, the presumption is that the cause was heard without objection. Gardner v. Landcraft, 6 W. Va. 36.

23. SETTING OF CAUSE FOR HEARING.—In an appellate court, where it does not appear from the record that a cause in chancery was set for hearing at rules before it was heard, but it does appear that the complainants, who are the appellees, had a right to set it for hearing at the rules preceding the term at which it was heard, that the decree recited that it was heard on the bill, answers and exhibits, and was argued by counsel, and the pleadings presented a mere question of law, there being no issue of fact, it will be presumed that it was actually set for hearing, or that it was heard by consent. Raney v. Heath, 2 Pat. & H. 206.

24. THAT ALL THE EVIDENCE WAS FILED BY COMMISSIONER WITH REPORT.—It will be presumed, where a cause was referred to commissioner and exceptions filed, that he filed with his report all the evidence, as required by Acts 1895, ch. 8, § 7. Central City Brick Co. v. Norfolk & W. R. Co., 44 W. Va. 285, 28 S. E. Rep. 926.

25. RECITALS IN DECREES.

Attachments.—Where two decrees recite that the case was heard upon an attachment sued out and levied, it will be presumed that an attachment was duly sued out and levied, although the attachment mentioned in the record was quashed. Taylor v. Cox, 23 W. Va. 148, 9 S. E. Rep. 70.

Process.—Where it does not appear from the record whether process was duly served, or order of publication duly published and posted, or not, except from the decree, which declares that "process was duly served" or "order of publication was duly executed as to the defendants," it will be presumed that it was so served or executed. But when the record shows the process or order of publication, and shows clearly that process was not served or order of publication executed as to any particular defendant, such declaration in the decree will not raise such presumption as to such defendant. Styles v. Laurel Fork Oil & Coal Co., 45 W. Va. 374, 33 S. E. Rep. 237; Moore v. Holt, 10 Gratt. 284.

A recital in a decree that all the defendants had been duly summoned, is conclusive on appeal in the absence from the record of anything to the contrary. Moore v. Green, 90 Va. 181, 17 S. E. Rep. 872; Arnold v. Arnold, 11 W. Va. 449.

Where a decree states that an order of publication against an absent defendant, has been duly published, it is to be taken in an appellate court, that everything required by the statute was done. Moore v. Holt, 10 Gratt. 284.

Appearance.—Although one of the defendants was not served with process, if the record recites that the defendants appeared and pleaded, it will be presumed, on appeal, the contrary not appearing on the record, that the defendant who was not served with process also appeared and pleaded, and so waived the objection as he had a right to do. Shields v. Bank, 5 W. Va. 259.

26. APPOINTMENT AND QUALIFICATION OF COMMISSIONER.—Where the order of the circuit court, referring a cause to a person to take, state and settle an account of indebtedness, designates him "a master commissioner of this court," and there is nothing in the record to shew he was not one of the commissioners of the court, held, the appellate court will in such case, consider him regularly appointed and qualified as such commissioner. Hickman v. Painter, 11 W. Va. 386.

27. ISSUANCE OF GRANT.—Defendants in ejectment rely upon an outstanding title in a third person, and offer in evidence an abstract of the patent certified by the register, which is received without objection. This is to be regarded in the appellate court as prima facie evidence that such a grant was issued, though the case came up on a demurrer to evidence. Atkins v. Lewis, 14 Gratt. 30.

28. FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE.—Though the time allowed for the redemption of a mortgage be only thirty days, an appellate court will nevertheless presume that the discretion of the court below has been properly exercised, if no application appears to have been made to that court for an extension of time. Harkins v. Forsyth, 11 Leigh 294.

29. DEATH OF INTESTATE'S WIFE.—Neither the bill nor the answer referring to the wife of an intestate and there being no proof that she is alive, the appellate court will presume that she is dead, in a bill by the children of the intestate against the administrator. Thomas v. Dawson, 9 Gratt. 531.

30. THAT OFFENCE WAS COMMITTED WITHIN THE PERIOD OF LIMITATION.—After a verdict of conviction for misdemeanor, an appellate court will presume that the offence was proved to have been within the period of limitation, where the record does not show the contrary. Earhart v. Com., 9 Leigh 671.

31. PROCEEDINGS TO OPEN ROAD.—Under the act of 1835, the county courts having authority to dispense with that act in proceedings to open a road and to proceed under the act of 1819, on appeal it will be presumed that it has made such an order, where it has proceeded under the former act. White v. Coleman, 6 Gratt. 138.

32. PROBATE PROCEEDINGS.—Upon an issue of dev- isavit vel non, the verdict of the jury in favor of the will, approved by the court before which the issue was tried, concludes all mere questions of fact, depending upon the credit to be given to witnesses. And, therefore, in such case, in an appellate court, it must be taken that all the requirements of the statute, in order to establish the will, were satisfactorily proved; and the identity of the paper is one of the facts settled by the verdict. Jesse v. Parker, 6 Gratt. 57.

VIII. REVERSIBLE ERROR.

A. IN GENERAL.

1. MUST BE MANIFEST.—Courts of appellate jurisdiction cannot proceed, in annulling decrees from which appeals have been taken, upon mere conjecture or suspicion of error; the error must be made manifest, to the prejudice of the appellant. Reed v. Nixon, 86 W. Va. 681, 15 S. E. Rep. 416.

2. MUST APPEAR BY THE RECORD.—Where an appellant complains of a decree of a circuit court, and asks for a reversal, he must present such a record as will make it manifest—First, that error has been committed; and, secondly, that he has been injured thereby. Reed v. Nixon, 86 W. Va. 681, 15 S. E. Rep. 416.

When exception is taken to the admission or exclusion of evidence, or the granting or refusing of instructions, or indeed to any other ruling of the court below at the trial, the bill should be so framed, by the insertion of proper matter as to make the error, if any, apparent; otherwise the exception will generally be unavailing. Harman v. City of Lynchburg, 33 Gratt. 37; Coleman v. Com., 84 Va. 1, 3 S. E. Rep. 878. See generally, monographic note on "Bills of Exception" appended to Stoneman v. Com., 25 Gratt. 887.

3. BURDEN OF PROOF.—It is the duty of the party seeking to have a decision reversed, to show that there is error. Rowt v. Kille, 1 Leigh 216; Carlton v. Mays, 8 W. Va. 245; Furbee v. Shay, 46 W. Va. 736, 34 S. E. Rep. 746.

B. MUST BE PREJUDICIAL.—Where it clearly appears affirmatively that an error of the lower court could not affect the merits of the case, nor in any way be prejudicial to the party appealing, the appellate court will not reverse the judgment on the ground of such error. Kincheloe v. Tracewells, 11 Gratt. 587; Moran v. Clark, 30 W. Va. 358, 4 S. E. Rep. 303; Stinson v. Barley, 1 Va. Dec. 745; Ogle v. Adams, 12 W. Va. 213; Handy v. Scott, 26 W. Va. 710, 717; Miller v. Rose, 21 W. Va. 291; Fisher v. McNulty, 30 W. Va. 186, 3 S. E. Rep. 593; Hood v. Bloch, 29 W. Va. 244, 11 S. E. Rep. 910; Tebbs v. Lee, 76 Va. 744; Rea v. Trotter, 26 Gratt. 585; James v. Gibbs, 1 P. & H. 277; Coyle v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 11 W. Va. 94; Elliott v. Sutor, 3 W. Va. 37; Bank v. Lockwood, 13 W. Va. 392, 432; Bank v. Evans, 9 W. Va. 378; Boggs v. Bodkin, 32 W. Va. 566, 9 S. E. Rep. 891; Ruffner v. Hill, 31 W. Va. 428, 7 S. E. Rep. 13; Western M. & M. Co. v. Va. Cannel Coal Co., 10 W. Va. 250, 295; Anderson v. Doolittle, 38 W. Va. 633, 18 S. E. Rep. 726; Long v. Perine, 44 W. Va. 243, 28 S. E. Rep. 701; Martin v. Kester, 49 W. Va. 647, 39 S. E. Rep. 599.

If, on the undisputed facts, the case is plainly for the defendants, all errors committed by the court on the trial are harmless errors, so far as the plaintiff is concerned. Davis v. Living, 50 W. Va. 481, 40 S. E. Rep. 365.

Error will be presumed prejudicial, unless it plainly appears that it could not have affected the result. Norfolk Ry. & Light Co. v. Corletto (Va.), 41

S. E. Rep. 740; Stainback v. Bank of Va., 11 Gratt. 280; Colvin v. Menefee, 11 Gratt. 87; Clarke v. Reina, 12 Gratt. 98; Johnson v. Jennings, 10 Gratt. 1; Early v. Wilkinson, 9 Gratt. 68; Ross v. Gill, 1 Wash. 87; Pate v. Spotts, 6 Munf. 394; Morris v. Morris, 4 Gratt. 293; Crawford v. Morris, 5 Gratt. 90; Vance v. McLaughlin, 8 Gratt. 289; Franklin v. Depriest, 13 Gratt. 257; Carrington v. Goddin, 13 Gratt. 587; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Medley, 75 Va. 499; W. U. Tel. Co. v. Reynolds, 77 Va. 174; Rorer Iron Co. v. Trout, 83 Va. 397, 2 S. E. Rep. 713; Clark v. City of Richmond, 83 Va. 355, 5 S. E. Rep. 369; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Norment, 84 Va. 167, 4 S. E. Rep. 211; Lucas' Case, 84 Va. 308, 4 S. E. Rep. 695; Handly v. Snodgrass, 9 Leigh 484.

A criminal case will not be reversed unless the record shows error committed, prejudicial to the prisoner. State v. Lane, 44 W. Va. 730, 29 S. E. Rep. 1020.

Where the appellant is not interested in an assignment of error, the appellate court will not consider it. Tebbs v. Lee, 76 Va. 744; Reid v. Stuart, 13 W. Va. 338; Sturm v. Fleming, 26 W. Va. 54.

An appellant has no right to complain of matters decreed between co-appellees in the cause which are not to his prejudice. Mann v. Lewis, 3 W. Va. 215.

In a suit to set aside a conveyance from husband to wife as fraudulent, the decree will not be reversed on the appeal of the wife alone because depositions were read against her husband, of the taking of which he had no notice, where she had notice. Silverman v. Greaser, 27 W. Va. 550.

When the parties, whose interests would entitle them to call for a decision upon a particular question presented by the record, waive such decision, the court of appeals will not pass upon such question at the instance of a party who cannot be benefited or affected by such decision. Stribling v. Splint Coal Co., 31 W. Va. 82, 5 S. E. Rep. 321.

Where a defendant, a short time before the institution of a suit against him, has relinquished all right to and interest in the subject-matter of controversy, and subsequently, before the hearing, has his relinquishment put upon record, he cannot complain that the circuit court, without awarding any costs against him, has entered a decree in favor of the plaintiff, confirming the relinquishment. Workman v. Doran, 34 W. Va. 604, 12 S. E. Rep. 770.

So where appellant is not entitled to set up the plea of the statute of limitations, he cannot complain because the court below did not sustain the plea when set up by his debtor. Clayton v. Henley, 32 Gratt. 65.

Beneficial Error.—Appellant shall not be heard to object to errors which are for his benefit. Hammit v. Bullett, 1 Call 567; Smith v. Harmanson, 1 Wash. 6; Pendleton v. Vandevier, 1 Wash. 381; Martin v. Stover, 2 Call 514; Farmers' Bank v. Willis, 7 W. Va. 32; Logan v. Dils, 4 W. Va. 397; Orange, etc., R. Co. v. Fulvey, 17 Gratt. 366; Elb v. Martin, 5 Leigh 132.

If an exception is taken to an opinion of the court excluding written evidence, and the evidence is made a part of the exception, and is against the party excepting, the exclusion of the evidence is not error of which the exceptant can complain. Johnson v. Jennings, 10 Gratt. 1.

Instances—Application of Money Due by Covenant.—A person bound by covenant to pay a sum of money, cannot complain of any error in the application of such money, since such error is not prejudicial to him. Chappell v. Robertson, 2 Rob. 500.

Refusal to Sign Bill of Exceptions.—The court of appeals will not reverse a judgment on the ground that the court below refused to sign and seal a bill of exceptions to its opinion overruling a motion for a new trial, if the weight of evidence exhibited, support the verdict. Shanks v. Fenwick, 2 Munf. 478.

Refusal to Suspend Decree.—Although the lower court in violation of § 4, ch. 178, Code 1887, refuses to allow a suspension of a decree in order to allow the appellant to apply for an appeal, if he obtain an appeal from the court of appeals promptly, and is not injured by such action, the decree will not be reversed on that account. Todd v. Gallego, etc., Mfg. Co., 84 Va. 586, 597, 5 S. E. Rep. 676.

Priority of Liens.—In a suit to subject the land of a debtor to the payment of his debts, neither the debtor nor a creditor on appeal can complain that the debtor's interest in a certain tract of land was not laid off, where that interest was not decreed to be sold. Grantham v. Lucas, 24 W. Va. 231.

Failure of Verdict to Set Out Character of Estate.—Where the verdict in ejectment fails to find the character of the estate which the plaintiff claims, he alone can complain of that, not the defendant. Elliott v. Sutor, 3 W. Va. 37.

Nor can the debtor object that the priorities of the several judgments was fixed according to the date of the docketing of the judgments, instead of the date of the judgments themselves, neither of these errors being to the prejudice of the party complaining. Grantham v. Lucas, 24 W. Va. 231; Hill v. Morehead, 20 W. Va. 429.

Personal Decree Improperly Made.—So where a personal decree is improperly made, but it is satisfied out of land which is properly liable to the payment of the charge, the appellant not being prejudiced, the decree will not be reversed. Fisher v. Brown, 24 W. Va. 713.

Refusal to Rehear Correct Decree.—A decree will not be reversed on account of the refusal of the lower court to rehear a decree in which there is no error. Camden v. Haymond, 9 W. Va. 680, 693.

Allowing Petition for Rehearing to Be Filed after End of Term.—Although the action of the lower court in allowing a petition for a rehearing to be filed after the end of the term by entirely new parties was erroneous, it is not ground for a reversal, where appellant is not aggrieved thereby. Roanoke, etc., Bank v. Farmers', etc., Bank, 84 Va. 603, 5 S. E. Rep. 662.

Want of Notice.—If the plaintiffs in error have sustained no injury by the want of notice of a motion to set aside a judgment, and could not possibly have sustained any, they certainly are not entitled to reverse upon that ground the order setting aside a judgment and quashing the execution. Ballard v. Whitlock, 18 Gratt. 235.

Prejudice to Any Party Sufficient.—A decree need not be prejudicial to the appellant in order to be reversed. It is sufficient if it is prejudicial to the right of any parties, appellant or appellee since the whole decree may be reviewed and any error therein to the prejudice of any parties to the suit, whether appellants or appellees, complaining thereof, may be corrected.

This follows from the fact that a general affirmation of the decree would bar any of the parties from an appeal thereunder. Worthington v. Staunton, 16 W. Va. 208, 234.

Compensating Errors.—Although a decree gives interest on a sum which, according to the mode of stating the account, is itself interest, yet if it be manifest that a settlement upon proper principles would have made the balance larger, and that such balance would have been the principal, the decree will not be reversed at the instance of the debtor. Handly v. Snodgrass, 9 Leigh 484.

Where, though the decree makes no allowance for improvements which purchasers allege they have made upon the lands, yet, as the rents and profits of the lands, or the interest on the purchase money, with neither of which they are charged, would amount to more than these improvements which they claim, it was held there was no error in the decree. Tosh v. Robertson, 27 Gratt. 270.

If the inferior court has admitted an improper plea, notwithstanding the objections of the plaintiff, and has afterwards rejected the evidence in support of it, it has but remedied the first error by the commission of the second; and the court of appeals could with no propriety reverse the last act, and thereby resuscitate the former error to the plaintiff's prejudice. Wilson v. Spencer, 11 Leigh 261.

C. MUST BE MATERIAL.

Insignificant Error.—Where the amount involved in the error is insignificant, the decree will not be reversed on the principle of de minimis lex non curat. Lovett v. Thomas, 81 Va. 245, 257.

Mere Informalities.—Though the proceedings of the lower court were irregular, yet if the results reached are the same as if they had been regular, the decree will not be reversed on that account. Max Meadows, etc., Co. v. McGavock, 98 Va. 411, 36 S. E. Rep. 490; Beery v. Homan, 8 Gratt. 48.

The appellate court will not reverse a decree for mere formal errors which may be corrected by that court, when upon the whole record it appears that the decree complained of is manifestly right or that no error was committed to the prejudice of the party seeking to reverse it. Barnett v. Ames, 1 Va. Dec. 1.

In debt on a bond with a collateral condition, the jury who try the issues find the same for the plaintiff, and assess his damages, and allow interest thereon: and the judgment is entered for the damages so assessed, with interest and costs, instead of being entered for the penalty of the bond and costs, to be discharged by the damages, interest and costs. Held, though the judgment is not entered in proper form, yet the error in the form producing no injury to the defendant, the judgment will not be reversed therefor. Accord. Pate v. Spotts, 6 Munf. 394; Wilson v. Spencer, 11 Leigh 261; Sangster v. Com., 17 Gratt. 124.

If an improper plea be received, and issue be taken on it, the court may afterwards set aside the issue and the plea: and if this be in substance and effect done, though in form irregularly done, the proceedings shall not be reversed for such irregularity. Kemp v. Mundell, 9 Leigh 12.

A decree will not be reversed for a mere technical error committed upon the trial of an issue, when the appellate court can see from the record that the case has been rightly decided. Fishburne v. Ferguson, 84 Va. 87, 114, 4 S. E. Rep. 575.

Upon an appeal from an interlocutory decree, the principles of the decree, and not mere informalities in the form thereof, are the proper subjects of consideration in the appellate court. The decree will not, therefore, be reversed for such errors of form; but will be affirmed without prejudice to the appelplaintiff's right to move the court below for a modification of the decree in these respects. Woodson v. Perkins, 5 Gratt. 345.

Clerical Errors.—Mere clerical errors are no ground for reversing a judgment. Roach v. Blakey, 89 Va. 767, 17 S. E. Rep. 228.

Error Must Not Involve Less Than Jurisdictional Amount.—Where there is no error in a decree except that it gives interest on the aggregate of principal and interest from a time anterior to the rendition of the decree but the difference is not sufficient in amount to give the court of appeals jurisdiction, the decree will be reversed with costs to the appellee and a decree entered for the correct amount. Lamb v. Cecil, 25 W. Va. 288.

D. ERRORS NOT AVAILABLE ON APPEAL.

1. INVITED ERROR.—An appellant cannot complain of irregularities in the court below for which he is himself accountable, nor of errors of his own committing. Carpenter v. Utz, 4 Gratt. 270.

It is not competent for a complainant to dismiss his own bill and then object, in an appellate court, that the prayer of the bill has not been decreed in his favor. Pitts v. Tidwell, 8 Munf. 88.

Although the bill names certain parties and asks that they be required to answer the bill, if they do not appear as parties, and the plaintiffs take no decree nisi or other order against them, but bring the cause to a hearing or acquiesce in a hearing, and the bill is dismissed generally, the plaintiffs on appeal have no right to have the decree reversed, because the cause was not matured as to such parties. Warren v. Syme, 7 W. Va. 474, 500.

Upon the filing of a petition in a pending suit asking to postpone the confirmation of a sale of real estate, if the parties have proceeded to a hearing upon affidavits alone without objection, the appellate court will not reverse the decree for this cause only. Houghton v. Mountain Lake Land Co., 93 Va. 149, 24 S. E. Rep. 920.

Although it was irregular to allow a defendant to file a plea, after an office judgment has been entered, it is not prejudicial to him, and he cannot complain. Hunter v. Snyder, 11 W. Va. 198.

A defendant, who by his answer asks the court to make inquiries through its commissioner, more extended than the statement in the bill might justify, and, upon such inquiry, to decree between him and a co-defendant, is thereby precluded in the appellate court from assigning as error such enlarged extent of inquiry, or that a decree between co-defendants was based thereon. Varce v. Evans, 11 W. Va. 342.

A judgment ought not to be reversed on the ground that the court, at the instance of the party against whom it was rendered, admitted improper evidence, or erroneously compelled the other party to join in a demurrer to evidence. Harrison v. Brock, 1 Munf. 22; Gimmi v. Cullen, 20 Gratt. 439.

If a party objects to the introduction of evidence which is admitted, and afterwards introduces the same evidence himself, it is not ground for reversing the judgment, although the evidence objected to was incompetent. New York L. Ins. Co. v. Tallafarro, 95 Va. 522, 28 S. E. Rep. 879.

A judgment for the plaintiff ought not to be reversed, on the ground that the court, at the instance of the defendant, gave an erroneous instruction to the jury. Murrell v. Johnson, 1 H. & M. 449; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Medley, 75 Va. 499.

2. ERRORS CONSENTED TO.—What is done by consent of parties is no ground for reversal. Roach v. Blakey, 89 Va. 767, 17 S. E. Rep. 228.

Consent that the suit shall not abate by the death of parties is obligatory and operates like a release of errors. Garlington v. Chutton, 1 Call 530.

3. ESTOPPEL.—The plaintiff in error cannot question the jurisdiction of the lower court, whose action he wishes reviewed. Railroad v. Bd. of Pub. Works, 28 W. Va. 264.

E. ERRORS IN PLEADINGS.

Improper Rejection.—The rule is settled in West Virginia that the court of appeals will always presume that the defendant was prejudiced by the rejection of a proper plea in the court below, and that, unless it affirmatively appears by the record that no injury could have resulted to the defendant by such rejection of his plea, the judgment will be reversed, without inquiring whether or not the defendant could have been injured. Flint v. Gilpin, 29 W. Va. 740, 3 S. E. Rep. 33.

The same is true of the improper rejection of a replication. Van Winkle v. Blackford, 28 W. Va. 670.

The appellant is not prejudiced by the rejection of special pleas, every fact provable under which, could have been proved under the general issue which was also pleaded. Virginia Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Buck, 88 Va. 517, 13 S. E. Rep. 973.

Where a statutory plea in the nature of a plea of set-off is filed, and another is tendered, which only, varies from the first in the amount of damages laid, or in asking to rescind the contract entirely, the rejection of this last plea by the court is not ground for reversing the judgment upon appeal, where the verdict negatives the facts stated in both pleas. Fleming v. Toler, 7 Gratt. 310.

Improper Admission.—So where an improper plea has been admitted, the appellate court will presume that it was injurious to the plaintiff unless it appears affirmatively by the record that the plaintiff could not have been injured. Van Winkle v. Blackford, 28 W. Va. 670; Bank v. Kimberlands, 16 W. Va. 557.

So where all of plaintiff's evidence was admissible under his general replication and the decree is correct, the decree will not be reversed for error in permitting him to file a special replication, such error not being to the prejudice of the defendant. Dower v. Seeds, 28 W. Va. 113, 129.

In an action for defamation, where a special plea of justification is permitted to be filed, which undertakes to justify all the charges in the declaration, but is insufficient in its specifications as to any of them, and other special pleas are filed, justifying, by proper specifications, certain of the charges, and on the trial it appeared that the defendant offered no evidence to the jury to prove the truth of any of the charges not specifically justified in such other pleas, the appellate court will regard the filing of said insufficient plea as harmless error. Amos v. Stockert, 47 W. Va. 109, 34 S. E. Rep. 831.

Filing of Pleas to Answer.—Where, with the answer of a defendant, a bond of the plaintiff's decedent was filed, and the plaintiff filed no replication but pleaded non est factum to the bond filed with the answer, and on the evidence being heard, the court below decided that the bond was not the deed of the plaintiff, it was held that, while it was irregular and improper to have allowed a plea to have been filed to an answer, and the proper course was, for the plaintiff to have filed a general replication to the answer, accompanied by an affidavit, putting in issue the execution of the bond, which would have been sufficient to require the defendant to prove such execution. yet, as the plea, which was sworn to, could be treated as an affidavit, as the parties took issue on it, and testimony, and the appellant had not been prejudiced by the irregular proceedings and trial on said plea as such, the decree would not be reversed for such irregularities, substantial justice having been done between the parties. Simmons v. Simmons, 33 Gratt. 451.

Rejecting Improper Plea Already Filed.—Although it may, strictly speaking, be irregular for the court after an improper plea has been filed, and thereby become a part of the record, to entertain and grant a motion to reject the same, still if the court does so, it must in substance and effect, be regarded as setting aside the plea, and though it is done irregularly, the proceedings will not be reversed for such irregularity. In such case the court having done right substantially, its proceedings will not be reversed because of mere informality in the mode of doing it. Hart v. Balt. & O. R. R. Co., 6 W. Va. 336.

Want of Plea in Proceeding before a Justice.—A conviction for a violation of an ordinance of a municipal corporation will not be reversed for want of a plea by the defendant. Town of Moundsville v. Velton, 35 W. Va. 217, 13 S. E. Rep. 373.

In a case taken by appeal from the judgment of a justice to the circuit court, where it was tried by a jury, the court of appeals will not reverse the judgment simply because the jury were sworn to "try the issue" between the parties, and the record fails to show that any plea had been filed or issue made in the case, in the absence of anything to show that the plaintiff in error was prejudiced by such irregularity if it was such. Tully v. Despard, 31 W. Va. 370, 6 S. E. Rep. 927.

Failure to Swear to Special Plea of Set Off.—Where a special plea in the nature of a plea of set off under § 3299, Code 1887, conforms to the statute except that it was not sworn to, the judgment will not be reversed for such defect, when, upon a survey of the whole record, the judgment appears to be substantially right. Grayson v. Buchanan, 88 Va. 251, 13 S. E. Rep. 457.

Failure to Specify Act of Limitation Relied on.—A plea of the statute of limitations should state on what act the defendant relies. Though if it appears that the plaintiff could not probably be mistaken as to the act relied on, the appellate court will not reverse the judgment for the failure of the plea to specify the act. Wortham & Co. v. Smith, 15 Gratt. 487.

Want of a Replication.—Where defendant has taken depositions as if there had been a replication, the decree will not be reversed for want of a replication. Code 1873, ch. 177, § 4; Jones v. Degge, 84 Va. 635, 5 S. E. Rep. 799; Kern, Barr & Co. v. Wyatt & Co., 29 Va. 885, 17 S. E. Rep. 549.

Under the operation of §§ 35, 36, ch. 125, Code W. Va., where the answer contains material allegations constituting a claim for affirmative relief, and no "reply in writing" is filed by a general replication, and the cause has been heard upon the pleadings thus made up and the proofs taken, if the record shows that it is not such a case, as would before the passage of said sections have made the filing of a crossbill necessary in order to entitle the defendant to the relief sought, the decree will not reverse because no "reply in writing" was filed. Cunningham v. Hedrick, 23 W. Va. 579.

Want of Special Replication.—Where there is an answer calling for a special reply, and there is a general replication to it, and the party filing it has gone on and taken depositions as if there were a special reply denying it, and there has been a full hearing of the merits, as if there had been such special reply, the decree will not be reversed for want of such special reply. Long v. Perine, 41 W. Va. 314, 23 S. E. Rep. 611.

Filing Special Replication.—If the defendant does not ask affirmative relief, it is error to permit the filing of a special replication, but, if no evidence is offered in support thereof except such as is admissible in support of a general replication, such error will be deemed harmless. Wick v. Dawson, 48 W. Va. 469, 37 S. E. Rep. 639.

Failure to Pass on Special Pleas.—Where a cause is tried upon the general issue, and there is a verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs, whilst there is a demurrer to one special plea, and an objection to the admission of another, not acted on by the court, if these pleas present no bar to the action, the failure of the court to pass upon them affords no ground for reversing the judgment. Peshine v. Shepperson, 17 Gratt. 472.

Overruling Demurrer.—Where the court overrules a demurrer to certain counts, but all the evidence is admissible under another unobjectionable count, the judgment will not be reversed because of error in overruling the demurrer, since the defendant could not have been prejudiced. Hood v. Bloch, 29 W. Va. 244, 11 S. E. Rep. 910.

So also where there is afterwards a demurrer to evidence. Stolle v. Aetna, etc., Ins. Co., 10 W. Va. 546, 550.

To a declaration in assumpsit containing two counts, the defendant pleads the general issue. Afterwards he files two additional pleas to the first count. Upon a demurrer to these pleas, the circuit court, holding both of them to be good, enters judgment for the defendant upon the first count. At a subsequent day, the issue is tried on the second count, and verdict and judgment rendered for the defendant on that count. Upon a supersedeas, the court of appeals is of opinion that there was error in overruling the demurrer. Held nevertheless, the defendant is entitled to the benefit of the verdict and judgment on the second count. Dunn v. Price, 11 Leigh 203.

Improperly Sustaining Demurrer.—If there are common counts in the declaration, and a special count be included, which is such, that all the facts alleged in it, and on which it is based, could be as well proven by the plaintiff under the common counts, and the court improperly sustains a demurrer to such special count, and the record shows, that at the trial of the case the plaintiff in point of fact sustained no injury from the action of the court in sustaining the demurrer to the special count, the appellate court will not reverse the judgment below because of such error. Moore v. Supervisors, 18 W. Va. 630.

Where two counts in a declaration in an action for personal injuries state in detail all the circumstances connected with the occurrence, and there has been a verdict for the plaintiff, which was set aside on a demurrer to the evidence, the court of appeals will not reverse the judgment of the trial court sustaining a demurrer to another count in the declaration stating the same case in very general terms, although the counts may have been good. If there was error, it was harmless. Childress v. Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co., 94 Va. 186, 26 S. E. Rep. 424.

Where a cause is heard on its merits and all the material allegations of the bill are denied in the answer and are not supported by proof, the fact that a demurrer to the bill was sustained, is not error to the prejudice of the appellant. Tilden v. Maslin, 5 W. Va. 377.

Refusal to Allow Demurrer to Be Filed.—In an action of detinue there are two counts in the declaration. The first does not allege property in the plaintiff. The second does allege it. The court refuses to allow the defendant to demur to the several counts. The jury find expressly that the property is the property of the plaintiff. Held, if the first count is defective, yet the second being good, and the jury finding that the property was the property of the plaintiff, the defendant is not injured by the refusal of the court to allow the demurrer to be filed, and it is no cause for reversing the judgment. Binns v. Waddill, 32 Gratt. 588.

If the court below declines to entertain a demurrer, and the declaration is good, the defendant is not prejudiced thereby. Coyle v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 11 W. Va. 94.

Failure to Pass on Demurrer.—Although a demurrer does not appear to have been passed upon, if the appellate court is of opinion that it ought to have been overruled, a judgment for the plaintiff will not be reversed. Jones v. Stevenson, 5 Munf. 1; Creel v. Brown, 1 Rob. 265; Dower v. Seeds, 28 W. Va. 118, 180.

But if of opinion that the demurrer should have been sustained, the decree will be reversed and the cause remanded to proceed to judgment on the demurrer unless the plaintiff amend his declaration on leave obtained in that court. Creel v. Brown, 1 Rob. 265; Green v. Dulany, 2 Munf. 518.

Failure to Consider Answer.—While it is error to render a decree without considering the answer, yet the decree will not be reversed on that account, if the answer would not have changed the result. Linsey v. McGannon, 9 W. Va. 154.

Failure to Consider Exceptions to Answer.—If exceptions to an answer are not well founded, it is not ground to reverse a decree, that they were not set down to be argued, but the cause was heard and decided without passing upon them. Goddin v. Vaughn, 14 Gratt. 102.

Failure to Join Issue.—Though an issue be not made up on a special plea, yet if the evidence to sustain it was admissible under the general issue and non assumpsit had been pleaded, the appellate court ought not to reverse a judgment on a verdict for such irregularity, when all the evidence is certified, and sustains the verdict. Douglass v. Central Land Co., 12 W. Va. 502.

Refusal to Allow Withdrawal of Joinder of Issue.—The court of appeals will not reverse a judgment because the court below refused to allow defendant to withdraw his joinder of issue and demur to the replication, where the latter is sufficient in law. Virginia Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Saunders, 86 Va. 969, 11 S. E. Rep. 794.

F. ERRORS IN EVIDENCE.

Admission.

Generally.—If, in the trial of a case, a court admits evidence offered by the plaintiff against the protest of the defendant, ruling improperly that such evidence is proper testimony, and there is a verdict and judgment against the defendant, the appellate court will, when the question is properly brought before it, presume that the defendant was prejudiced by such improper ruling of the court, unless it appears from the record affirmatively that, in point of fact, the defendant could not have been prejudiced by such ruling; and this can ordinarily only be made to appear by all the evidence having been certified, and the appellate court being satisfied that, if this improper evidence had been excluded, the plaintiff's case would still have been made out so clearly that, if the jury had found a verdict for the defendant, the court ought to set aside such verdict as unsustained by the evidence, or contrary thereto. Hall v. Lyons, 29 W. Va. 410, 1 S. E. Rep. 582; Preston v. Harvey, 2 H. & M. 55; Taylor v. Balt., etc., R. Co., 37 W. Va. 39, 10 S. E. Rep. 29; State v. Musgrave, 43 W. Va. 672, 28 S. E. Rep. 814; Nease v. Capehart, 15 W. Va. 299; Ins. Co. v. Trear, 29 Gratt. 255; Payne v. Com., 31 Gratt. 855; Kerr v. Lunsford, 31 W. Va. 659, 8 S. E. Rep. 493; Bernard v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 85 Va. 792, 8 S. E. Rep. 785; State v. Hull, 45 W. Va. 767, 32 S. E. Rep. 240; Gerst v. Jones, 32 Gratt. 518; Steptoe v. Pollard, 30 Gratt. 689.

If it may have prejudiced him, though it be doubtful whether it did or not, it will be cause for reversal of the judgment. Webb v. Big Kanawha & O. R. Packet Co., 43 W. Va. 800, 29 S. E. Rep. 519; Taylor v. Railroad Co., 33 W. Va. 39, 10 S. E. Rep. 29; Insurance Co. v. Trear, 29 Gratt. 259; Poindexter v. Davis, 6 Gratt. 481.

If improper evidence is permitted to go to the jury, and there is an exception thereto, an appellate court must reverse the judgment, though there was other evidence as to the same fact, before the jury. Poindexter v. Davis, 6 Gratt. 481.

A party in whose favor the verdict is found on all points is not prejudiced by rulings of the trial court upon the admission of evidence. Wash., etc., R. Co. v. Alexandria, 98 Va. 344, 36 S. E. Rep. 385; Chapman v. Real Estate Co., 96 Va. 177, 31 S. E. Rep. 74.

Sufficient Competent Evidence.—A decree appearing plainly right from the competent evidence in the case will not be reversed because of the admission of incompetent evidence. Ball v. Stewart, 41 W. Va. 654, 24 S. E. Rep. 632; Kimmel v. Shroyer, 28 W. Va. 506; Watkins v. Wortman, 19 W. Va. 78; Ball v. Kearns, 41 W. Va. 657, 24 S. E. Rep. 633; Payne v. Grant, 81 Va. 164; First Nat. Bank v. Prager, 50 W. Va. 660, 41 S. E. Rep. 363.

Aliter where it does not clearly so appear. Kimmel v. Shroyer, 28 W. Va. 506.

Incompetent and inadmissible testimony will not reverse a decree where the uncontroverted facts in the bill are sufficient to sustain it. Talbott v. Woodford, 48 W. Va. 449, 37 S. E. Rep. 580.

Although improper evidence was admitted, e. g. that plaintiff was a widow and had six children, nevertheless if it appears that the damages found by the jury are not in excess of what was fully warranted by the legitimate evidence, it is not error for which the judgment will be reversed. Moore v. City of Huntington, 31 W. Va. 842, 8 S. E. Rep. 512. So a judgment will not be reversed on account of the admission of the illegal evidence, where conclusive evidence to the same point is afterwards adduced. Preston v. Harvey, 2 H. & M. 55.

When a case is tried by a court in lieu of a jury, it is not an error, for which the appellate court will reverse, to hear illegal testimony, if there be enough legal testimony to justify the judgment. State v. Thacker Coal & Coke Co., 49 W. Va. 140, 38 S. E. Rep. 589.

Where a copy of a paper has been properly introduced in evidence, the admission of another copy of the same paper is no ground for reversing the judgment. Corbett v. Nutt, 18 Gratt. 634.

The protest of a negotiable instrument being sufficient to bind the endorser, though parol evidence in aid of it is inadmissible, yet its admission is no ground for reversing the judgment, not being prejudicial to the defendant. Stainback v. The Bank of Virginia, 11 Gratt. 260.

Where Evidence Did Not Influence Verdict.—A judgment ought not to be reversed on the ground, that improper evidence offered to the jury by the appellant, was admitted by the inferior court, where it appears that such evidence did not influence the verdict. Faulcon v. Harriss, 2 H. & M. 550.

In assumpsit for money lent and paid, the issues being "nonassumpsit," and "the statute of limitations," and the verdict being for the defendant on the last plea alone the admission of improper evidence having reference to the issue on the first plea only, and which could have no influence on the issue on the last plea, is not ground for reversing the judgment. Johnson v. Jennings, 10 Gratt. 1.

Where two matters are submitted to a jury, one of them improperly, and the evidence given is pertinent alone to that improperly submitted, such improper submission to the jury, and the evidence thereon, will not affect the verdict on the matter properly before the jury, where the matters are distinct, and it appears that such improper submission and evidence did not confuse the jury, or operate to the prejudice of the party upon the issue properly before the jury. Miller v. White, 46 W. Va. 67, 33 S. E. Rep. 332.

Admitted under Immaterial Issues.—The admission of improper evidence under an immaterial issue is no ground for reversal. Richardson v. Justices, 11 Gratt. 190.

Admitted under Proper Instructions.—Although evidence was improperly admitted yet if the court had properly instructed the jury, to find as they did, it could not have prejudiced the appellant and hence is not ground for reversal. Early v. Wilkinson, 9 Gratt. 68.

Exclusion.

Generally.—The converse of this proposition is equally true,—that, to authorize the reversal of a judgment for refusing to admit relevant testimony, not only must the evidence be relevant, but it must be of such a nature that its rejection may have prejudiced the party offering it. If he may have been so prejudiced, even though it be doubtful whether in fact he was or not, that is sufficient ground for reversing the judgment. Kerr v. Lunsford, 31 W. Va. 659, 8 S. E. Rep. 493; Bartlett v. Patton, 33 W. Va. 71, 10 S. E. Rep. 21; Nease v. Capehart, 15 W. Va. 299; Bernard v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 85 Va. 792, 8 S. E. Rep. 785; George v. Pilcher, 28 Gratt. 230.

It must be manifest from the record that, notwithstanding such misruling, the party complaining could not have been prejudiced thereby, and that the verdict conforms to the substantial justice of the case. Krell Plano Co. v. Kent, 39 W. Va. 294, 19 S. E. Rep. 409.

Afterwards Introduced.—Although the trial court may have refused to permit a proper question to be answered by a witness, its ruling will not be reversed where it appears that, at a subsequent stage of the trial, the facts sought to be elicited by the question brought out, and no prejudice resulted from the refusal. Crescent Horseshoe Co. v. Eynon, 95 Va. 151, 27 S. E. Rep. 935.

If a party objects to the introduction of evidence which is admitted, and afterwards introduces the same evidence himself, it is not ground for reversing the judgment although the evidence objected to was incompetent. New York L. Ins. Co. v. Tallafiero, 95 Va. 523, 28 S. E. Rep. 879.

Other Sufficient Evidence.—Where evidence is improperly rejected, and such evidence tends to prove an item which may or may not have been taken into account by the jury in fixing the amount in their verdict, and it is manifest and plain that outside of such item, under the evidence, there was ground for finding a verdict for at least the amount found by the jury, and a new trial is refused by the court below, the court of appeals will not for that cause reverse the judgment. Bartlett v. Patton, 33 W. Va. 71, 10 S. E. Rep. 21.

Though the chancellor has erroneously excluded evidence, yet if the court of appeals upon full consideration of all the evidence, including that excluded, sees no error in the decree appealed from, it will affirm it. Rorer Iron Co. v. Trout, 83 Va. 397, 2 S. E. Rep. 713.

Exclusion of the deposition of defendant in regard to matters covered by allegations of his answers, which are responsive to the bill, is harmless error, the answer being itself evidence. Smith v. Smith, 92 Va. 696, 24 S. E. Rep. 280.

Questions.—Where a question is objectionable, but the answer is so indefinite and uncertain that the appellant could not have been injured by it, the decree will not be reversed therefor. Bullington v. Newport News, etc., R. Co., 32 W. Va. 436, 9 S. E. Rep. 876.

Prejudice Must Be Shown by Exceptions.—If a bill of exceptions to the ruling of the trial court allowing or refusing to allow a question to be answered by a witness, fails to give the answer of the witness, or what is expected to be proved by him, the appellate court cannot determine the relevancy, admissibility, or value of the answers, and the exception will not be considered. Childress v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co., 94 Va. 186, 26 S. E. Rep. 424; Nease v. Capehart, 15 W. Va. 299.

The party complaining in the appellate court of the rejection of evidence by the court below must state the facts or evidence in his bill of exceptions, from which it must appear affirmatively to the appellate court, that he was prejudiced by the rejection of the evidence. Taylor v. Boughner, 16 W. Va. 327.

G. ERRORS OCCURRING AT THE TRIAL.

Rejection of Qualified Juror.—Where a disqualified juror is put on a jury, it is of course error, but, where a qualified juror is improperly rejected, it is a wholly different thing. In such case the man taking his place is qualified and unexceptionable and a judgment will not be reversed for such cause, the appellant not being prejudiced. Thompson v. Douglass, 35 W. Va. 337, 13 S. E. Rep. 1015.

Allowing Defendant to Have Affirmative of Issue.—Though the order directing the issue be irregular, still such irregularity, as to giving the defendant the affirmative upon the trial of the issue, not being to his prejudice, he cannot be heard to complain thereof in the appellate court. Ogle v. Adams, 12 W. Va. 213.

Denial of Right to Open and Conclude.—The denial of the right to open and conclude the argument is error for which the judgment will be reversed unless it clearly appears from the record that he could not have been prejudiced thereby. Sammons v.

Hawvers, 25 W. Va. 678. See, however, Steptoe v. Harvey, 7 Leigh 501.

Unless however the party aggrieved makes a motion for a new trial in the court below, and, on its being overruled, excepts, he will be deemed to have waived his objections. Sammons v. Hawvers, 25 W. Va. 678.

Refusing Oyer of Bond.—It is not error to the appellant's prejudice, for the lower court to refuse oyer of a bond, if afterwards the oyer is allowed, when craved a second time. Vandiver v. Hyre, 5 W. Va. 414.

Refusal of View.—The appellate court cannot reverse the judgment for the refusal of the court below to send the jury to view the premises, unless it appears from the record that a view was necessary to a just decision. Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. Polly, Woods & Co., 14 Gratt. 447.

Remarks of Judge to Jury.—Where the court, on the trial of an issue, makes a remark calculated to prejudice the minds of the jury against the defendant, but at the same time tells the jury, that the remark has nothing to do with the cause, and ought not to influence their verdict; and a verdict is rendered for the plaintiff; it was held that such remark was no ground for reversing the judgment on the verdict. Brooks v. Calloway, 13 Leigh 466.

Statements of the court in the presence of the jury on immaterial points or such as cannot operate injury to the appellants though improper are not error for which the appellate court will reverse a judgment. Newlin v. Beard, 6 W. Va. 110.

Jury Usurping Functions of Court.—Where it is proper that the court, and not the jury, should pass on a matter, and find thereon, but a jury finds upon it and the court renders judgment, if the judgment is the same as the court should have rendered if it had expressly found on such matter, this error is harmless, and not cause for reversal. Miller v. White, 46 W. Va. 67, 33 S. E. Rep. 332.

Reading to the Jury from Law Books.—Reading from law books to the jury is not error for which the judgment will be reversed at least where they are read before instructions are given, or if read after they are given, if not in conflict therewith. Bloyd v. Pollock, 27 W. Va. 75, 142.

Remarks of Counsel.—Where the remarks of counsel in the closing argument, as to the result of a former trial of the case, were not, in view of the instructions of the court on the subject, prejudicial to the plaintiffs in error, the judgment will not be reversed. Taylor v. Mallory, 96 Va. 18, 30 S. E. Rep. 472.

In order to authorize the court of appeals to revise errors predicated upon the abuse by counsel of the privilege of argument, it should be made to appear that the party asked for, and was refused an instruction to the jury to disregard the authorized statements of the counsel. Landers v. Ohio River R. Co., 46 W. Va. 492, 33 S. E. Rep. 296.

Court Answering Question without Notifying Counsel.—A judgment otherwise correct will not be reversed because the court answered a question propounded by the jury, without notifying counsel. Bunton v. Danville, 93 Va. 200, 212, 24 S. E. Rep. 830.

Refusal to Sign Bill of Exceptions.—The court of appeals will not reverse a judgment, on the ground that the court below refused to sign and seal a bill of exceptions to its opinion overruling a motion for a new trial; if the weight of evidence exhibited supports the verdict. Shanks v. Fenwick, 2 Munf. 478.

Disregard by Court of One of Its Own Rules.—The disregard by a circuit court of a rule adopted by itself for the regulation of the practice there is not ground of reversal. Hudson v. Kline, 9 Gratt. 379.

H. ERRORS IN VERDICT.

Severing Damages.—In a joint action of trespass an instruction that the jury may sever in the damages, while erroneous, is not error for which the judgment will be reversed on a supersedeas by the defendant. Crawford v. Morris, 5 Gratt. 90.

Failure of Verdict to Set Out Character of Estate.—Where the verdict in ejectment fails to find the character of the estate which the plaintiff claims, he alone can complain of that, not the defendant. Elliott v. Sutor, 8 W. Va. 37.

Release of Excess in Verdict.—Where, under a lease, there may be recovery of monthly rental for a number of months, but not for all claimed by plaintiff, and he recovers a verdict for more than he is entitled to, he may release the amount beyond the proper number of months, and defendant cannot complain of it. Roberts v. Bettman, 45 W. Va. 143, 30 S. E. Rep. 95.

When the illegal part of the damages ascertained by the verdict of a jury is clearly distinguishable from the rest, and may be ascertained by the court without assuming the functions of the jury and substituting its judgment for theirs, the court may allow plaintiff to enter a remittitur for such part, and then refuse a new trial. Chapman v. Beltz, 48 W. Va. 1, 35 S. E. Rep. 1013.

Where plaintiff who has recovered a judgment which, as rendered, is clearly erroneous, seeks to avoid a reversal by striking out a part of the judgment, it is incumbent on him to satisfy the court either by materials in the record or by fair presumption, that this can be done without injustice to the defendant. If he cannot do this the defendant is entitled to have the erroneous judgment reversed. O. & A. R. Co. v. Fulvey, 17 Gratt. 366.

Failure to Give Nominal Damages.—The failure to give nominal damages, unless it be upon a matter which involves the settlement of a right other than a right to recover damages, is not a ground for reversal. Briggs v. Cook, 99 Va. 273, 38 S. E. Rep. 148.

I. ERRORS IN INSTRUCTIONS.

Giving.—It is well settled that the accused has a right to a full and correct statement by the court of the law applicable to the evidence in his case, and that any misdirection by the court, in point of law, on matters material to the issue, is ground for a new trial. Honesty v. Com., 81 Va. 283.

If a misdirection or other mistake of the court appear in the record, it must be presumed that it affected the verdict of the jury, and is therefore a ground for which the judgment must be reversed, unless it plainly appears from the whole record that the error did not, and could not, have affected the verdict. Kimball v. Borden, 95 Va. 203, 28 S. E. Rep. 207; Edmunds v. Harper, 31 Gratt. 637; Dinges v. Branson, 14 W. Va. 100; Danville Bank v. Waddill, 27 Gratt. 448; Rich. Ry., etc., Co. v. Garthright, 92 Va. 627, 24 S. E. Rep. 267; Clay v. Robinson, 7 W. Va. 348.

When an appellate court is of opinion that an instruction given to the jury by the court below is erroneous, the appellate court cannot undertake to determine that the verdict, notwithstanding the erroneous instruction, is right upon the evidence, and therefore to affirm the judgment. But the judgment must be reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial. Wiley v. Givens, 6 Gratt. 277.

This seems to be in conflict with the weight of authority. For full discussion, see foot-note to Colvin v. Menefee, 11 Gratt. 87.

An instruction given by the court, which, upon the statement of the evidence given by the party excepting, could not be injurious to him, is no ground for reversing the judgment. Colvin v. Menefee, 11 Gratt. 87; Clark v. City of Richmond, 83 Va. 355, 5 S. E. Rep. 309.

In the case of Payne v. Grant, 81 Va. (6 Hansbrough) 164, HINTON, J., delivering the opinion of this court, says: "But we may also add that if there were any error in the giving, or refusal to give instructions, that as the verdict is manifestly right, the defendant could not have been prejudiced thereby; and therefore, such error, if any was committed, can afford no ground for a reversal of the judgment complained of." Bernard v. R. F. & P. R. R. Co., 85 Va. 792, 8 S. E. Rep. 785.

Where the documentary evidence and other facts not controverted, establish conclusively the right of the plaintiffs to a verdict, whether the instructions or any of them properly state the law or not, the giving or refusing to give them cannot injure the defendants. Mercer Academy v. Rusk, 8 W. Va. 373.

An instruction that a killing is prima facie wilful and premeditated, and therefore murder in the first degree, held not prejudicial to defendant where a verdict of murder in the second degree, as rendered, was clearly justified by the evidence. State v. Morrison, 49 W. Va. 210, 38 S. E. Rep. 481.

A party in whose favor the verdict is found on all points is not prejudiced by instructions given or refused by the trial court. Washington, etc., R. Co. v. Alexandria, 98 Va. 344, 36 S. E. Rep. 385; Chapman v. Va. Real Estate Inv. Co., 96 Va. 177, 81 S. E. Rep. 74.

Where an instruction is given, which may be understood in two senses, in one correct and erroneous in the other, yet no exception or objection was taken when the instruction was given, and it is obvious, from all the evidence, that the prisoner could not have been injured by the instruction, it affords no ground for reversing the judgment and ordering a new trial. Thornton's Case, 24 Gratt. 67.

If an instruction correctly expounds the law, and is expressed in terms familiar to the books, and well understood by the judicial mind, and especially if the jury or the counsel do not ask an explanation of it, an appellate court will not set the verdict aside, because its true import and meaning possibly may not have been comprehended by the jury. Stoneman's Case, 25 Gratt. 887.

An instruction given at the request of the defendant, and covering only a part of the theory of the defense to which it relates, and tending to prove which there is evidence in the case, is open to criticism because of its narrowness; but if no general instruction stating the law upon such theory is given in the case, and the instruction is not in such terms as to give undue importance to the evidence referred to in it, and it is manifest that the giving of such instruction has not operated to the prejudice of the plaintiff, the judgment will not be reversed on account thereof. Maxwell v. Kent, 49 W. Va. 542, 39 S. E. Rep. 174.

An instruction as to the sufficiency of evidence upon a point which is immaterial, is not error for which the appellate court will reverse the judgment. Pitman v. Breckenridge, 8 Gratt. 127.

If an erroneous instruction be given to a jury by a court, and it appears, by other bills of exception, that the question, on which that erroneous instruction was given, did not arise in the cause, the judgment will be affirmed, notwithstanding the erroneous instruction. Hunter v. Jones, 6 Rand. 540.

Where there have been two trials of an action at law, the first resulting in a verdict for the plaintiff, and the second in a verdict for the defendant, and the defendant has failed to except to the rulings of the trial court in granting or refusing instructions at the first trial, neither party can object to such rulings in the court of appeals; the plaintiff, because he was not injured thereby, and the defendant because he failed to except. Marshall v. Valley R. Co., 97 Va. 653, 34 S. E. Rep. 455.

Refusal.—The court of appeals will not reverse a judgment on account of the refusal of the trial court to give instructions asked for, if the party has not been aggrieved by the refusal. R. & D. R. Co. v. Norment, 84 Va. 167, 4 S. E. Rep. 211.

Whenever a correct instruction is refused, the judgment will be reversed, unless the appellate court can see from the whole record that, even under correct instructions, a different verdict could not have been rightly found, or unless it is able to perceive that the erroneous ruling of the court could not have influenced the jury. Davis v. Webb, 46 W. Va. 6, 33 S. E. Rep. 97; Hall v. Com., 89 Va. 171, 179, 15 S. E. Rep. 517; Bogges v. Taylor, 47 W. Va. 254, 34 S. E. Rep. 739.

The refusal of proper instructions is not error, if other instructions are given covering the same questions. Arthur v. City of Charleston (W. Va.), 41 S. E. Rep. 171.

Rule in West Virginia.—It now being made the duty of the court of appeals to consider the whole evidence by legislative enactment, instructions, whether improperly given or improperly refused, are relegated to a position of minor importance, for the first inquiry must necessarily be as to whether the verdict of the jury is sustained by a decided preponderance of the evidence; and, if such determination is reached, all errors of law committed by the court during the trial must be placed in the category of harmless errors, unless they are so gross that a different ruling would have materially weakened or destroyed the preponderance of evidence. Bank of Huntington v. Napier, 41 W. Va. 481, 23 S. E. Rep. 800.

For the effect of error in giving wrong instructions or refusing correct instructions, see monographic note on "Instructions" appended to Womack v. Circle, 29 Gratt. 192.

J. ERRORS IN COSTS.—Whether a decree for costs is as it should be or not is a question that cannot be looked into by the appellate court, when the appeal cannot be supported on any other ground. Bogges v. Robinson, 5 W. Va. 402, 413; Franklin v. Geho, 30 W. Va. 27, 3 S. E. Rep. 168; Pritchard v. Evans, 31 W. Va. 137, 5 S. E. Rep. 461.

Where there is no other error in a decree or judgment, the court of appeals will not reverse it on account of an error in costs merely. Bogges v. Robinson, 5 W. Va. 402; King v. Burdett, 12 W. Va. 688.

But while an appeal does not lie to the court of appeals from a decree for error of judgment in the court below for costs, still where the cause is properly before the court upon subjects other than costs, although the court sees no other error in the decree of the court than in its decree for the costs, this court may correct the decree of the court below as to the matter of costs, and affirm the decree as thus corrected, although it will not reverse the decree because of error as to costs alone. Jones v. Cunningham, 7 W. Va. 707; Richardson v. Donehoo, 16 W. Va. 685; Farmers' Bank v. Woodford, 84 W. Va. 481, 12 S. E. Rep. 544; Graham v. Bank, 45 W. Va. 701, 32 S. E. Rep. 245; Ashby v. Kiger, 3 Rand. 165; Ross v. Gordon, 2 Munf. 289.

K. ERRORS IN PARTIES.

Defect.—If it appears affirmatively that a person, if made a party, would have been a mere formal party, against whom no decree would have been asked, and whose presence was not necessary for the protection of any of the defendants, the appellate court will not reverse a decree for his absence. James River and Kanawha Co. v. Littlejohn, 18 Gratt. 53.

Although necessary parties are not made, yet where they have set up their claims by petition eight years after the institution of the suit and their claims have been investigated on answer filed thereto, the decree will not be reversed. Triplett v. Romine, 33 Gratt. 651.

An appellate court will not reverse a decree, dismissing the plaintiff's bill for want of equity, because all proper parties were not before the court. Mitchell v. Chancellor, 14 W. Va. 22.

Improper Joinder.—A decree will not be reversed for improper joinder of parties, where the parties alleged to have been improperly joined are asking no relief for themselves, but simply united in a petition as evidence of their acquiescence therein. Ward v. Funsten, 86 Va. 350, 10 S. E. Rep. 415.

L. ERRORS IN INTERLOCUTORY DECREES.—Upon an appeal from an interlocutory decree for the sale of land, the appellate court will not reverse the decree because the court did not decree against an absent debtor or direct the giving of security as provided by law in behalf of absent defendants. The final decree may provide for these things. Kelly v. Linkenhoger, 8 Gratt. 104.

When a decree appealed from consists in part of an order of reference for a report upon certain specified matters and such other matters, as the commissioner may deem pertinent or be required by any party, if such order is justified by the pleadings and proofs as to the matters specified, the court of appeals will not, before such report is made and acted upon by the court below, reverse or consider the order, because some party under said general clause may require irrelevant or improper matter to be reported to the court. Sturm v. Fleming, 26 W. Va. 54.

Failure to Direct Inquiry as to Sufficiency of Rents and Profits.—The appellate court will not reverse an interlocutory decree of sale for failure to direct an inquiry whether the rents and profits will not pay the judgment within five years, if none of the parties ask for it, but will amend the decree, allowing the defendant to have such an enquiry and affirm it so amended. Ewart v. Saunders, 25 Gratt. 203.

Where the bill alleges that the rents, etc., will not pay off the debt in five years, and the answer simply contains a general denial of the averments of the bill, the decree will not be reversed for a failure to make the proper inquiry, but, the decree being interlocutory, it may be modified so as to allow it, if the appellant desires it. Johnson v. Wagner, 76 Va. 587.

cient ground for reversing an interlocutory decree, that no day was given to an infant defendant to show cause against it, after he should come of age: because such omission may be corrected in the final decree. Pickett v. Chilton, 5 Munf. 467.

M. ERRORS IN CHANCERY PROCEEDINGS.

Failure to Direct Issue.—The direction of an issue out of chancery is a matter of sound discretion. The mere omission to do so will not reverse a decree, unless it was asked for. West Va. Bldg. Co. v. Saucer, 45 W. Va. 483, 31 S. E. Rep. 965.

Failure to Let Commissioner's Report Lie Thirty Days.—Where a final decree is made upon a commissioner's report less than thirty days after it was returned to the court, and there is nothing to show that the cause was heard by consent, such error may be corrected by appeal, as there is no other mode of correcting it, but no other errors will be considered and the decree will be merely reversed with costs. Gray v. Dickenson, 4 Gratt. 87.

N. STATUTE OF JEOPAILS.—For the effect of the statute of jeopails in preventing the reversal of judgments in the appellate court, see monographic note on "Amendments" appended to Snead v. Coleman, 7 Gratt. 300, and also monographic note on "Judgments" appended to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 425.

O. RELEASE OF ERRORS.—A release of errors may and should be pleaded to a writ of error, and if a release is pleaded and found for the plaintiff in error, yet if there is no error, the court cannot reverse the judgment: and if the release be found for the defendant, a different judgment must be given, according as the error assigned is sufficient or not; if it is good error, the judgment must be that plaintiff be barred of his writ of error and not that the first judgment be affirmed. The same is true of a supersedeas. Hite v. Wilson, 2 H. & M. 268.

If an appellant, pending his appeal, convey all his right involved in the appeal to his adversary in the appeal, or in any way release error, the fact may be pleaded in bar of his appeal; but failure to so plead will not conclude the right of such adversary under his conveyance. Ward v. Ward, 50 W. Va. 517, 40 S. E. Rep. 472.

A party having obtained an injunction to a judgment at law upon the usual condition of a release of errors, omits to execute the release. Pending the injunction suit, he obtains a supersedeas to the judgment at law, but does not perfect the appeal by giving the security. There are repeated applications by him for a renewal of the supersedeas, which are granted, but he does not perfect the appeal. The injunction is proceeded in and decided against him, and he afterwards, more than ten years from the date of the judgment, asks that he may have a writ of error to the judgment at law, without giving security, except for costs, which is granted. His laches in perfecting his appeal being wilful, deliberate and repeated, and the application for the appeal, having been, under the circumstances, improper, the court of appeals will, upon motion by the appellee, dismiss the appeal. Ross v. Reid, 8 Gratt. 230.

Acceptance of Less Than Amount Claimed.—Acceptance by appellant of satisfaction of a decree giving him less than he claimed, will not amount to a release of error or estop him from appealing from such decree. Morriss v. Garland, 78 Va. 215, 235.

IX. ABATEMENT OF APPEAL.

A. BY DEATH OF PARTY.

1. PENDING APPEAL.

a. Generally.—Though there is no abatement of appellate causes in the court of appeals, whether at law or equity, and our statutes for revival of actions or suits have no application to them; yet a practice prevails there, probably borrowed in substance from that of the English House of Lords, in equity, requiring in case of the death of either party, a revival of the appeal or writ of error by consent or by scire facias. It is, however, a general rule of convenience and policy, applicable only where the death of the party is made known to the court and suggested on its record; and there may be circumstances under which the suggestion itself will not be permitted by the court. And if the appellate cause passes through the court without such suggestion, there is no ground for the imputation of error or irregularity in the proceedings there; and the judgment or decree of the appellate court is remitted to the court below, and entered upon the record there, and a revival then had there of the original judgment or decree in case of affirmance, or of that of the appellate court in case of reversal. Reid v. Strider, 7 Gratt. 76.

Appeals should be revived in the names of deceased's representatives, not in the name of the representatives generally. Buster v. Wallace, 3 H. & M. 217; Turpin v. Thomas, 2 H. & M. 139.

b. Death of Appellant.—Where appellant dies pending an appeal, his death should be suggested on the record, and the appeal revived by his executor by scire facias. Hudson v. Ross, 1 Wash. 74.

An appeal having abated at March term by the death of the appellant a scire facias to revive it may be awarded at the ensuing October term although the April term has intervened, in consideration of the short interval between the March and April terms. Buster v. Wallace, 3 H. & M. 217.

An appeal having abated at one term, by the death of the appellant; at the next term a scire facias was awarded on the motion of his administrator, who had qualified since the abatement, for the appellee to show cause why the appeal should not be revived. Gibbs v. Perkinson, 2 H. & M. 211.

Where an appeal is revived by the appellee by scire facias, the writ should be served on the appellant's executor. Hudson v. Ross, 1 Wash. 74.

c. Death of Appellee.—Where the defendant in an action of trespass q. c. f. dies after verdict and judgment against the plaintiff, and pending an appeal, the plaintiff appellant has a right to a scire facias against the personal representative of the defendant, though not against his heir, to reverse the judgment if he can. Harris v. Crenshaw, 3 Rand. 14.

In Daniel v. Robinson, 1 Wash. 154, the appellee being dead, an appearance was entered for the executors, and on the motion of their counsel, the cause was tried without waiting for a scire facias.

But in Wood v. Webb, reported in note to above case, the court upon a similar motion, refused to revive the appeal upon an appearance being entered and directed a writ of scire facias to issue, saying that the above case had not been duly considered at the time the motion was granted.

But in Meek v. Baine, 1 H. & M. 333, it was held that where two terms of the court of appeals had elapsed since the appeal and before the record was brought up, and the appellee having died since the appeal, his representative may have the appeal dismissed on motion without resorting to a scire facias. This case was distinguished on the ground that in Wood v. Webb, the appeal being docketed, the judgment might either have been reversed or affirmed, but in this case, the record not having been brought up, the appeal might only be dismissed.

Where the appellee dies, the court of appeals will not take up the appeal in the name of his executors, no appearance having been entered, especially where, a great length of time having elapsed since the appeal, the appellant may have satisfied the judgment, such a case coming within the reason of the general rule, 3 H. & M. p. 270, allowing one term, after new parties made, to prepare for trial; but a scire facias to revive the appeal in the name of the executors will be awarded. Scott v. Adams, 3 H. & M. 501.

Scire Facias Necessary to Have Benefit of Supersedeas Bond.—If, after a supersedeas obtained, the defendant in error die, a scire facias must be awarded against his executors, or administrators, and not a new writ of supersedeas, because the latter could not be considered as a continuing process, and consequently the executor could not sue upon the supersedeas bond first given. Keel v. Herbert, 1 Wash. 203.

d. Death of One of Several Appellants.—One of several appellants dies after the appeal to the court of appeals is perfected. Held, that either party, appellant or appellee, may proceed to have the appeal revived in the name of the representative of the deceased appellant; and the party wishing to have the case revived, must take measures to have it done. Raine v. Bank of Va., 4 Gratt. 150.

Where there are two plaintiffs in a supersedeas, if one of them die, the cause will abate as to him, and proceed in the name of the surviving plaintiff. Hairston v. Woods, 9 Leigh 308.

e. Death of One of Several Appellees.—An appeal from, or supersedeas to, an order quashing an execution against two defendants, need not, if one of them die, be revived against his representative, but should be proceeded on as to the other only. Bullitt v. Winstons, 1 Munf. 269.

f. Where Sergeant Acts as Administrator.—If the appellant dies, and no person will administer on his estate, so that the court orders the sergeant to take possession of it, no scire facias to revive the appeal, lies against the sergeant. Braxton v. Andrews, 2 Call 357.

g. Under the Statute.—Code, § 3305, provides that where a party dies after verdict and before judgment, the judgment may be entered as if he had not died. Section 3307 provides that if, pending an appeal, writ of error, etc., the death of a party, which, if it had occurred after verdict in an action, would not have prevented judgment being entered, be suggested or relied on in abatement in the appellate court, said court may enter judgment as if such death had not occurred. Held, that such statutes do not authorize the supreme court of appeals to enter judgment in a case in which the alleged plaintiff in error died before the appellate proceedings were begun.

The fact that, before he died, the alleged plaintiff in error assigned his cause of action to a third person, does not authorize such judgment. Booth v. Dotson, 93 Va. 233, 24 S. E. Rep. 935.

h. Unlawful Detainer.—Where the defendant in a proceeding of unlawful detainer dies pending an appeal by the plaintiff below, the cause cannot be revived. Chapman v. Dunlap, 4 Gratt. 86.

i. Ejectment.—If, in ejectment, judgment be given for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals; pending which, the appellee dies, the appellant cannot sue out a scire facias against his heirs, but he must bring a new suit. Tomkies v. Walters, 6 Call 44.

2. DEATH OF APPELLANT BEFORE PETITION FOR APPEAL PRESENTED.—But where the party in whose name the petition for the writ of error is presented, died before the petition was presented to the court of appeals, the writ of error must be dismissed. His personal representative is the party aggrieved and the person to apply for writ of error or appeal. Booth v. Dotson, 93 Va. 233, 24 S. E. Rep. 985.

3. DEATH OF ONE OF SEVERAL APPELLANTS BEFORE DECREE.—When, apparently, two defendants, by counsel, petition for an appeal, which is allowed, and so appear and prosecute the appeal, though, on the hearing, evidence is found in the case, tending to show that one was dead before the decree appealed from was rendered, yet, in the court of appeals, it appearing that the decree is erroneous, and the other appellant having the right to prosecute the appeal and have the decree reversed as to both, the court will not, of its own motion, institute an inquiry to ascertain whether the party be living; but will treat him as before the court, by counsel, and reverse the decree, with cost to both appellants. Rittenhouse v. Harman, 7 W. Va. 380.

Death of Appellee between Verdict and Judgment.—In Buckner v. Blair, 2 Munf. 336, it was held that no process of revivor was necessary in the court of appeals where the appellee died between verdict and judgment, there being no change of parties since the appeal.

B. BY DISSOLUTION OF CORPORATION.—In Rider v. Union Factory, 7 Leigh 154, it was held under the state of the law at that time that, where, pending an appeal, the charter of the company expired by efflux of time, the appeal abated on the ground that there was no one to represent the corporation.

Where the board of supervisors, the appellants, have ceased to exist, pending the appeal, either as a court or corporation, the court of appeals having judicial knowledge of the fact, will direct the appeal to be dismissed. Board v. Livesay, 6 W. Va. 44.

In Bank of Alexandria v. Patton, 1 Rob. 499, under the same circumstances except that the corporation had made an assignment of its rights in the subject of controversy prior to the dissolution, it was held that the case should proceed without notice of the dissolution.

See monographic note on "Corporations (Private)" appended to Slaughter v. Com., 13 Gratt. 767.

X. DISMISSAL OF APPEAL.

A. CONSTITUTES VALUABLE CONSIDERATION.—If the appellant promise the appellee, that if the latter will agree to have the appeal dismissed, the appellant will pay him the full amount of the debt, damages and cost then due upon the appeal, and the appellee consents thereto and the appeal is dismissed as agreed, the appellee may maintain assumpsit on this promise. The court may leave the question of damages in such a case, to the jury. Spotswood v. Pendleton, 2 Call 209.

B. GROUNDS.

Failure to Give Bond.—The dismissal of an appeal for failure to give the required bond, operates as an affirmance of the decree of the lower court, without any consideration by the appellate court. Hicks v. Brick Co., 94 Va. 741, 27 S. E. Rep. 596; Sites v. Wieland, 5 Leigh 80.

Failure to Bring Up Transcript.—An appeal terminates by operation of law by § 12, ch. 185, Code W.

Va., unless the record is filed with the clerk before the commencement of the second term after the appeal is perfected, unless the court, for good cause shown, allow it to be proceeded with, and a motion to dismiss the appeal is superfluous. Sydenstriker v. Beard, 4 W. Va. 707.

Where the appellant fails to bring up the record in time, the appellee may move the court of appeals to docket and dismiss the appeal, though he has only a copy of the decree in the lower court and the appeal therefrom. Wilson v. Caldwell, 2 Rand. 190.

Showing Good Cause.—In Craig v. Thorn, 3 H. & M. 269, the appellee's counsel having moved to dismiss the appeal because the transcript of the record had not been brought up within two terms after the appeal was granted and the motion being opposed by counsel for the appellants on the ground that, although he had used every exertion to obtain the necessary information from his client as to the cause which produced the delay in sending up the record, yet his remote situation had prevented him from acquiring the information sought through the postoffice, a rule was entered that the appeal stand dismissed unless the appellants show cause to the contrary before a certain date. On cause being shown before that date, the above order was set aside and the appeal placed on the docket.

Failure to Enter Appearance.—The counsel for the appellee may move to dismiss the appeal, for want of an appearance being entered for the appellant, before he opens the record, but not afterwards. Collins v. Lowry, 2 Wash. 75.

Allowing Two Terms to Pass.—If the appellant let two terms of the court of appeals elapse, after the appeal has been granted by the district court, the appellee may bring up the record, and have the suit dismissed, with costs; but, he cannot have the judgment affirmed, as he could have done if he had brought up the record at the second term, under the act of assembly. Mills v. Black, 1 Call 241.

Lapse of Five Years from Date of Judgment.—An appeal will be dismissed under Act 1872, § 17, whenever five years shall appear to have elapsed from the date of the judgment to the time when the record is delivered to clerk, and this applies although the judgment was rendered and the appeal allowed before the passage of that act, if the record was filed after it went into effect. Modisett v. Dayton, 11 W. Va. 339.

Motion to Speed the Cause.—The parties obtaining an appeal, failing to have it perfected by service of process upon the appellees, or publication where that is proper, the court will, on motion of an appellee, who has appeared, make a rule upon the appellants to speed the cause; and if they fail to perfect the appeal in the time appointed, or show good cause for their failure, the appeal will be dismissed. Michie v. Michie, 17 Gratt. 109.

Where notice is given that such a motion will be made on the tenth day of the term, Sunday is not to be counted as one of the days of the term. Michie v. Michie, 17 Gratt. 109. See also, Read v. Com., 23 Gratt. 924.

Appeal Taken without Appellant's Consent.—An appeal taken in the name of a party without his knowledge or consent, may be dismissed as to him, on his motion. Watson v. Watson, 4 Rand. 611.

Escape of Plaintiff in Error in Criminal Case.—Where a prisoner convicted of felony obtains a writ of error which is directed to operate as a supersedeas, and he then escapes from jail, the appellate court will discharge so much of the order awarding the writ of error as directed it to operate as a supersedeas to the judgment. And will further direct that the writ of error be dismissed by a certain day, unless it shall be made to appear to the court by that day, that the plaintiff in error is in custody of the proper officer of the law. Sherman v. Com., 14 Gratt. 677; State v. Conners, 20 W. Va. 1, 12.

In Leftwich v. Com., 20 Gratt. 716, it was said that the same order would have been made as in Sherman v. Com., 14 Gratt. 677, but, as the case had been heard and decided without information that the plaintiff in error was at large, the court held it proper not to set aside the judgment already entered in the case but permitted the same to stand in full force.

C. DISMISSAL BY CESTUI QUE TRUST.—Where an appeal is taken by a trustee and his cestui que trust and the cestui afterwards dismisses the appeal so far as she is concerned, such dismissal operates as a dismissal of the entire appeal. It appearing that the trustee was acting wholly in a representative capacity and had not suffered any personal injury from such decree. Ratliff v. Paten, 37 W. Va. 197, 16 S. E. Rep. 464.

D. EFFECT OF DISMISSAL.

On Parties Appealing.—The dismissal of an appeal has the same effect as an affirmance under § 18, ch. 178, Code 1873, providing that "After the dismissal of an appeal, writ of error, or supersedeas, no other appeal, etc., shall be allowed to, or from the same judgment, order, or decree." Cobbs v. Gilchrist, 80 Va. 503.

And this applies as well to the dismissal of an appeal for failure to print the record as for any other cause. Woodson v. Leyburn, 83 Va. 843, 3 S. E. Rep. 873; Barksdale v. Fitzgerald, 76 Va. 892; Beecher v. Lewis, 84 Va. 630, 6 S. E. Rep. 307.

Where three successive appeals are allowed from three decrees in a cause and the first two are dismissed, it seems that on the last appeal which relates only to the last decree, matters involved in the former appeals cannot be inquired into, under the spirit of § 18, ch. 178, Code 1873. Barksdale v. Fitzgerald, 76 Va. 892.

If one writ of error be dismissed for matter merely formal, the effect is, so far as any rehearing is concerned, the same as an affirmance in the court of appeals. Alvey v. Cahoon, 86 Va. 173, 9 S. E. Rep. 904.

On Parties Not Joining in Appeal.—But a dismissal of one party's appeal for lack of jurisdiction, will not effect the other party's right of appeal, if it satisfies the jurisdictional requirement as to amount and the appellate court will consider both causes, so far as they effect the party entitled to appeal. Tebbs v. Lee, 76 Va. 744.

A fair interpretation of the first section of ch. 185, Code 1868, permits any one of the parties to a controversy to appeal, or have a writ of error or supersedeas, in such cases as are designated by the statute, without prejudice to those who were not made party to the appeal, writ of error, or supersedeas; and that, notwithstanding one defendant took an appeal, writ of error, or supersedeas, and, under the statute, was deemed to have abandoned it, it does not militate against the right of, or, conclude, either of the other defendants, who were not parties to the appellate proceedings, from prosecuting an appeal, writ of error, or supersedeas, in the same matter within the time prescribed by statute. Adamson v. Pearce, 9 W. Va. 240.

Judge May Still Give His Opinion.—Although a writ of error be dismissed as improvidently awarded, still any judge of the court of appeals may give his opinion upon the merits if he so desires. White v. Ches., etc., R. Co., 26 W. Va. 800; Steenrod v. Railroad, 25 W. Va. 133, 138; Wills v. Jackson, 8 Munf. 458; Goolsby v. Strother, 21 Gratt. 107.

XI. REINSTATEMENT.

After regularly dismissing an appeal for want of prosecution, the appellate court cannot reinstate the same at a subsequent term, without a rule having been made upon, or due notice given to, the adverse party to appear and contest the motion. Cropper v. West, 4 Munf. 299. See also, Rule IX, 1 H. & M. VI.

If a suit be dismissed, by surprise of the appellant it may be redocketed at a subsequent term in the place where it formerly stood. Thornton v. Corbin, 3 Call 232.

An appeal taken to the court of appeals prior to the statute of February 1825, Supp. to Rev. Code, ch. 98, was dismissed after the statute was passed, for want of sufficient security. Held, appellants were not entitled either to have the appeal reinstated, or to have a new appeal allowed, on the terms provided by that statute, namely, on giving security for costs only, and taking the appeal without a supersedeas; not to have it reinstated on those terms, because before the said act, security to perform the decree was necessary, not to have a new appeal allowed under said statute, since that is forbidden by said statute after a former appeal, etc., has been dismissed. Sites v. Wieland, 5 Leigh 80.

XII. SUCCESSIVE APPEALS.

Except in the case provided for in the statute viz. where the appeal is dismissed for failure to print the record or to deposit with the clerk a sufficient fund for that purpose, where a writ of error or appeal has been dismissed (because of the failure of the appellant to give a new bond with good security when required by the court), he is not entitled to a second writ of error or supersedeas. Casanova v. Kreusch, 21 W. Va. 720; Perry v. Horn, 21 W. Va. 783.

Ch. 172, Acts 1872-3, providing that, if an appeal or writ of error be dismissed for failure to provide for the printing of the record within six months after the case is docketed in the appellate court, the case may be renewed at any time within five years from the date of the judgment, order, etc., appealed from, is only intended to allow one additional appeal or writ of error not an indefinite number of such appeals within the five years. Perry v. Horn, 21 W. Va. 782.

Second Appeal.—By the Act of 1825, Supp. Rev. Code, a second appeal cannot be granted after one has been dismissed. Sites v. Wieland, 5 Leigh 80.

XIII. JURISDICTION OF SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

A. GENERALLY.

Constitutional Provisions.—The provision in art. VI, Constitution of West Virginia, that the court of appeals shall have appellate jurisdiction in civil cases when the matter in controversy is of greater value or amount than $200 merely means that the legislature cannot make a greater amount necessary to give jurisdiction but they make the limit 200 or less. By the act of 1863 the amount was fixed at that required for an appeal to the district courts in Virginia, i. e. $100. Tompkins v. Burgess, 2 W. Va. 187.

Section 2, art. 6, of the Constitution of Virginia enumerates the cases in which the court of appeals shall have jurisdiction irrespective of pecuniary value, hence the act of March 12, 1884, conferring it at the instance of the commonwealth, in all suits instituted under the act of Jan. 14, 1882, entitled "An act to prevent frauds against the commonwealth and the holders of her securities in the collection and disbursements of her revenues," is unconstitutional and void, these cases not being among the cases enumerated in the constitution. McIntosh v. Braden, 80 Va. 21.

Appellate jurisdiction may be conferred without regard to the matter in controversy, provided the power of the legislature is not restricted by the constitution. McIntosh v. Braden, 80 Va. 217.

The constitution does not, proprio vigore, confer jurisdiction upon the court of appeals, and therefore whatever jurisdiction it exercises must be by virtue of statutory authority given in pursuance of the constitution. The provisions of the constitution in this particular are carried into effect by §§ 3154 and 3455, of the Code. Barnett v. Meredith, 10 Gratt. 450; Price v. Smith, 93 Va. 14, 24 S. E. Rep. 474; Gresham v. Ewell, 84 Va. 784, 6 S. E. Rep. 134; Page v. Clopton, 30 Gratt. 417; Prison Ass'n v. Ashby, 93 Va. 671, 25 S. E. Rep. 893; Cook v. Daugherty, 99 Va. 590, 39 S. E. Rep. 223.

The words "or some other matter not merely pecuniary" used in § 3455, of the Code, have the same meaning as the words "matters not merely pecuniary" used in the constitution. Price v. Smith, 93 Va. 14, 24 S. E. Rep. 474.

Jurisdiction Statutory.—The powers of the supreme court of appeals are statutory, it has no claim whatever to power from any other source; neither custom, prescription, long usage nor precedent have any effect. Clarke v. Conn, 1 Munf. 160.

Unless an appeal can be brought within some provision of the statute authorizing appeals, it must be dismissed. Hill v. Als, 27 W. Va. 218; Laidley v. Kline, 21 W. Va. 21; Childs v. Hurd, 25 W. Va. 530; State v. Hays, 30 W. Va. 107, 3 S. E. Rep. 177.

Jurisdiction Essential.—Until the court has legal possession of any cause, although it be upon their docket, it has no power over it but to dismiss it. Jurisdiction must in all cases precede discretion. Clarke v. Conn, 1 Munf. 160.

The defendant in error cannot question the jurisdiction of the lower court, where he is contesting the jurisdiction of the appellate court, for if his contention is sustained, the only order that the appellate court can make is one dismissing the writ of error. Railroad Co. v. Board of Pub. Works, 28 W. Va. 264.

Jurisdiction Must Appear Affirmatively.—Although the question of jurisdiction has not been raised it is the duty of the appellate court to consider it, and, unless the record shows affirmatively that it has jurisdiction in a case, to decline to take jurisdiction in such case. Shirey v. Musgrave, 29 W. Va. 131, 11 S. E. Rep. 914; Hill v. Als, 27 Va. 215; State v. Hays, 30 W. Va. 107, 3 S. E. Rep. 177; Adkins v. City of Richmond, 98 Va. 91, 34 S. E. Rep. 967.

Burden of Proof.—The onus is upon the party seeking revision to establish the jurisdiction of the appellate court. Harman v. City of Lynchburg, 33 Gratt. 57; Buckner v. Metz, 77 Va. 107; Southern Fertilizing Co. v. Nelson, 1 Va. Dec. 465; Saunders v. Waggoner, 82 Va. 316; Martin v. Fielder, 82 Va. 455, 4 S. E. Rep. 602; Com. v. Chaffin, 87 Va. 545, 12 S. E. Rep. 972; Stanley v. Hubbard, 27 W. Va. 740; State v. Hays, 30 W. Va. 107, 3 S. E. Rep. 177.

Hence where the appellant fails to show the amount of his judgment the court of appeals will decline jurisdiction. Southern Fert. Co. v. Nelson, 1 Va. Dec. 465.

Court Equally Divided.—Where the members of the court of appeals are equally divided on the question of the jurisdiction of the court of appeals, the jurisdiction of the court must be sustained and the case decided on its merits. State v. Hays, 30 W. Va. 107, 3 S. E. Rep. 177.

Consent and Acquiescence.—Neither consent, nor long acquiescence of parties can give the court of appeals jurisdiction. An appeal, therefore, (having been improvidently granted,) was dismissed on motion, five years after it was entered on the docket. Clark v. Conn, 1 Munf. 160; McCall v. Peachy, 1 Call 55; Shirey v. Musgrave, 29 W. Va. 131, 11 S. E. Rep. 914.

Act of 1792.—The Act of 1792, Rev. Code, vol. 1, p. 60, declaring that appeals, etc., from the district courts, shall be granted, etc., by the court of appeals on the same principles as appeals, etc., to those courts are granted from the county courts means that appeals, etc., lie in those cases and those cases only where they lie from the county to the district courts. Cooper v. Saunders, 1 H. & M. 413; Wingfield v. Crenshaw, 3 H. & M. 245.

Law Applicable.—The Code 1849, ch. 182, § 3, taking away the right of appeal where the matter in controversy is less than $200 and merely pecuniary, is applicable to all judgments, etc., whether rendered prior or subsequent to July 1st, 1850, unless the petition for the appeal, etc., was presented prior to that date. McGruder v. Lyons, 7 Gratt. 233; Crawford v. Halsted, 20 Gratt. 211, 225.

B. WHERE "MATTER IN CONTROVERSY IS MERELY PECUNIARY."

1. GENERALLY.—The form or character of the remedy or proceeding in the inferior court cannot affect the jurisdiction of the court of appeals under this clause of the constitution. No matter what may be the form of the controversy, if the decision of the inferior court, if erroneous, has caused an injury to the plaintiff in error, or appellant, to an amount greater than the jurisdictional amount, the court of appeals will review the case at his instance. And as the injury to the party who brings the case before that court, is the basis of its jurisdiction, it may happen that one party may have a right to have a case reviewed which the other may not. Dryden v. Swinburn, 15 W. Va. 234.

Affidavit Not Sufficient.—A mere affidavit that the amount in controversy exceeds $100 exclusive of interest and costs will not give the court of appeals jurisdiction when the affiant states no facts by which the correctness of his statement may be ascertained, and it does not appear either by such affidavit or by the record that the interests of the appellants are of such an amount that the controversy in relation to the matter of that value will be continued by the appeal. McCoy v. McCoy, 33 W. Va. 60, 10 S. E. Rep. 19.

Penal Bonds.—The court of appeals has jurisdiction to revise any judgment on a bond, provided the penalty amount to the sum limited by law. Newell v. Wood, 1 Munf. 555.

Where judgment is entered in a county court on a single bill for more than $100, that being the pecuniary limit at that time, to be discharged by the payment of a sum less than $100, and, on a writ of supersedeas from the district court at the instance of the defendant, the judgment is reversed, the plaintiff cannot appeal to the supreme court of appeals, the amount by which the judgment may be discharged, not the amount of the bill, being the true criterion. Lewis v. Long, 8 Munf. 136; Rymer v. Hawkins, 18 W. Va. 309.

2. IN VIRGINIA.—Where the matter in controversy is merely pecuniary and less in amount than $500, the court of appeals has not jurisdiction. Bransford v. Karn, 87 Va. 242, 12 S. E. Rep. 404; Shacklett v. Asylum, 87 Va. 312, 12 S. E. Rep. 678; Pattie v. Guggenheimer, 86 Va. 993, 12 S. E. Rep. 95; Clinch River Veneer Co. v. Kurth, 88 Va. 222, 16 S. E. Rep. 168; Craig v. Williams, 90 Va. 500, 18 S. E. Rep. 899; Cocke v. Minor, 25 Gratt. 246; Saunders v. Waggoner, 82 Va. 316; Martin v. Fielder, 82 Va. 455, 4 S. E. Rep. 602; Com. v. Chaffin, 87 Va. 545, 12 S. E. Rep. 972; Cralle v. Cralle, 81 Va. 773; Litchford v. Day, 87 Va. 71, 12 S. E. Rep. 107.

To give the court of appeals jurisdiction of a cause, except in certain specified cases, the judgment or decree must amount to $500, principal and interest, at the date of the judgment or decree, except where the claim of the plaintiff is for more than that amount, and he applies for the appeal. Gage v. Crockett, 27 Gratt. 735; Tebbs v. Lee, 76 Va. 744; McCrowell v. Burson, 79 Va. 290; Hartsook v. Crawford, 85 Va. 418, 7 S. E. Rep. 538; Cox v. Carr, 79 Va. 28; Hawkins v. Gresham, 85 Va. 34, 6 S. E. Rep. 472; Craig v. Williams, 90 Va. 500, 18 S. E. Rep. 899.

The court of appeals has not jurisdiction of an appeal from an order vacating an injunction restraining appellees from levying a f. fa. on a judgment for less than $500 principal and interest, on appellant's homestead effects. Pattie v. Guggenheimer, 86 Va. 993, 12 S. E. Rep. 95.

To give the court of appeals jurisdiction under the Rev. Code, vol. 1, p. 60, of an appeal from a decree of a court of chancery dissolving an injunction to a judgment, the matter in controversy must have amounted to $150 exclusive of all costs, whether incident to the original judgment or to the injunction. Cooke v. Piles, 3 Munf. 151.

Where less than $500 is allowed as compensation for land condemned by a railroad company, no appeal lies to the court of appeals although refused by the circuit court. Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Knopfs, 86 Va. 981, 11 S. E. Rep. 881.

In Reeves v. Waller, Jeff. 8, a writ of error was allowed although the principal debt was under five pounds, on the ground that that limitation applied only to the defendant.

Correction of Double Tax Imposed as a Penalty.—A writ of error will not lie to a judgment in a proceeding for the correction of a double tax imposed for refusal to pay a license tax, where the matter in controversy is less than $500, either on the ground that it is a criminal proceeding or that it comes under any of the exceptions enumerated in the constitution. Neal v. Com., 21 Gratt. 511.

3. IN WEST VIRGINIA.—The court of appeals has jurisdiction in civil cases, where the matter in controversy is merely pecuniary, only where the matter in controversy, exclusive of costs, is of greater value or amount than $100. Jones v. Cunningham, 7 W. Va. 707; Love v. Pickens, 26 W. Va. 341; McCoy v. McCoy, 33 W. Va. 60, 10 S. E. Rep. 19; Aspinall v. Barrickman, 29 W. Va. 508, 2 S. E. Rep. 795; State v. Blair, 29 W. Va. 474, 2 S. E. Rep. 333; Shahan v. Shahan, 48 W. Va. 477, 37 S. E. Rep. 552.

Where the only error in a decree is a possible one in a sum of $15, the court of appeals has no jurisdiction to correct it. Shahan v. Shahan, 48 W. Va. 477, 37 S. E. Rep. 552.

Where the appellant appeals on two grounds of error, together involving more than $100 but one of the claims is disallowed by the supreme court of appeals, and the other amounts to less than $100, that court, if the error be merely clerical or one which it could correct under § 6, ch. 134, of the Code of W. Va., would merely correct the error and affirm the decree with costs to the appellee, but, the error being judicial, and requiring the decree to be reversed, the said court will reverse it with costs to the appellee. Bee v. Burdett, 23 W. Va. 744.

The proceedings in a chancery cause, the decree for the plaintiff for his costs, and the proceedings and judgment on a forthcoming bond given on an execution issued on such decree, together constitute one proceeding, so far as a supersedeas from the court of appeals is concerned, when such decree is appealed from, and, if that court has jurisdiction to review the decree in the chancery cause, it will have jurisdiction also to award a supersedeas to the judgment on the forthcoming bond, though the amount of such judgment is less than $100. Vanscoy v. Stinchcomb, 29 W. Va. 263, 11 S. E. Rep. 927.

Cases Involving an Office.—Under art. 8, Constitution of West Virginia, giving the supreme court of appeals appellate jurisdiction of cases in which the matter in controversy is of greater value than $100, that court has jurisdiction of an appeal in a case involving an office, the fees of which during the term of office exceed $100. Dryden v. Swinburn, 15 W. Va. 234.

4. MATTER IN CONTROVERSY.—The term "matter in controversy" as used in reference to the jurisdiction of the court of appeals in § 2, art. VI, of the Virginia Constitution, means the "subject of litigation, the matter for which suit is brought and upon which issue is joined, and in relation to which jurors are called, and witnesses examined." Harman v. City of Lynchburg, 33 Gratt. 87; Gage v. Crockett, 27 Gratt. 735; Atlantic, etc., R. Co. v. Reid, 87 Va. 119, 12 S. E. Rep. 222; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Clark, 92 Va. 118, 22 S. E. Rep. 867.

The matter in controversy, in reference to the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court of appeals is that which is the essence and substance of the judgment and by which the party may discharge himself. Lewis v. Long, 8 Munf. 136; Umbarger v. Watts, 25 Gratt. 167; Rymer v. Hawkins, 18 W. Va. 309; Atlantic, etc., R. Co. v. Reid, 87 Va. 119, 12 S. E. Rep. 222; Smith v. Rosenheim, 79 Va. 540; Buckner v. Metz, 77 Va. 107; Hartsook v. Crawford, 85 Va. 418, 7 S. E. Rep. 538; Hawkins v. Gresham, 85 Va. 34, 6 S. E. Rep. 472; Kendrick v. Spotts, 90 Va. 148, 17 S. E. Rep. 853.

The matter in controversy is that for which the suit is brought or for which judgment is rendered, not that which may or may not come in question. Hawkins v. Gresham, 85 Va. 34, 6 S. E. Rep. 472.

On an appeal from a decree perpetually enjoining a sale under a deed of trust given to secure notes amounting to $500, from which a usurious discount of $52 had been deducted, the amount in controversy is the whole amount secured, hence the court of appeals has jurisdiction. Schmelz v. Rix, 95 Va. 509, 28 S. E. Rep. 890.

Where the grantee in a second deed of trust, which includes only a part of the land conveyed in the first, files a bill to sell the land conveyed by both deeds, and if that is not enough to satisfy both deeds of trust, then so much more of the land conveyed by the first deed as will do so; and the former is done, but the court refuses to decree the sale of the latter, which had been released without the knowledge of the grantor in the second deed, the court of appeals has not jurisdiction where the amount of the second deed remaining unsatisfied is less than $500, since that is the amount in controversy. Marchant v. Healy, 94 Va. 614, 27 S. E. Rep. 464.

By "matter in controversy" as to the appellants is meant the matter in dispute between the appellant and appellee in the lower court, hence where the amount in controversy is swelled beyond $500 by an assignment which was not recognized in the commissioner's report as confirmed by the court, but merely endorsed on one of the exhibits in the cause, the court of appeals has no jurisdiction. The case of Fink v. Denny, 75 Va. 663, is distinguished on the ground that in that case the commissioner's report and decree appealed from recognized the assignment, and thus the assigned claim had been judicially determined to be the appellant's property before the appeal was taken. McCarty v. Hamaker, 82 Va. 471, 5 S. E. Rep. 538.

Where a pecuniary demand in a suit in a circuit court is $95, and the answer of the defendant admits as due, and offers to pay $61.95, and the decree is against the defendant for $104.83, leaving the amount actually in controversy $42.88, there is no jurisdiction of an appeal by the defendant. Hedrick v. Mutual Guarantee Building & Loan Ass'n (W. Va.), 41 S. E. Rep. 118.

An appeal lies from an order requiring an answer to a bill of discovery, when the amount involved in the action at law in aid of which discovery is sought exceeds $100, exclusive of costs, although the order appealed from is not an order for the payment of money, nor one directly involving freedom. Hurricane Tel. Co. v. Mohler (W. Va.), 41 S. E. Rep. 421.

A chancery suit is brought in a circuit court by a surety in a forfeited forthcoming bond, to be subrogated to the lien of the judgment creditor on the land of a co-security and to enforce out of such land the payment of one-half of the debt and the costs of the original case and the costs in a chancery suit, which had been brought by the creditor to enforce out of the lands of the sureties the payment of the debt and costs, all the debt and costs in the original suit as well as the costs of the chancery suit having been paid by the complainant. Held, that in determining whether the court of appeals has jurisdiction on an appeal from the circuit court dismissing the bill, the subject in controversy must be regarded as a moiety of all the moneys paid by the plaintiff, whether on the forfeited forthcoming bond or the costs attending it, or the costs of the first chancery suit, and the interest on such sums. Clevenger v. Dawson, 15 W. Va. 348.

In a suit against the sureties of an administrator, who has defaulted, if the claims against the administrator are less in amount than $500, these claims, which are the measure of the sureties, liability determine the jurisdiction of the court of appeals and not the original claims against the estate, and that court will not have jurisdiction. Hartsook v. Crawford, 85 Va. 413, 7 S. E. Rep. 538.

In an action to recover assessments on a stock subscription, although the amount recovered be less than $500, if the defendant denies that he is a stockholder, and his subscription amounts to $500, the court of appeals has jurisdiction, since the validity of his subscription is in controversy. Stuart v. Valley R. Co., 32 Gratt. 146.

Where a decree finds a debt of $951.79 as due from a partnership, which is controverted by the appellant, the administratrix of one of the partners, and also decrees a debtor of the firm, to the extent of $2,196.93 to pay off this debt and then to pay one-half of the residue to the appellant, the matter in controversy is the $951.79, not the difference between that and one-half of $2,196.93, since she may have to pay the whole amount if said debtor fail to pay it, hence the court of appeals has jurisdiction. Mad-dock v. Skinker, 93 Va. 479, 25 S. E. Rep. 535.

In a suit to enforce the lien of a trust deed, if the amount of the lien is not less than $500, the court of appeals has jurisdiction although the property itself be of less value than $500, since the matter in controversy is the amount of the lien, not the property merely. Eacho v. Cosby, 26 Gratt. 112.

Although it is the amount in controversy in the appellate court that determines its jurisdiction and not the amount in controversy in the court below, yet where the amount of the judgment has been reduced below $100 by the payment into court of a part, the appellate court still has jurisdiction, if the plaintiff refuse to accept such sum in satisfaction of the judgment, since on appeal the whole judgment may be reversed, so that is the matter in controversy in the appellate court. Railroad v. Foreman, 24 W. Va. 662.

In Stone v. Ware, 6 Munf. 541, the circumstances that the amount of the usurious gain was less than $150, and that relief ought to be given to that extent only, was not considered, on an appeal from a superior court of chancery, as furnishing a valid objection to the jurisdiction of the court of appeals; the subject in controversy upon the appeal being the whole debt and interest, which amounted to more than $150.

Where appellants held notes, secured by a trust deed, amounting to $520.16, and appellee held notes, secured by same deed, amounting to $428, and upon a sale of the trust property, the proceeds amounted to $556, and the appellants claimed priority of payment; and on a bill being filed for a distribution of the fund, the court below divided it pro rata, giving appellants $286.72 and appellees $228, which, together made up the amount to be distributed after deducting costs, and from this decree appellants appealed, it was held that as appellee made no objection to appellants sharing in a pro rata distribution of the fund, really the "amount in controversy" was only the $228 paid to appellee, and this being "less than $500, exclusive of costs," the appellate court had no jurisdiction. Bachelor v. Richardson, 1 Va. Dec. 474.

Where Appellee Cross-Assigns Error.—Where appellee obtains a decree for $1,170.40 in a suit by appellant to enjoin the sale of land conveyed to secure a debt, but claims at the same date the sum of $1,792.46, the appellee may cross-assign error, the difference being more than $500, and that being the amount in controversy as to the appellee. Ware v. Building Ass'n, 95 Va. 680, 29 S. E. Rep. 744.

5. COSTS.—In determining the right of appeal, costs are never to be considered any part of the "matter in controversy" even in the absence of legislative prohibition. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Clark, 92 Va. 118, 22 S. E. Rep. 867; Hartsook v. Crawford, 85 Va. 413, 7 S. E. Rep. 538; Cox v. Carr, 79 Va. 28; Hawkins v. Gresham, 85 Va. 84, 6 S. E. Rep. 472; Duffy v. Fliggat, 80 Va. 664; Neal v. Van Winkle, 24 W. Va. 401.

So, where the appellant appeals only from the decree requiring each party to pay his own costs, the court of appeals will not have jurisdiction. Ashby v. Kiger, 3 Rand 165.

Where nothing was decreed against the appellant except costs, and he claimed nothing in the suit, though the original matter in controversy was sufficient to support the jurisdiction of the court of appeals, such an appeal cannot continue the original controversy as to the matter of the suit, and the appellate court will dismiss the appeal for want of jurisdiction. Garnett v. Childers, 2 Munf. 277.

But the court of appeals is not deprived of jurisdiction of an appeal on the ground that it is from a decree for costs only, where it appears that it was for costs of an entirely different proceeding, and the amount exceeds $500. Shipman v. Fletcher, 95 Va. 585, 29 S. E. Rep. 325.

An appeal will lie from an order or decree overruling a motion to quash an execution, although the matter in controversy consists wholly of costs, since such an appeal is not from the decree in the principal cause, but as independent of it as if it were a decree in an independent suit to subject realty to costs in a former suit. Taney v. Woodmansee, 3 W. Va. 709.

6. INTEREST.—Interest upon the judgment or decree is to be included, in determining whether the court of appeals has jurisdiction. Arnold v. Lewis Co. Court, 38 W. Va. 142, 18 S. E. Rep. 476; Stratton v. Mutual Assurance Soc., 6 Rand. 22.

In Arnold v. Lewis Co. Court, supra, there were two judgments one before a justice and another in the circuit court, and it seems to have been held that interest from the date of the first judgment to that of the second was to be included, so that this proposition is not in conflict with the succeeding one.

In calculating the amount in controversy interest is never to be estimated beyond the date of the decree. Hartsook v. Crawford, 85 Va. 413, 7 S. E. Rep. 538; Hawkins v. Gresham, 85 Va. 34, 6 S. E. Rep. 472; Duffy v. Figgat, 80 Va. 664.

An erroneous ascertainment of interest in excess of $100, when an adjudication and not a mere clerical error, is appealable to the court of appeals. Wick v. Dawson, 48 W. Va. 469, 37 S. E. Rep. 639.

7. DAMAGES.—The damages allowed by law, upon affirmance of a county court judgment by a superior court of law, are not to be reckoned as part of the "matter in controversy," for the purpose of giving the court of appeals jurisdiction. If, therefore, the judgment be for less than one hundred dollars, but would amount to more, by adding the damages, upon affirmance, an appeal does not lie to the court of appeals. Melson v. Melson, 2 Munf. 541.

In an action of detinue for the recovery of specific personal property, the damages recovered for the detention of the property will be added to the alternative value, named in the judgment, of the property recovered, in deciding the question of jurisdiction in the court of appeals, under § 4, ch. 113, of the Code. Davis v. Webb, 46 W. Va. 6, 33 S. E. Rep. 97.

8. AS TO PLAINTIFF BELOW.—When the plaintiff seeks a revision of the judgment below, if he claims in his declaration money or property of the value of not less than the jurisdictional amount, the court of appeals has jurisdiction, although the judgment may be for less, or for the defendant. Harman v. Lynchburg, 33 Gratt. 37; Gage v. Crockett, 27 Gratt. 75; Fink v. Denny, 75 Va. 663; Duffy v. Figgat, 80 Va. 664; Batchelder v. Richardson, 75 Va. 835; Hartsook v. Crawford, 85 Va. 413, 7 S. E. Rep. 538; Cox v. Carr, 79 Va. 28; Hawkins v. Gresham, 85 Va. 34, 6 S. E. Rep. 472; Kendrick v. Spotts, 90 Va. 148, 17 S. E. Rep. 853; Melendy v. Barbour, 78 Va. 544, 556; Arnold v. Lewis County Court, 38 W. Va. 142, 18 S. E. Rep. 476. See Marion Mach. Works v. Craig, 18 W. Va. 559. It is not the difference between his claim and the amount of the judgment. Pitts v. Spotts, 86 Va. 71, 9 S. E. Rep. 501.

That the plaintiff may enjoy it, his claim must not be less than the jurisdictional amount, principal and interest. Craig v. Williams, 90 Va. 500, 18 S. E. Rep. 899.

In determining the question of jurisdiction in an action for the recovery of money on contract, which comes to the court of appeals on appeal to the circuit court, and writ of error, the amount claimed in the summons must determine the question of jurisdiction. Case Mfg. Co. v. Sweeny, 47 W. Va. 638, 35 S. E. Rep. 853.

Where a set-off claimed to be over the jurisdictional amount is disallowed, its amount tests the jurisdiction upon appeal. Faulconer v. Stinson, 44 W. Va. 546, 29 S. E. Rep. 1011.

Although a decree is for less than the jurisdictional amount, yet, where the matters in dispute exceed that sum, the supreme court of appeals has jurisdiction. Minor v. Goodall, 8 Call 393; Rymer v. Hawkins, 18 W. Va. 309.

Though the sum decreed to the plaintiff in chancery be less than the jurisdictional amount or the bill be dismissed, still the plaintiff may appeal if the matter in controversy exclusive of cost be equal thereto, and this right is not lost because upon the hearing of the cause, the court of appeals determines that the plaintiff is not entitled to so great an extent. Rymes v. Hawkins, 18 W. Va. 309.

The same rule applies where the plaintiff claims more than the jurisdictional amount in his declaration, and there is a special verdict fixing the damages at less than that amount subject to the opinion of the court, and the court decides for the defendant on the law of the case. The plaintiff is not concluded as to the amount in controversy by the amount stated in the special verdict, but his claim is the matter in controversy and the court of appeals has jurisdiction. McCrowell v. Burson, 79 Va. 290.

Yet, to this rule, there are exceptions, and where, on an examination of the pleadings or record, the appellate court sees, that the real "amount in controversy" is less than the jurisdictional amount, exclusive of costs, it will dismiss the appeal or writ of error. Batchelder v. Richardson, 1 Va. Dec. 474.

If a judgment of a county or corporation court, being for less than the jurisdictional amount, exclusive of costs, be reversed by a superior court of law, upon a writ of supersedeas, whereupon judgment is entered that the plaintiff take nothing by his bill, etc., he cannot appeal to the court of appeals, notwithstanding his declaration demanded a larger sum than one hundred dollars. Henry v. Elcan, 2 Munf. 541.

Where the sum claimed in the plaintiff's bill with interest, and not including costs, at the date of the final decree complained of, exceeded the jurisdictional amount, and there is nothing to indicate that the sum claimed was fixed with the express view of getting jurisdiction in the court of appeals, the claim as made in the bill should furnish the criterion.

By this it must not be understood that the plaintiff by any reckless unfounded claim could acquire jurisdiction in the court of appeals, especially, if looking to the whole record, the court can see that the amount is claimed with a view of improperly acquiring jurisdiction in said court.

"If the claim is merely colorable in order to give the court jurisdiction, and that was made to appear, jurisdiction would be declined, for jurisdiction can no more be conferred than it can be taken away by improper devices of parties." Cox v. Carr, 79 Va. 28.

9. AS TO DEFENDANT BELOW.—But where the revision is sought by the defendant, the amount or value of the judgment at its date, determines the jurisdiction. This is the general rule. For exceptions to it, see 82 Gratt. 288; and the onus is upon the party seeking the revision, to establish the jurisdiction of the appellate court. Harman v. City of Lynchburg, 33 Gratt. 87; Gage v. Crockett, 27 Gratt. 785; Rymer v. Hawkins, 18 W. Va. 309; Duffy v. Figgat, 80 Va. 664; Hartsook v. Crawford, 85 Va. 413, 7 S. E. Rep. 538; Hawkins v. Gresham, 85 Va. 34, 6 S. E. Rep. 472; Cook v. Bondurant, 85 Va. 47, 6 S. E. Rep. 618; Kendrick v. Spotts, 90 Va. 148, 17 S. E. Rep. 853; Melendy v. Barbour, 78 Va. 544, 556; Greathouse v. Sapp, 26 W. Va. 87. See also, Marion Machine Works v. Craig, 18 W. Va. 559.

In order that the defendant may enjoy the right of appeal when it depends on the amount, the judgment or decree must be for at least the jurisdictional amount, principal and interest, exclusive of cost. Craig v. Williams, 90 Va. 500, 18 S. E. Rep. 899.

Where the defendant is the appellant, the "matter in controversy" is the sum decreed against him, not that sum plus the aggregate of the disallowed claims set up in the answer. Kendrick v. Spotts, 90 Va. 148, 17 S. E. Rep. 853.

Where the claim of plaintiff below is for less than the jurisdictional amount, the defendant cannot give the court of appeals jurisdiction by setting up a merely specious claim to a set-off, greater than that amount. Manchester Paper Mills Co. v. Heth, 1 Va. Dec. 776.

Jurisdiction is not conferred on the court of appeals by the fact that a set-off was improperly allowed to be filed larger than the jurisdictional amount. Case Mfg. Co. v. Sweeny, 47 W. Va. 688, 35 S. E. Rep. 853.

Where an action of replevin is brought to try the title to personal property, valued in the declaration at more than the jurisdictional amount, and judgment is rendered for the plaintiff, and $20 damages, an appeal lies to the court of appeals. Valden v. Bell, 3 Rand. 448.

Release of Part by Plaintiff.—Where the plaintiff recovers a verdict for the jurisdictional amount, he cannot by releasing five dollars of it deprive the court of appeals of jurisdiction of the case on appeal by defendant, but the judgment will be considered to be for the jurisdictional amount. Hansbrough v. Stinnett, 22 Gratt. 593.

10. ASSIGNMENTS.—A merely colorable assignment by one plaintiff to another, in order to give the court of appeals jurisdiction, will have no effect. Fink v. Denny, 75 Va. 663.

But one party plaintiff may acquire the claim of another by assignment, and if his claim is thereby brought up to the jurisdictional amount, the court of appeals will have jurisdiction, even though the assignment took place after suit brought, if before decree, provided such assignment was bona fide and not merely colorable in order to give the appellate court jurisdiction; but in the absence of proof to the contrary it will be presumed to have been bona fide. Fink v. Denny, 75 Va. 663.

An assignment of a judgment taken after suit brought but before decree, by which the appellant's claim is swelled beyond the jurisdictional amount, will be presumed to be in good faith and not merely colorable, where it is under seal and purports on its face to be for value, until the contrary is shown. Though, if the contrary is shown to be the fact, the jurisdiction will be defeated. Filler v. Tyler, 91 Va. 458, 23 S. E. Rep. 235.

11. APPELLANTS OCCUPYING REPRESENTATIVE CAPACITY.

Trustees.—A trustee suing for the recovery of a trust fund may prosecute an appeal from an adverse decision which involves a sum greater than the jurisdictional amount required by law, although, when he comes to distribute the fund, the amount coming to each distributee may be much less. Fleshman v. Hoylman, 37 W. Va. 738; Fleshman v. Fleshman, 12 S. E. Rep. 713, 34 W. Va. 343.

The trustee in an assignment for the benefit of creditors may appeal from a decree against him as the representative of the whole trust fund although none of the claims secured amount to the jurisdictional sum, if in the aggregate they do, and the trust fund itself amounts to that sum. Atkinson v. McCormick, 76 Va. 791; Saunders v. Waggoner, 82 Va. 816.

Where the aggregate of the claims of trustees under a deed of trust, the appellants, against policy holders exceeds the jurisdictional amount, though all the claims against the defendants severally are less than that amount, the aggregate of the claims is the amount in controversy and the trustees represent the creditors, hence the court of appeals has jurisdiction. Cabell v. Ins. Co., 1 Va. Dec. 610.

Administrators.—Where the whole amount decreed against an administrator is greater than the jurisdictional amount, though the amount decreed to each ward of the intestate is less, the court of appeals will have jurisdiction of an appeal on behalf of the administrator. Martin v. Fielder, 83 Va. 456, 4 S. E. Rep. 602.

Where in a suit against an administrator and the heirs of an intestate, there is a decree not against the administrator in solido but a decree severally against each of the heirs, for the sake of convenience, if the aggregate amount exceeds the minimum jurisdictional amount, though the several items are less, still the court of appeals has jurisdiction on the appeal of the heirs, since it is in substance a decree against the estate for the whole amount. Urdike v. Lane, 78 Va. 132.

Heirs.—Where a decree ascertains the amount due from intestate's heirs to be more than the jurisdictional amount, it is immaterial that the amount payable to one of the appellees may be found by the commissioner to be less than $500. Alexander v. Byrd, 85 Va. 690, 8 S. E. Rep. 577.

12. SUITS TO SUBJECT PROPERTY TO THE LIEN OF A JUDGMENT.

Where the Value of the Property is Above Jurisdictional Amount.—It is the amount of the judgment, not the value of the land sought to be subjected, that determines the jurisdiction in the appellate court, in a suit to subject land to a judgment. Pitts v. Spotts, 86 Va. 71, 9 S. E. Rep. 501; Smith v. Rosen- heim, 79 Va. 540; Showalter v. Rupe, 2 Va. Dec. 553; Cook v. Daugherty, 99 Va. 590, 39 S. E. Rep. 223.

So where suit is brought to enforce a judgment for less than the jurisdictional amount and to set aside a conveyance made after the lien of the judgment attached, it was held that defendants below could not appeal, on the ground that the bill admits the validity of the conveyance and the title of the grantees and merely seeks the enforcement of a lien existing at the time of the conveyance, hence is not a controversy "concerning the title or boundary of land," but merely pecuniary and involving less than the jurisdictional amount and the appellants might have discharged themselves by paying the amount of the judgment. Patteson v. McKinney, 88 Va. 748, 14 S. E. Rep. 379.

But in the case of Snoddy v. Haskins, 12 Gratt. 385, where an execution for less than the jurisdictional amount was levied upon a slave alleged to be of a great value and an injunction to restrain the sale of the slave was granted and afterwards dissolved, and an appeal was taken from that decree, and the question was, whether in such a case the court of appeals had jurisdiction, at the hearing the court of four judges was equally divided. JUDGES SAMUELS and DANIEL maintaining that the court had jurisdiction, and JUDGES MONCURE and LEE holding a contrary opinion. The question cannot therefore be considered as settled in Virginia, though in the case mentioned jurisdiction was taken and the decision of the court below affirmed on its merits.

Where the Value of Property Is Below the Jurisdictional Amount.—Where suit is brought to enforce the lien of a judgment against a tract of land, although the amount of the judgment exceed the jurisdictional amount, if the value of the tract sought to be subjected is less than that amount, the court of appeals has no jurisdiction. RICHARDSON, J., dissenting. Buckner v. Metz, 77 Va. 107.

The court of appeals has no jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from a decree in a controversy as to the liability of property worth less than the jurisdictional amount to be sold for taxes, although the taxes amount to more than that amount. Stanley v. Hubbard, 27 W. Va. 740.

13. SUITS TO SET ASIDE FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES.—In a suit to set aside as fraudulent a deed, conveying property worth $1500, or more than the jurisdictional amount, as stated in the deed, although the amount of the debts secured is less than the jurisdictional amount, still the "amount in controversy" is the property covered by the deed, hence an appeal may be granted. Kahn v. Kerngood, 80 Va. 342.

Where the original suit is to set aside an alleged fraudulent sale of a tract of land worth $800 for $50, on appeal, the matter in controversy is not the $50, but the land or its value, $800, hence the court of appeals has jurisdiction. Ayers v. Blair, 26 W. Va. 558.

The court distinguished this case from that of Rymer v. Hawkins, 18 W. Va. 309, where the suit was to subject land to the lien of a judgment for less than $100, it being held in that case that whatever the value of the land, the appellant could discharge it by paying less than $100 hence that was the amount in controversy and the court of appeals had not jurisdiction, but in this case the appellant could not relieve his land by paying the $50. Ayers v. Blair, 26 W. Va. 558.

14. CONSOLIDATED CLAIMS.

Plaintiffs Appellant—Claims Separate and —Where the jurisdiction of the court of appeals is fixed by the amount in controversy, and the claim of each of several complainants is less than $500, and the decision of the trial court is adverse to the claim, the court of appeals has no jurisdiction of the appeal, and, if awarded, it will be dismissed. Gilman v. Ryan, 95 Va. 494, 28 S. E. Rep. 875.

In a creditors' bill to subject the debtor's land, in order to entitle the plaintiffs to appeal, the amount of each judgment must not be less than $500. It is not sufficient that the aggregate amount of all the judgments is not less than $500, since their claims are separate and distinct. Umbarger v. Watts, 25 Gratt. 167; Rymer v. Hawkins, 18 W. Va. 309; Fink v. Denny, 75 Va. 663; Thompson v. Adams, 82 Va. 672; Craig v. Williams, 90 Va. 500, 18 S. E. Rep. 899.

Where a decree ordering the sale of land to satisfy liens, none of which amounts to $100, is reversed on bill of review or petition for rehearing, the court of appeals has no jurisdiction of an appeal from the decree of reversal. Deaton v. Mitchell, 45 W. Va. 670, 31 S. E. Rep. 968.

Where creditors file their bill to set aside a deed as fraudulent, if the claims of none of them amount to $500 the court of appeals cannot entertain their appeal. The fact that other creditors whose claims amount to more than the required amount have filed their petition in the cause is immaterial, if they were filed without leave of court, since they are not parties to the suit. Walter v. Chichester, 84 Va. 723, 6 S. E. Rep. 1.

Where the appellants' claims are separate and distinct and evidenced by separate judgments rendered in independent actions, and neither plaintiff has any interest or privity in the judgments of the others, their several claims cannot be consolidated so as to give the court of appeals jurisdiction. Saunders v. Waggoner, 82 Va. 316; Southern Fertilizing Co. v. Nelson, 1 Va. Dec. 465.

It is not the value of the entire property sought to be subjected which is the matter in controversy, but the amount of each separate judgment. Southern Fertilizing Co. v. Nelson, 1 Va. Dec. 465.

Where the amount involved in each case is less than $500 the appeals in several cases cannot be united so as to give the court of appeals jurisdiction. Lawson v. Bransford, 87 Va. 75, 12 S. E. Rep. 108; Gregory v. Bransford, 87 Va. 77, 12 S. E. Rep. 109.

Where the claims of one of the appellants is less than $500, it cannot help him that another appellant whose claim is greater than $500 unites with him in the appeal, their claims being separate and distinct, but his appeal must be dismissed. Tebbs v. Lee, 76 Va. 744; Hartsook v. Crawford, 85 Va. 413, 7 S. E. Rep. 538.

Where the interests are distinct and separate on the part of the appellants, the decree may be reversed as to one, and dismissed as to another, as having been improperly awarded, because the subject of controversy, as to him, is less than $500. Craig v. Williams, 90 Va. 500, 18 S. E. Rep. 899; Cocke v. Minor, 25 Gratt. 246, 260.

In Claiborne v. Gross, 7 Leigh 331, it was held that where two suits by two judgment creditors to set aside a fraudulent conveyance were consolidated, and then dismissed and both plaintiffs appealed, and in one of the suits, the amount in controversy was less than the jurisdictional amount, the appeal in that suit should be dismissed. Rymer v. Hawkins, 18 W. Va. 309.

Several beneficiaries under a deed of trust unite in a bill against the trustee for a settlement of his account, and a distribution of the proceeds remaining in his hands, and obtain a decree against him directing him to pay to each complainant in severally a separate amount, as ascertained by a commissioner in chancery. One item of $250 charged against him in the bill is disallowed by the commissioner, exception taken by the complainants and their exception overruled, the report confirmed, and the complainants obtain an appeal to the court of appeals. Held, the appeal must be dismissed as improvidently awarded, because the several interests of the appellants in the disputed item amount to less than $100, and as to them, therefore, the subject in controversy is not sufficient to give the court of appeals jurisdiction. Fleshman v. Fleshman, 34 W. Va. 342, 12 S. E. Rep. 718.

And it is equally well settled that, if several distributees are proceeding, each for his own distributive share, against the trustee, then the jurisdiction of the appellate court is determined as to each one separately, and, if any distributee claims less than the jurisdictional amount, the appeal as to him, should be dismissed as improvidently awarded. Fleshman v. Fleshman, 34 W. Va. 342, 12 S. E. Rep. 714.

Where the plaintiff in a suit in equity seeks relief on account of deficiencies in two distinct tracts of land, and it is clearly shown by both the pleadings and proofs in the cause that there is in fact no deficiency as to one of the tracts, and the value of the deficiency in the other is less than $100, and relief is denied in the circuit court, the court of appeals has no jurisdiction to review the decree of the circuit court. Currey v. Lawler, 29 W. Va. 111, 11 S. E. Rep. 897.

Claims Joint.—But where the amount in controversy involved in the appeal is above the jurisdictional amount as to one of the appellants, the question is properly before the court of appeals as to that one: and when the questions as to all others are identical, and the claims have been consolidated and heard together, the validity or invalidity of the decree will affect them all, and involve the validity of the decree as to all and in all respects, and the appeal will not be dismissed as to them, though their claims be for less than $500. The interests in such case are such that they cannot be severed in any court where they are considered, and the decision in the court of appeals as to the rights of one will conclude the rights of all in like condition. Craig v. Williams, 90 Va. 500, 18 S. E. Rep. 899; Witz v. Osburn, 83 Va. 227, 2 S. E. Rep. 33; Atkinson v. McCormick, 76 Va. 791.

Where an appeal is presented by several creditors secured by a deed of trust, if some of the debts secured are above the jurisdictional amount, the appeal will be entertained as to all of them, since their interests are identical, and a reversal will enure to the benefit of all. Atkinson v. Beckett, 34 W. Va. 584, 12 S. E. Rep. 717.

Where the same party brings three separate suits on three notes, which are consolidated into one, if the aggregate of the plaintiff's claims is not less than $500, the court of appeals has jurisdiction. Devries v. Johnston, 27 Gratt. 805.

Defendants Appellants.—It is not the amount decreed to the several plaintiffs but the aggregate amount decreed against the defendant, which declides the defendant's right to appeal, hence, if the aggregate of the sums decreed against the defendant amounts to $500, he may appeal, though none of the sums decreed to the several plaintiffs amount to that sum. Hicks v. Brick Co., 94 Va. 741, 27 S. E. Rep. 596.

The debtor in such case may appeal when the aggregate of the judgments sought to be enforced against him is not less than $500. Winch., etc., R. Co. v. Colfelt, 27 Gratt. 777.

The owner of property, which creditors are seeking to subject to their debts when the total of the debts is as much as $500, although severally the claims be less, may appeal. Craig v. Williams, 90 Va. 500, 18 S. E. Rep. 899.

The court of appeals has jurisdiction where the amount in controversy exceeds the minimum jurisdictional amount, though the judgment is not entire, but divided into smaller sums payable to the persons respectively entitled. Peters v. McWilliams, 78 W. Va. 567.

15. CONTROVERSY OF JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT MUST BE CONTINUED IN APPELLATE COURT.—The matter in controversy in the lower court must not only equal the jurisdictional amount, but the controversy in relation to matters of that value must be continued by the appeal. Duffy v. Fliggat, 80 Va. 664; Hartsook v. Crawford, 85 Va. 413, 7 S. E. Rep. 535; Hawkins v. Gresham, 85 Va. 34, 6 S. E. Rep. 472; Ashby v. Kiger, 3 Rand. 165; Ross v. Gordon, 3 Munf. 289; Rymer v. Hawkins, 18 W. Va. 309; Greathouse v. Sapp, 26 W. Va. 87; Jones v. Cunningham, 7 W. Va. 707.

Where the final decree is not appealed from, and the controversy is only as to a surplus, below the jurisdictional amount, the appeal does not continue the original controversy and will be dismissed. McKinney v. Kirk, 9 W. Va. 26.

Although a decree ascertains that certain land worth more than $100 is subject to liens amounting to more than $100 in the aggregate, yet if the only controversy in the court of appeals is whether two of the debts, amounting together to less than $100, are liens on the land, the court of appeals has no jurisdiction and the appeals must be dismissed. Morrison v. Goodwin, 28 W. Va. 328.

Though the plaintiff's claim be originally large enough to give the court of appeals jurisdiction, if the defendant admits the plaintiffs' claim in part, so that the only amount concerning which there is any controversy is less than $500, the court of appeals will not have jurisdiction. Batchelder v. Richardson, 75 Va. 835.

When some of the questions litigated in the inferior court are decided by that court in favor of the appellant, or a part of the sum claimed by him has been recovered or settled before the appeal is taken, the actual amount still in controversy, and not that involved in the suit as originally framed, determines the jurisdiction of the court of appeals. The amount in controversy continued by the appeal must exceed one hundred dollars or the court of appeals will not have jurisdiction. Neal v. Van Winkle, 24 W. Va. 401; Love v. Pickens, 26 W. Va. 341.

Where the only error complained of in the decree is that it required the sum of $975 to be divided amongst five instead of four heirs and hence required each of the four heirs to pay one fourth of what they had received or $48.75 to the fifth heir, such decree is not appealable by the four heirs, whether $195 or $48.75 be considered the matter in controversy.

being less than the jurisdictional amount. Whitmer v. Spitzer, 81 Va. 64.

Where, upon a motion to quash an execution, a credit is allowed the debtor on the execution, a writ of error to such judgment will be dismissed where the amount of the credit is less than $500, since that is the matter in controversy not the amount of the execution. Campbell v. Smith, 32 Gratt. 288.

The court of appeals cannot entertain an appeal by the plaintiff in the lower court from the refusal of the district court to enter judgment on a verdict for a sum below the jurisdictional amount, although the amount claimed in the declaration exceeds the jurisdictional amount. Hepburn v. Lewis, 2 Call 497.

16. FRAUD ON JURISDICTION.—Jurisdiction can no more be conferred than it can be taken away by fraud or improper device. Fink v. Denny, 75 Va. 668.

C. MATTERS NOT MERELY PECUNIARY.

1. MUST BE DIRECTLY THE SUBJECT OF CONTROVERSY.—If the jurisdiction of the court of appeals is invoked on the ground that the litigation draws in question a freehold or franchise, or the title or boundaries of land, or some matter not merely pecuniary, these jurisdictional matters must be directly the subject of controversy, and not merely incidentally and collaterally involved. Cook v. Daugherty, 99 Va. 590, 39 S. E. Rep. 223; Hutchinson v. Kellam, 3 Munf. 202; Greathouse v. Sapp, 26 W. Va. 87.

2. CONTROVERSIES TOUCHING THE TITLE OR BOUNDARIES OF LAND.

a. Generally.—If, therefore, in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, the damages recovered be less than one hundred dollars, the defendant cannot appeal to the court of appeals; notwithstanding it appears from the record that the title, or bounds of land, were drawn in question. Hutchinson v. Kellam, 3 Munf. 202; Greathouse v. Sapp, 26 W. Va. 87.

Under the language of the Code 1849, ch. 182, § 2, providing that no petition for an appeal, etc., should be presented to the court of appeals when the "matter in controversy" was merely pecuniary and not of greater amount than $200 exclusive of costs, it was held in Clark v. Brown, 8 Gratt. 549, that it was not sufficient that some matters not merely pecuniary were drawn in question, and that the court would not have jurisdiction of an appeal from an action of trespass on the case for a nuisance, although the freehold was drawn in question, if the damages awarded were less than $200.

Where neither the right of a railroad company to take the land nor the title of defendant to the land is contested but the only matter in dispute is the amount of damages, the "matter in controversy" is "merely pecuniary" and must not be less than $500. Atlantic, etc., R. Co. v. Reid, 87 Va. 119, 12 S. E. Rep. 222.

b. Unlawful Detainer.—The court of appeals has jurisdiction in all controversies concerning the title of lands, irrespective of the amount in controversy and it is immaterial whether the possession or the title is in question; hence, it has jurisdiction in cases of unlawful detainer. Pannill v. Coles, 81 Va. 380; Gorman v. Steed, 1 W. Va. 1.

c. Estate Taken under Will.—The grantee in a deed of trust has a right to appeal irrespective of the amount involved, where the question is as to the estate he took through his grantor under a will, and thus concerns the title to land. Sellers v. Reed, 88 Va. 377, 13 S. E. Rep. 754.

d. Decree Allowing Widow Homestead.—The court of appeals has jurisdiction of an appeal from a decree allowing a widow a homestead, by an heir seeking partition of the real estate and denying the right to the homestead, although the value of that part claimed by her is less than $500, since the controversy concerns the title of the widow to the homestead. Barker v. Jenkins, 84 Va. 895, 6 S. E. Rep. 459.

Judgment Removing a Trustee of Land.—The judgment of the circuit court removing the trustees of church property under § 9, ch. 77, Code Va. 1860, and appointing others is reviewable in the court of appeals being rendered in a civil case within the meaning § 2, ch. 182, Code Va. 1860, and being a controversy concerning the title to land. Venable v. Coffman, 2 W. Va. 102.

e. Estate by Elegit.—A creditor extending the land of his debtor under an elegit, stands, in judgment of law, as if he had taken a lease for years in satisfaction of his debt; and by virtue of such extent, he acquires a title to the premises which may be the subject of adjudication in the court of appeals, as a controversy concerning the title to land. Lyons v. McGuire, 22 Gratt. 202.

f. Suits to Set Aside Deeds as Fraudulent.

In Virginia.—A suit to set aside deeds as fraudulent and subject the land conveyed is not a "controversy concerning the title or boundaries of land" within the meaning of the constitution, art. 6, § 2, so as to give the court of appeals appellate jurisdiction irrespective of pecuniary value, but the "matter in controversy" is pecuniary in such case and is the amount of the debt, to satisfy which the suit is brought, so that the debt must not be less than $500. Fink v. Denny, 75 Va. 668.

It makes no difference that it was necessary to attack as fraudulent a conveyance made prior to the rendition of the appellant's judgments. Thompson v. Adams, 82 Va. 672.

In West Virginia.—In a suit to subject land to a debt and set aside a deed from the debtor as fraudulent, there is a decree subjecting the land. Though the debt is less than $100, yet the alienae holding under such deed may appeal, because the case involves the title to the land, within the meaning of art. 8, § 3, of the Constitution. McClagherty v. Morgan, 36 W. Va. 191, 14 S. E. Rep. 992.

In Parker v. Valentine, 27 W. Va. 677, where land worth $150 was decreed to be sold in a suit to set aside a conveyance of said land as fraudulent, an appeal was allowed to the grantee on the ground that the land to be subjected was worth more than $100 though the judgment was for less than $100. But in McClagherty v. Morgan, 36 W. Va. 191, 14 S. E. Rep. 992, this decision was held right, but it was put on the ground that it was a controversy concerning the title or boundaries of land.

But the debtor or grantor in the fraudulent deed could not appeal since the controversy as to him was merely pecuniary and the amount involved was merely pecuniary and less than $100. Parker v. Valentine, 27 W. Va. 677.

g. Suits to Enforce a Lien on Land.—A suit brought to enforce the lien of a judgment against land is not a suit "concerning the title or boundaries of land" so as to give the court of appeals jurisdiction irrespective of pecuniary amount. Buckner v. Metz, 77 Va. 107; Faulconer v. Stinson, 44 W. Va. 546, 29 S. E. Rep. 1011.

In a suit to subject lands to the payment of the lien of a judgment, where the defendant appeals, the jurisdiction of the court of appeals is regulated by the amount decreed against him, or declared to be a lien on the land. The "title or boundary of land" is not involved, although the appeal be taken by one who is not the judgment debtor, and the controversy is over the liability of the land to the lien of the judgment. Cash v. Humphreys, 98 Va. 477, 36 S. E. Rep. 517.

A creditors' bill to subject the debtor's land to their judgments is not a controversy concerning the "title or bound of lands" so as to give the supreme court of appeals jurisdiction irrespective of pecuniary amount. Umbarger v. Watts, 25 Gratt. 167.

The fact that a claim of homestead arises in a suit to subject land to the lien of a judgment, does not make a case "concerning the title or boundaries of land." Smith v. Rosenheim, 79 Va. 540; Buckner v. Metz, 77 Va. 107, RICHARDSON, J., dissenting; Cook v. Daugherty, 99 Va. 590, 39 S. E. Rep. 223.

The right to subject land to a lien thereon for taxes is not a controversy concerning the title to the land, and if a decree for such taxes amounts to less than $500, no appeal lies therefrom to the court of appeals. Florance v. Morien, 98 Va. 26, 34 S. E. Rep. 890.

h. Decree Ordering the Sale of Land.—The fact that land is decreed to be sold unless the sum decreed against the defendant is paid, does not make it a controversy, touching the "title or boundaries of land"; the pecuniary demand is "the matter in controversy." Cook v. Bondurant, 85 Va. 47, 6 S. E. Rep. 618.

3. RIGHT TO LEVY TOLLS OR TAXES.—Under art. VI, § 2 of the Constitution, the court of appeals has jurisdiction of an appeal or writ of error irrespective of the amount involved where the right of a county or corporation to levy taxes is involved, as in an action to recover money paid as taxes on the ground that the county had no right to levy them. Prince George County v. Atlantic, etc., R. Co., 87 Va. 288, 12 S. E. Rep. 667.

Where a franchise is drawn in question, e. g. the right of the board of supervisors to levy a tax, the court of appeals has jurisdiction irrespective of the amount involved. Board v. Catlett, 86 Va. 158, 9 S. E. Rep. 999; City of Staunton v. Stout, 86 Va. 321, 10 S. E. Rep. 5.

Under § 8, art. 8 of the Constitution of West Virginia giving appellate jurisdiction to the court of appeals "irrespective of the amount in controversy" in all cases "concerning the right of a corporation or county to levy tolls or taxes," it is not enough that the right of the corporation to levy tolls is drawn in question, but the right to levy tolls must be the direct subject of controversy. Hence where the subject of controversy is merely the amount of tolls under the circumstances of the case and not the right to levy tolls, the court of appeals has no jurisdiction. Miller v. Navigation Co., 32 W. Va. 46, 9 S. E. Rep. 57.

So the court of appeals has not jurisdiction of a writ of error to a case where the right of a county to levy taxes, is not in dispute, but only the valuation of the land. Mackin v. County Court, 38 W. Va. 838, 18 S. E. Rep. 632.

The court of appeals has not jurisdiction of a writ of error to a judgment for less than $500 in an action of assumpsit against the treasurer of a city for money paid for taxes to the state under the general assessment and tax laws of the commonwealth, neither the right to levy the tax nor the constitutionality of any law being involved. Callan v. Bransford, 86 Va. 536, 10 S. E. Rep. 817.

4. CONTROVERSIES TOUCHING A FRANCHISE.—The word "franchise" used in Act 1869-70, p. 322, means only such franchises as the constitution enumerates. Neal v. Com., 21 Gratt. 511.

Upon the refusal of the circuit court to grant a liquor license, an appeal or writ of error and supersedeas lies to or from the supreme court irrespective of the amount in controversy, it being a final judgment or order in a civil case touching the exercise of a right or privilege conferred by an act of the legislature. Leigton v. Maury, 76 Va. 865.

5. CONTROVERSIES TOUCHING THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF A LAW.—Where the constitutionality of a law is drawn in question, e. g. action of debt to recover a penalty imposed by such law, the court of appeals has jurisdiction irrespective of the amount involved. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Pendleton, 86 Va. 1004, 11 S. E. Rep. 1062; Pretlow v. Bailey, 29 Gratt. 212.

An order improperly refusing an appeal in a case tried by a jury in a justice's court, in obedience to the decisions of the supreme court of appeals, holding an act of the legislature allowing appeals in such cases to be unconstitutional, is a case involving the constitutionality of a law, and such appeal lies, although the amount in controversy is less than $100. Clark v. W. Va. Cent. & P. Ry. Co., 50 W. Va. 1, 40 S. E. Rep. 351.

Any proceeding which necessarily puts such validity in issue, whether it be by demurrer, plea, instruction, or otherwise, is sufficient to give the court of appeals jurisdiction of the case. Adkins v. Richmond, 98 Va. 91, 34 S. E. Rep. 967.

Where the jurisdiction of the court of appeals has been invoked in good faith to determine the constitutionality of a law, a writ of error will not be dismissed as improvidently awarded merely because, after it was awarded, but before hearing, the law has been held to be constitutional in some other case. And, having jurisdiction on one ground, it has it for all purposes, although the amount involved is less than $500. Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Powell, 94 Va. 268, 26 S. E. Rep. 828.

But a writ of error is properly dismissed, as improvidently awarded, where the jurisdiction of the court is dependent upon a question which was no longer debatable at the time the writ was awarded. W. U. Tel. Co. v. Goddin, 94 Va. 513, 27 S. E. Rep. 429; W. U. Tel. Co. v. Reynolds (Va.), 41 S. E. Rep. 856.

The court of appeals has jurisdiction on appeal of an action necessarily involving the validity of coupons cut from bonds issued under acts March 30, 1871, and March 28, 1879, relating to the funding and payment of the public debt, and offered in payment of taxes, although less than the jurisdictional minimum is involved, as the constitutionality of those acts is brought in question. Com. v. McCullough, 90 Va. 597, 19 S. E. Rep. 114.

One who has restrained an oyster inspector from collecting fees and fines under Code 1887, § 2134, as amended by act March 5, 1894, on the ground that the act is unconstitutional, cannot dispute the jurisdiction of the supreme court of appeals, to which an appeal may be taken in all cases involving the constitutionality of a statute. Thomas v. Rowe, 3 Va. Dec. 118.

6. CONTROVERSIES TOUCHING THE PROBATE OF WILLS.—Section 2, ch. 178, providing for an appeal by any person who thinks himself aggrieved by an order in a controversy concerning the probate of a will, is to be considered along with the provision of § 32, ch. 118, "or in any case wherein there is a final judgment," so that an appeal will not be allowed from any order, but only from a final order or sentence, so that an appeal allowed to the order of a circuit court setting aside the verdict of a jury against a will and awarding a new trial will be dismissed as improvidently awarded. Tucker v. Sandridge, 82 Va. 532.

7. CONTROVERSIES TOUCHING MILLS.—In an action on the case for consequential damages, occasioned by the erection of a mill, if the damages recovered be less than one hundred dollars, the defendant cannot appeal to the court of appeals, notwithstanding it appears from the record that the right to erect the mill was drawn in question. Skipwith v. Young, 5 Munf. 276. See monographic note on "Mills and Milldams" appended to Calhoun v. Palmer, 8 Gratt. 88.

8. MANDAMUS CASES.—The court of appeals has appellate jurisdiction by writ of error in mandamus cases, though the amount involved is less than $500, such jurisdiction being expressly conferred by art. VI, § 2 of the Constitution, and being included among the "matters not merely pecuniary" in § 3455 of the Code. Price v. Smith, 93 Va. 14, 24 S. E. Rep. 474.

9. CERTIORARI CASES.—Const. art. 8, § 3, giving the supreme court of appeals appellate jurisdiction in cases of certiorari, and not the clause fixing the court's jurisdiction by the value of the matter in controversy, determines the court's jurisdiction when error is brought on the ground that the circuit court refused defendant a writ of certiorari on a conviction by a town council for maintaining a nuisance. Town of Davis v. Davis, 40 W. Va. 464, 21 S. E. Rep. 906.

By § 3, art. VIII, Constitution of West Virginia, the supreme court of appeals is given appellate jurisdiction over certiorari cases, in the same manner as over mandamus and prohibition cases, i. e. without reference to the amount involved or the character of the case, and this though the commissioner's report confirmed by the county court, which is brought up to the circuit court on certiorari is only declared to be prima facie correct and the court might not otherwise have had jurisdiction on account of the want of finality. Board of Ed. v. Hopkins, 19 W. Va. 84.

In Board of Ed. v. Hopkins, 19 W. Va. 84, it was held that this jurisdiction over certiorari cases could only be exercised by writ of error.

The supreme court of appeals has no jurisdiction to review by writ of error or otherwise an order of a circuit judge refusing a writ of certiorari to the judgment of a justice on the application of the defendant rendered on the verdict of a jury, where the amount of such judgment is less than $100, and the matter in controversy is merely pecuniary. Section 3, art. VIII of the Constitution, giving the supreme court authority to review cases of certiorari, etc., without regard to pecuniary value applies only to cases reviewable by certiorari at common law, and not to such as have been made so by statute since the adoption of the constitution. Farnsworth v. Railroad Company, 28 W. Va. 816.

XIV. LIMITATION TO APPEAL.

A. GENERALLY.

1. LAW GOVERNING.—The law in force at the time an appeal is allowed, governs. Sexton v. Crockett, 23 Gratt. 857.

Laws allowing appeals merely relate to the remedy, hence apply to rights of appeal already accrued. Nor will a provision protecting "rights accrued" protect a mere right of appeal. Crawford v. Halsted, 20 Gratt. 211, 225.

But in the act of 1870 to prevent this injustice a provision was put expressly, providing that no right of appeal under the old law should be affected by the new law limiting the right of appeal to two years. Crawford v. Halsted, 20 Gratt. 211, 225.

2. CHANGES IN LAW.—A statute placing a limitation on the right of appeal even from existing judgments is not unconstitutional. Gaskins v. Com., 1 Call 194.

A suit in which there has been a final decree is not a pending suit in the sense of the Code 1849, ch. 16, § 18, or ch. 215, § 2, providing that the repeal of previous acts should not affect a prosecution, suit or proceeding pending on that day. Yarborough v. Deshazo, 7 Gratt. 374.

Nor does this section operate so as to save to the party a remedy by way of appeal, etc., to the court of appeals, allowed by previous acts but taken away by the act in question. McGruder v. Lyons, 7 Gratt. 233.

The proviso in the act for limitation of suits as to rights existing when the Code took effect, contained in § 19, ch. 149, p. 594, is restricted to actions and rights barred by that chapter, and does not extend to the law limiting and regulating appeals. Yarborough v. Deshazo, 7 Gratt. 374.

3. STATUTES MANDATORY.—Whether the supreme court of appeals can grant an appeal after the time limited by law is a question of jurisdiction, not discretion; hence, the statute requiring an appeal to be taken in the vacation next after the term when the decree was rendered, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 64, § 50, a party allowing that period to elapse without appealing, is concluded from thereafter taking an appeal. Clarke v. Conn., 1 Munf. 160; Anderson v. Anderson, 2 Call 198.

4. NO OBJECTION NECESSARY.—"In appeals or writs of error to this court, whilst a motion to dismiss as improvidently awarded, or to quash, in advance of hearing on the merits, is advisable as singling out a preliminary point of defense, and saving labor, yet, so far as I am advised, or have seen from the reports, no motion is required to enable the party to have the benefit of the statute, but the court will ex mero motu dismiss a writ of error or appeal barred by the statute, or where not barred, will refuse to consider any appealable decree older than the limit, and the petition must show a right to appellate process from a decree or judgment within the limit, else it will not be allowed, or, if allowed, will be dismissed." BRANNON, P., in Morgan v. Ohio R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588.

Under the statute prohibiting the granting of appeals, writs of error or supersedeas after five years from the date of a final judgment or decree, the judges of the court of appeals have no authority to grant an appeal, etc., after five years or to consider the merits of a cause after the expiration of five years, though the objection be not taken by plea or otherwise and even though it be expressly waived by consent of parties. Com. v. Moore, 1 Gratt. 294.

5. APPLICABLE TO THE COMMONWEALTH.—The general rule of law, which exempts the commonwealth from the operation of the statutes of limitation, is applicable to original controversies, and not to cases in which the rights of the parties have been adjudicated by the judgment, decree, or sentence of a court of competent jurisdiction. In such cases, the question whether the merits of the judicial decision can be reviewed by another tribunal, must be governed by the laws prescribing and regulating the jurisdiction of the appellate forum. Hence the act of assembly, Supp. Rev. Code, § 81, April 16, 1881, limiting the time in which an appeal from, or writ of error or supersedeas to, any final decree, judgment, etc., may be taken, to five years from the date of such decree, etc., applies to the commonwealth as well as to any other party. Com. v. Moore, 1 Gratt. 294.

Decree on Petition to Reverse Barred Decree.—If decree appealed from was rendered within the statutory period of appeal, the court of appeals has jurisdiction, though the decree was on a petition to reverse a former decree pronounced anterior to the said period. Offending v. Ford, 86 Va. 917, 12 S. E. Rep. 1.

6. LACHES.—An appellant cannot be guilty of laches in taking an appeal, when it is taken within the period prescribed by law for taking appeals. Keck v. Allender, 42 W. Va. 420, 26 S. E. Rep. 437.

B. PERIOD OF LIMITATION.

1. FINAL DECREES AND JUDGMENTS.

a. Virginia.

Act of 1792.—Under the act of 1792 constituting the court of appeals, no writ of error lay to a judgment of the general court after five years from the rendition thereof. Gaskins v. Com., 1 Call 194; Overstreet v. Marshall, 3 Call 192.

Under Code of 1819.—No appeal could be taken after the lapse of three years from the date of a final decree. Elcan v. Lancasterian School, 2 P. & H. 53; Cocke v. Gilpin, 1 Rob. 20; Fleming v. Bolling, 8 Gratt. 292; Thorntons v. Fitzhugh, 4 Leigh 200.

Act 1830-1.—Under Act 1830-1, § 81, Supp. Rev. Code 1849, the petition for an appeal must have been presented within five years. Williamson v. Gayle, 4 Gratt. 180; Fleming v. Bolling, 8 Gratt. 292.

Under Acts of 1867 and 1870.—By the act of 1867 the period was reduced to two years, but by act of 1870 the period from the 26th January, 1870, to the 5th November was excluded from the computation of the two years, so that the longest period of limitation within which a petition for an appeal, writ of error and supersedeas could be presented, was two years nine months and ten days as to final judgments, decrees and orders rendered before the passage of the act of November 5th, 1870; and as to those afterwards rendered, such period of limitation was two years. Callaway v. Harding, 23 Gratt. 542; Ambrose v. Keller, 22 Gratt. 769; Sexton v. Crockett, 23 Gratt. 857.

By the saving in the act of 1869-70, five years instead of two were allowed to perfect an appeal, i. e. give the record to the clerk and execute the required bond where the decree appealed from was rendered prior to the passage of that act. Sexton v. Crockett, 23 Gratt. 857.

Under Code 1887.—The period of limitation to appeals and writs of error being one year from the date of the judgment or decree, a writ of error awarded after more than one year has elapsed must be dismissed. Thompson v. Carpenter, 88 Va. 702, 14 S. E. Rep. 181; Kern v. Wyatt, 89 Va. 885, 891, 17 S. E. Rep. 549; Code Va. 1887, § 8455.

Decree Refusing Bill of Review.—Petition for an appeal from a final decree refusing a bill of review, must be presented within six months from the date of such decree, and it is immaterial whether such decree of refusal be to the Aling of the bill of review or to the prayer of a bill of review. Code 1887, § 8455; Jordan v. Cunningham, 85 Va. 418, 7 S. E. Rep. 540.

Under the terms of § 8455 of the Code, the petition for an appeal from a decree refusing a bill of review to a decree rendered more than six months prior thereto must be presented within six months from the actual date of the decree appealed from, and not from the beginning or the end of the term at which it was rendered. Buford v. North Roanoke Land Co., 94 Va. 616, 27 S. E. Rep. 509.

b. West Virginia.

Act 1877.—By the act 1877 the time for taking an appeal was limited to five years from the date of the decree. Lloyd v. Kyle, 26 W. Va. 534. This was also the law prior to 1877. Farmers' Bank v. Montgomery, 11 W. Va. 169.

Act 1882.—By the act of 1882 this period was reduced to two years. Hoy v. Hughes, 27 W. Va. 778.

Code 1891.—Under § 3, ch. 135, Code W. Va. 1891, an appeal from a final decree entered by a circuit court must be prosecuted within two years after the same has been rendered. Kanawha Valley Bank v. Wilson, 35 W. Va. 36, 13 S. E. Rep. 46; Shumate v. Crockett, 43 W. Va. 491, 27 S. E. Rep. 240.

2. INTERLOCUTORY DECREES AND JUDGMENTS.—An appeal may be taken from an interlocutory decree at any time, so long as the cause is pending in court. Kendrick v. Whitney, 28 Gratt. 646; Cocke v. Gilpin, 1 Rob. 20; Fleming v. Bolling, 8 Gratt. 292; Thorntons v. Fitzhugh, 4 Leigh 200. See also, Camden v. Haymond, 9 W. Va. 681.

The limitation of appeals to one year from the rendition of the decree applies only to final decrees. Barker v. Jenkins, 84 Va. 895, 6 S. E. Rep. 459.

A decree adjudicating the principles of a cause while, by statute, it is appealable, yet is not a final decree so that the statute of limitations will run against it. Penn v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 2 Va. Dec. 224.

In West Virginia by the Act of 1877, ch. 44, § 3, no petition, for an appeal, even from an interlocutory decree, can be entertained after five years from the date of the decree. Lloyd v. Kyle, 26 W. Va. 534.

By Acts of 1882, ch. 157, no appeal can be entertained from a decree of any character, whether final or interlocutory, which has been rendered more than two years before the petition for the appeal was presented. Hoy v. Hughes, 27 W. Va. 778.

3. CALCULATION OF PERIOD.

Generally.—The limitation to appeals and writs of error is subject to but few exceptions, for reasons no doubt founded upon a sound public policy. No suggestion of hardship, surprise, or accident, can avail in the least in defeating or suspending this limitation. If the party does not give the bond within the statutory period whether he be in default two months or two days, the result must be the same—he must be dismissed by the court. Pace v. Ficklin, 76 Va. 292.

Where Petitioner Is Not in Fault.—Where a petition was presented to the court of appeals, praying writs of supersedeas to two distinct final orders of a circuit court in one cause, and the court allowed the supersedeas to one of the orders, without any notice of the prayer for the supersedeas to the other, though it was plainly erroneous, it was held that the petitioner had a right to the judgment of the court, on both the prayers of his petition; and, as the court omitted to give judgment on one of them, it was not too late to award the supersedeas, after five years, the limitation to the writ, had elapsed, the omission having been owing to the inadvertence of the court, not to the fault of the petitioner. Dis-sentiente, TUCKER, P. Pugh v. Jones, 6 Leigh 299.

Where a party was arrested by the Confederate authorities for disloyalty to the established government of Virginia at Richmond and kept in confinement till the five years' limitation to appeals had expired, he was still allowed to maintain his appeal. Wyatt v. Morris, 2 W. Va. 575.

Where a petition to the court of appeals for a supersedeas was rejected and an order entered accordingly, and afterwards at the same term a motion was made for reconsideration and the court agreed to reconsider, but by inadvertence no entry was made setting aside the order denying the supersedeas, and more than three years afterwards the motion to reconsider was renewed, it was held that the motion could not then be entertained on account of the long delay and because, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, a judgment would have been of no benefit to the plaintiffs in error, though the court said that usually it would correct such a mistake. Emory v. Erskine, 7 Leigh 267; Beasley v. Owen, 3 H. & M. 449.

Periods Excluded.—The term elapsed from the presentation of the petition till the delivery of the record and petition to the clerk of the appellate court is to be excluded. Code, § 2474; Acker v. A. & F. R. Co., 84 Va. 648, 5 S. E. Rep. 688.

But this delivery to the clerk is the actual receipt of the petition and record by him. The omission of the clerk to examine a box containing the papers, or, if he examined it, his mistake as to its contents, or failure to discover the papers, cannot change the law. Whatever may be the remedy of the party injured against the clerk, the statute of limitations begins to run from the actual receipt of the petition and record by the clerk. Bull v. Evans, 96 Va. 1, 30 S. E. Rep. 468.

Under § 17, Acts 1876-7, providing "that the time which shall elapse from the presenting of a petition for an appeal, writ of error, etc., which shall be endorsed thereon by the judge to whom the same shall be first delivered, and the delivery of the record to the clerk of the appellate court, shall be excluded from the computation of the said period of two years." This time will be excluded though at the time of endorsement the judge also endorses the following: "I have taken no action on the record, because no petition accompanied the record." Frazier v. Frazier, 77 Va. 775.

War and Stay-Law Period.—In Sexton v. Crockett, 23 Gratt. 857, it was held by a divided court that where a decree was rendered on the 10th Oct., 1863, and an appeal was allowed on the 5th Oct., 1871, it was in time, under the two years' limitation applicable at the time the appeal was granted, since the war and stay-law period was to be excluded.

But in Rogers v. Strother, 27 Gratt. 417, this was overruled and it was held that § 7, of the Act of March 2, 1866, known as the stay law, and the act amendatory thereof, does not apply to appeals, writs of error, or supersedeas; and therefore an appeal from a final decree made on the 1st of November, 1867, cannot be allowed on the 12th of June, 1871.

Statute Runs over All Supervening Disabilities.—Where the statute of limitations has once begun to run against an appeal, and the party desiring to appeal, assignee in bankruptcy in this case, dies, the period from such death to the qualification of another assignee will not be excluded. Pace v. Ficklin, 76 Va. 292.

No Relation of Judgment.—In Acker v. A. & F. R. Co., 84 Va. 648, 5 S. E. Rep. 688, the court intimated that the common-law fiction that a judgment rendered on any day of a term operates as if rendered on the first day of the term does not apply in calculating the time elapsed since the date of a judgment, to ascertain whether an appeal is barred.

Pendency of Bill of Review.—The pendency of a bill of review on the sole ground of after-discovered evidence will not prevent an appellant from prosecuting his appeal in the court of appeals from the decree sought to be reviewed, as the questions presented to the two tribunals by the separate proceedings are entirely distinct, and no confusion can arise from their separate determination. Gillespie v. Allen, 37 W. Va. 675, 17 S. E. Rep. 184.

But where a party has filed a petition for rehearing or bill of review for error of law in the circuit court, he cannot, while it is pending undetermined, appeal to the court of appeals. Maxwell v. Martin, 35 W. Va. 384, 14 S. E. Rep. 7.

The filing of an abortive bill of review will not have the effect of arresting the statute of limitations, so as to extend the period within which an appeal might have been taken from the final decree the review and reversal of which were attempted by such abortive bill. Kanawha Valley Bank v. Wilson, 35 W. Va. 36, 13 S. E. Rep. 58.

When Appeal Is Granted.—When an appeal is a matter of right it is the giving of the appeal bond which stops the running of the statute of limitations. Womer v. Ravenswood, etc., R. Co., 37 W. Va. 287, 16 S. E. Rep. 488; Code 1891, ch. 50, § 103.

But where the allowance of the appeal is a matter of discretion, it is the presentation of the petition which stops the running of the statute. Womer v. Ravenswood, etc., R. Co., 37 W. Va. 287, 16 S. E. Rep. 488; Code 1891, ch. 185, §§ 1, 2, etc.; Williamson v. Gayle, 4 Gratt. 180; Bank v. Wilson, 35 W. Va. 36, 13 S. E. Rep. 58; Ambrose v. Keller, 22 Gratt. 769.

The judge's order for a writ of supersedeas is the true commencement of the proceeding in the court of appeals, and therefore, if that be within five years from the date of the judgment, although the bond is not given and writ is not taken out till the five years have elapsed, it will be in time. Overstreet v. Marshall, 3 Call 192.

Where the order for a supersedeas was made and the bond executed within a little more than two years after judgment, but the writ itself did not then issue because of the lack of a clerk of the court, and the appellant failed to apply for the writ for more than 15 years after judgment and nearly twelve years after the appointment of a clerk, the writ will be refused. Anderson v. Lively, 6 Leigh 77.

But under the Code of 1849, ch. 182, § 17, providing that "no process shall issue on any appeal, writ of error or supersedeas allowed to or from a final judgment, decree or order, if, when the record is delivered to the clerk of the appellate court, there shall have elapsed five years since the date of such final judgment, decree or order; but the appeal, etc., shall be dismissed, whenever it appears that five years have elapsed since the said date before the record is delivered to such clerk or before such bond is given as is required to be given before the appeal, etc., takes effect," it was held in Yarborough v. Deshazo, 7 Gratt. 374, that upon an appeal to the court of appeals from a final judgment, decree or order, although the petition may have been preferred and appeal allowed within the time limited yet if the record be not delivered to the clerk of the appellate court, and, where bond is required, if it be not also given within five years from the date of the judgment, the appeal must be dismissed.

The same rule was held applicable in Otterback v. Alex., etc., R. Co., 26 Gratt. 941, under the provision of the Code 1873, ch. 173, § 17, which merely substitutes two years for five as the period of limitation. Pace v. Ficklin, 76 Va. 292.

This is still the law in Virginia except that one year is substituted for two. Code 1887, § 3474: Acker v. A. & F. R. Co., 84 Va. 648, 5 S. E. Rep. 668.

C. NO INQUIRY INTO MERITS.—The supreme court of appeals cannot enquire into the merits of a case on appeal where more than the statutory period has elapsed since its rendition. Cocke v. Gilpin, 1 Rob. 20; Fleming v. Bolling, 8 Gratt. 292; Thorntons v. Fitzhugh, 4 Leigh 209.

XV. CONCLUSIVENESS OF DECREES OF APPELLATE COURTS.

A. OF COURT OF APPEALS.

1. GENERALLY.—The supreme court of appeals has no power to review its decisions on the merits in any way after the end of terms at which they were rendered. Griffin v. Cunningham, 20 Gratt. 81; Reid v. Strider, 7 Gratt. 76; Roanoke St. Ry. Co. v. Hicks (Va.), 32 S. E. Rep. 790; Campbell v. Campbell, 22 Gratt. 649, 670.

"It is believed, that no case can be found, that decides, where an issue has been tried by a jury and a verdict rendered, and a decree or judgment rendered on the verdict, and the judgment or decree, on writ of error or appeal, affirmed by an appellate court, that such decree or judgment can be reviewed for any errors, committed by the court during the trial of the issue, or at any other time, before the judgment or decree was appealed from." Henry v. Davis, 13 W. Va. 230.

"The finality and irreversibility of the judgments and decrees of the court of appeals after the close of the term at which they are rendered is inherent in the very nature and constitution of the tribunal, and cannot be disturbed without deranging the administration of justice, and the introduction of intolerable evils in practice. Reid v. Strider, 7 Gratt. 81; Stuart v. Peyton, 97 Va. 796, 34 S. E. Rep. 696.

All the decrees of the appellate court are in their nature final, except possibly where that court disposes of only a part of the case at one term, and reserves it for further and final action at another. Campbell v. Campbell, 22 Gratt. 649.

2. ON QUESTIONS OF JURISDICTION.—The court of appeals can no more set aside a decree of a former term for error upon a point of jurisdiction, than for error on any other point. Bank of Virginia v. Craig, 6 Leigh 399.

JOHNSON, J., said, in Bank of Virginia v. Craig, 6 Leigh 399, the rule was, that the court would set aside a decree or judgment of a former term, if it was entered when the party was dead, or when, having retained counsel, he was nevertheless, through any accident or mistake, not heard by his counsel; but it was not competent to the court to set aside any decree of a former term, made inter partes.

The court of appeals is by common law, independent of statute law, conclusively presumed to have done everything that was necessary to invest it with full and complete jurisdiction over all the parties. In Bank of Virginia v. Craig, 6 Leigh 438, the circuit court of Spottsylvania, rendered a decree in favor of a ward for certain bank stock, against the Bank of Virginia, and in the same decree expressed the opinion that the guardian and his sureties were also liable to the ward for such bank stock, but no decreed was then rendered against them. The Bank of Virginia took an appeal from this decree. The sureties of guardian were not parties to this appeal, they were not served with any process issuing from the court of appeals, and neither appeared in person, nor by counsel, and had no opportunity of being heard in the appellate court. The court of appeals reversed the decree against the Bank of Virginia, and entered up a decree against the guardian and his sureties for the value of this stock. At the next term of the court of appeals a motion was made to set aside this decree against the guardian and his sureties, on whom no process from that court had been served, and in lieu of this decree to enter one dismissing the bill as to the Bank of Virginia, and remanding the cause to the circuit court that the sureties might thus have the opportunity to controvert their liability. It was insisted by counsel, that where a decree or judgment is rendered by the court of appeals, either in respect to matters or parties coram non judice, it may and ought to be set aside at a subsequent term. But the court overruled the motion on the ground that it could not then set aside a decree entered at a former term, whether it were objectionable on its merits or whether it was prematurely entered, before some of the parties against whom it had been entered had been summoned. Newman v. Mollohan, 10 W. Va. 488.

If an appellate court has ever so erroneously decided, that it has jurisdiction of a cause and then proceeds to determine it on its merits, the parties to the cause are bound as res adjudicata by the decision of the court, that it has jurisdiction as well as by the decision of the court on the merits. Renick v. Ludington, 20 W. Va. 511.

Where persons, not parties to a decree or bound thereby, but whose property was ordered to be sold by said decree, take an appeal, although the appellate court has no right to take jurisdiction of the appeal, if it does take jurisdiction and proceeds to determine the cause on its merits, such appellants are bound as res adjudicata by the decision of the court that it has jurisdiction. Renick v. Ludington, 20 W. Va. 511, 536. But this is not true of persons who do not appeal. Renick v. Ludington, 20 W. Va. 511, 536.

A writ of error to a joint judgment should be taken in the name of all the joint defendants, if not, the appellate court must see that the requirements of the statute have been complied with, i. e. that all the parties in interest have been summoned, including of course the other defendants, who may then appear and assign errors, or refuse and be severed, and then any one or more may prosecute the writ. When the court of appeals has taken jurisdiction of a writ of error obtained by one alone of several joint defendants, it will be presumed that it has seen that the statute was complied with. Newman v. Mollohan, 10 W. Va. 488, 498.

3. ON LOWER COURT.—A decision of the court of appeals certified to the lower court is binding on that court as well as on the court of appeals. Holleran v. Meisel, 91 Va. 143, 21 S. E. Rep. 658; Rosenbaum v. Seddon, 94 Va. 575, 27 S. E. Rep. 425; Keck v. Allender, 42 W. Va. 420, 26 S. E. Rep. 437.

The court of chancery cannot, upon the same facts, correct on motion, or by bill of review, any error, apparent on the face of the proceedings, in a decree which has been affirmed by the court of appeals. Campbell v. Price, 8 Munf. 227; Price v. Campbell, 5 Call 115; Mason v. Bridge Co., 20 W. Va. 223, 230.

Where a decree has been affirmed by the court of appeals it becomes res adjudicata and no error in it can be corrected by rehearing in the court below. Lore v. Hash, 89 Va. 277, 15 S. E. Rep. 549.

Where a question of law or fact is once definitely settled and determined by a decree of the court of appeals, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings, a party to said suit cannot, by subsequent pleadings, call in question the conclusiveness of the questions determined by said decree. Seabright v. Seabright, 33 W. Va. 152, 10 S. E. Rep. 265; Koonce v. Doolittle, 48 W. Va. 592, 37 S. E. Rep. 644.

Upon a former appeal, the special court of appeals, with all the parties interested before it, having decided a question, that judgment is conclusive and this is true though the decree of the court below was reversed because the proceeding was by petition, and the cause was sent back to be regularly prepared and matured. Corbell v. Zeluff, 12 Gratt. 226.

Where, upon an appeal from a final decree made upon a report of a commissioner, to which there were various exceptions by the appellant, the appellate court holds that the court below erred in not sustaining one of the appellant's exceptions to the report; and the decree is reversed and the cause remanded for the necessary enquiries to be made in relation to the subject of that exception. Held, the decree concludes all other questions. Deneufville v. Travis, 5 Gratt. 28; Massey v. King, 1 Va. Dec. 63.

Where the decree of the court of appeals holds that an appellant is entitled to his homestead exemption "unless it appears that he was not entitled to it upon other grounds," this does not authorize the other party to set up new grounds of objection to allowing the homestead which might have been preferred at the former hearing but were not. Sears v. Marshall, 83 Va. 383, 2 S. E. Rep. 608.

Where the court of appeals has decided against the right of certain persons to become parties, upon remand those persons cannot come into the court below as parties and litigate anew the questions already determined. Robinson v. Crenshaw, 84 Va. 348, 5 S. E. Rep. 222.

The circuit court cannot review or make any alteration in the provisions or requirements of a decree of the appellate court certified back for further proceedings in order to a final decree, but such further proceedings may be matter of decision for the first time in the lower, and of review in the appellate court. Atkinson v. Beckett, 36 W. Va. 438, 15 S. E. Rep. 179.

Where an instruction given, or a verdict rendered, at the trial in the court below, is, on appeal, pronounced erroneous, it is improper at a subsequent trial, the evidence being the same, to give the same instruction, or to enter up judgment on the same verdict. Smith v. Snyder, 82 Va. 614.

Where on appeal a new trial has been granted, it is the duty of the circuit court, at the second trial, to adopt the views set forth by the court of appeals in its opinion, and instruct the jury in accordance therewith, provided the facts are the same and the instructions are asked for. Chaffin v. Lynch, 84 Va. 384, 6 S. E. Rep. 474.

Circuit courts are bound to obey the decrees of the court of appeals in all cases. Where, on appeal, the court of appeals prescribes the order in which properties must be sold when decree for sale is made, the circuit court, in its decree of sale, must conform to that prescription; otherwise its decree will be reversed for such nonconformance. Strayer v. Long, 83 Va. 715, 3 S. E. Rep. 372.

When a case is remanded to an inferior court for further proceedings, that court can in no case regard anything which relates to any action which the inferior court may take in the case after it is remanded, as obiter dictum. Swinburn v. Smith, 15 W. Va. 483.

4. ON REHEARING.—A case decided by the supreme court of appeals at one term of the court, at which no motion or petition is made or filed to rehear it, cannot be reheard by that court upon its merits for the correction of errors of judgment in the final decree or judgment of the appellate court at the former term. Hall v. Bank of Virginia, 15 W. Va. 323; Renick v. Ludington, 20 W. Va. 511, 533; Towner v. Lane, 9 Leigh 262, 279; Baker v. Glass, 6 Munf. 212, 218; Griffin v. Cunningham, 20 Gratt. 81; Roanoke St. Ry. Co. v. Hicks (Va.), 32 S. E. Rep. 790.

A cause may be reheard, upon a petition presented before the term has passed in which the final decree was pronounced; but not afterwards, except by bill of review. Hodges v. Davis, 4 H. & M. 400.

In Com. v. Beaumarchais, 3 Call 122, 178, the court had reversed the decree of the lower court, but had refused to make any further decree because they were equally divided as to a certain point, but at a subsequent term, they corrected the decree on the ground that the cause still remained in the court undecided and yet pending i. e. interlocutory.

In Wynn v. Wyatt, 11 Leigh 586, a judgment of the court of appeals of one term was at the next term thereafter set aside and a rehearing directed, yet it is to be understood that the motion for the rehearing was made at the same term and held under advisement till the next, hence the case is not authority for granting rehearings at a subsequent term. Reid v. Strider, 7 Gratt. 76.

In Campbell v. Campbell, 23 Gratt. 649, 672, it was held that there might possibly be an interlocutory decree in the court of appeals, but they were extremely rare. The mere fact that the appeal is from an interlocutory decree of the lower court does not make the decree of the court of appeals interlocutory.

Legislative Authorization.—In Hall v. Bank of Virginia, 15 W. Va. 323, it was held that ch. 52 of the Act of 1879, providing for the rehearing and review in the supreme court of appeals in causes decided at the special term held in Wheeling in October, November, and December, 1878, did not confer on said court the authority to rehear such causes upon their merits; but merely to correct clerical errors therein, and that the case of Garrison v. Myers, 12 W. Va. 330, is not in conflict as it was a mere clerical error that was corrected in that case.

The proviso to § 2 of the Act of March 5, 1870, called the enabling act, which authorized the court of appeals organized under the existing constitution to rehear, and affirm or reverse the decrees made by the military judges at the term, commencing the 11th of January, 1870, the term having ended before the passage of the act, is unconstitutional; and the court has no authority to rehear such cases. Griffin v. Cunningham, 20 Gratt. 81.

The act of March 5th, 1870, commonly called the Enabling Act, is a valid act, except the proviso which authorizes the court of appeals to review the decisions of the court of appeals organized under the reconstruction acts. Teel v. Yancey, 23 Gratt. 691.

5. ON BILL OF REVIEW.

In Court of Appeals.—Where a decree has been affirmed by the court of appeals, a bill of review ought not to be granted to reverse it for any errors on the face of the proceedings; but if new matter be produced, which was unknown to the party applying, at the time of the decree, such court may, and, if the evidence warrants it, ought, to grant such bill of review. M'Call v. Graham, 1 H. & M. 13; Shepherd v. Chapman, 2 Va. Dec. 88.

In Lower Court.—When the court of appeals makes a decree, and sends the cause back for further proceedings, there cannot be a bill of review, to correct the decree of the court of appeals for error apparent. Henry v. Davis, 13 W. Va. 230.

And by error apparent is meant, such as appears upon the face of the proceedings, and that includes all that was involved in the issue. Henry v. Davis, 13 W. Va. 230.

As to the power of the lower court to review decrees of the court of appeals for new matter, see monographic note on "Bills of Review" appended to Campbell v. Campbell, 22 Gratt. 649.

6. POWER OF COURT OF EQUITY.—Where a judgment of the circuit court has been affirmed by the court of appeals, such judgment cannot be impeached or set aside by a court of equity, in a suit brought for that purpose, upon any ground of error apparent upon the face of such judgment, or upon the record of the case in which it was rendered. Armstrong v. Poole, 30 W. Va. 666, 5 S. E. Rep. 257.

In Byrne v. Edmonds, 23 Gratt. 200, the court held that the circuit court as a court of equity had inherent power to correct a decree of the court of appeals which was founded on a merely clerical error of the printer of the record.

In Price v. Fuqua, 4 Munf. 68, a new trial was granted in equity, although the judgment had been affirmed in the court of appeals, upon allegations that, relying on the advice of counsel the applicant had failed to offer evidence which he had, that the verdict was rendered upon evidence given in the jury room, and that a receipt had since been found.

But in Henry v. Davis, 13 W. Va. 230, JOHNSON, J., said that the ground of granting the new trial in the above case could not have been the erroneous advice of counsel, it might have been on the ground of after-discovered evidence or of the giving of evidence in the jury room, but that the case was so badly reported that the court could not follow it.

7. ON SECOND APPEAL.—It is a settled rule of the court of appeals that a question which has been decided upon a former appeal cannot be reviewed or reversed upon a subsequent appeal in the same cause. Stuart v. Preston, 80 Va. 625; New York Life Ins. Co. v. Clemmitt, 77 Va. 366; McCormick v. Wright, 79 Va. 524; Bank of Old Dominion v. McVeigh, 29 Gratt. 546, 553; Frazier v. Frazier, 77 Va. 775, 783; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Mills, 91 Va. 613, 22 S. E. Rep. 556; Chahoon's Case, 21 Gratt. 822; Alexandria Savings Inst. v. McVeigh, 84 Va. 41, 48, 3 S. E. Rep. 885; Hawthorne v. Beckwith, 80 Va. 786, 17 S. E. Rep. 241; Osburn v. Throckmorton, 90 Va. 311, 18 S. E. Rep. 285; Krise v. Ryan, 90 Va. 711, 19 S. E. Rep. 783; Carter v. Hough, 89 Va. 503, 16 S. E. Rep. 665; Mason v. Bridge Co., 20 W. Va. 223, 230; Hollingsworth v. Brooks, 7 W. Va. 559; Henry v. Davis, 13 W. Va. 230; Campbell v. Campbell, 22 Gratt. 649; McCullough v. Dashiell, 85 Va. 37, 6 S. E. Rep. 610; Miller v. Cook, 77 Va. 806; Camden v. Werninger, 7 W. Va. 528; Board v. Parsons, 24 W. Va. 551; Harmon v. Bowyer, 15 W. Va. 538; Wick v. Dawson, 48 W. Va. 469, 37 S. E. Rep. 639.

A question raised by a second appeal in a case which was necessarily involved on the former appeal in the same case, and was expressly raised by a petition to rehear the former decree of the appellate court, must be regarded as res judicata. Sims v. Tyrer, 96 Va. 14, 30 S. E. Rep. 443.

Questions once decided upon an appeal are res adjudicata in that case, though only two judges concurred in the decision, such questions can only be reconsidered in another case. Postlewaite v. Wise, 17 W. Va. 1.

A decree of an inferior court being affirmed in consequence of an equal division of opinion in the court of appeals, that is a decision which settles the principles of the cause involved in the decree of the inferior court. Phillips v. Williams, 5 Gratt. 239.

The special court of appeals having decided a case regularly sent to that court, and having reversed the decree of the court below, and sent the cause back for further proceedings, there can afterwards be no complaint of error in the decree of the special court or in the proceedings before that decree. Bolling v. Lersner, 26 Gratt. 36.

"The case made for the court of appeals by an appeal from a decree of the court below, whether final or interlocutory, is, as to the court of appeals, a complete case in itself, and the decree of that court therein is final and conclusive between the parties, as well upon the court itself as upon the court below; and the court of appeals can do nothing more in the course of the same litigation, until a new and different appeal is brought up to it from some decree of the court below, rendered in the cause upon subsequent proceedings in that court; and then the court of appeals can only review and reverse that decree without interfering with its own former decree." Campbell v. Campbell, 22 Gratt. 649; Cobbs v. Gilchrist, 80 Va. 503.

And that though the question does not appear to have been formally raised or considered on the former appeal, if it might have been passed upon on consideration of the record. Krise v. Ryan, 90 Va. 711, 19 S. E. Rep. 783; Stuart v. Heiskell, 86 Va. 191, 9 S. E. Rep. 984; Findlay v. Trigg, 83 Va. 539, 3 S. E. Rep. 142; Effinger v. Kenney, 79 Va. 551; McCullough v. Dashiell, 85 Va. 37, 6 S. E. Rep. 610; Wash., etc., R. Co. v. Cazenove, 83 Va. 744, 3 S. E. Rep. 483.

The clause of the constitution requiring the court of appeals to "consider and decide every point fairly arising upon the record and give its reason therefor" is merely directory, and a failure to do so does not render any points involved in the issue any the less "res judicata" although not mentioned in the opinion of the court. Henry v. Davis, 13 W. Va. 230; Hall v. Bank of Virginia, 15 W. Va. 323.

The mere fact that a statement of the law by the supreme court of appeals contained in the opinion, is not inserted in the syllabus, required by § 5, art. VIII of the Constitution, to be prefixed to the published report of the case, does not relieve the inferior court from the duty of following such statement. Swinburn v. Smith, 15 W. Va. 483.

Failure to Give Relief Equivalent to Adverse Adjudication.—In a suit on a note executed by a trustee of real and personal property, the appellate court reversed so much of the decree as directed payment of the debt from the personal property held in trust, but affirmed that part which ordered a sale of the crop for that purpose, and remanded the cause. Held, that the failure to give plaintiff a decree subjecting the rental of the real estate to payment of his debt was an adjudication against such right, which would be adhered to on a second appeal upon a similar record. Wooldridge v. Green, 2 Va. Dec. 461.

Construction of a Will.—So where a will has been construed by the lower court and that construction approved by the court of appeals, the question in res adjudicata and cannot be examined on a second appeal. Hawthorne v. Beckwith, 89 Va. 786, 17 S. E. Rep. 241.

Judgment or Decree against Persons Who Should Have Been Parties.—The rendition by the court of appeals, of a judgment or decree against persons who should have been appellees is, at common law, equivalent to an affirmation on the record that such parties were before the court, as, without their so being, the court could not have proceeded to decide the case. Newman v. Mollohan, 10 W. Va. 488; McClanahan v. Hockman, 96 Va. 392, 31 S. E. Rep. 516.

Sufficiency of Declaration.—Where a judgment for the defendants below is reversed and a new trial directed, and there is a second verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, the defendants, on appeal from the second verdict cannot object to the sufficiency of the declaration, the court of appeals, in reversing the former judgment, being presumed to have thought the declaration sufficient, otherwise they would have affirmed it. Cunningham v. Herndon, 2 Call 530, 535; Murdock v. Herndon, 4 H. & M. 200.

Perfection of Appeal.—If an appeal has been allowed, and the cause decided by the appellate court, without objection by the appellee that the appeal was not perfected in time, the objection cannot afterwards be made in the court below, or in the appellate court when the cause is brought up a second time. Bolling v. Lersner, 26 Gratt. 36.

Limitation.—Only those questions which are fairly embraced within the operation of the decision of the court of appeals are res judicata. Hollingsworth v. Brooks, 7 W. Va. 559.

The doctrine has no application to a different question, between different parties. Frazier v. Frazier, 77 Va. 775, 784; Hollingsworth v. Brooks, 7 W. Va. 559.

In New York Life Ins. Co. v. Clemmitt, 77 Va. 366, it was held that a question not passed upon by the court of appeals on a first appeal in the reversal of the judgment of the lower court, may be considered upon a second appeal.

Where a decree fails to recite that the cause was heard on an amended bill, though it appears that it was a part of the record but the decree was altogether in reference to subjects introduced into the cause before the amended bill was filed, the affirmation of such decree by the court of appeals will not bind the defendants to such amended bill as res adjudicata. Renick v. Ludington, 20 W. Va. 511, 536.

Subsequent Proceedings Alone Brought Up by Second Appeal.—A second appeal brings up only the proceedings in the cause subsequent to the decree of the court of appeals on the former appeal and not the whole cause. Campbell v. Campbell, 22 Gratt. 649, 673.

Prior Orders and Decrees.—The decision of the court of appeals is not only final in regard to the decree appealed from, but also in regard to all the prior orders and decrees in the case between the appellants and appellees. An appeal from a decree brings up the whole proceedings in the case prior to the decree; and either party can have any error against him in those proceedings corrected without the necessity of a cross appeal in any case. If a party fail to complain of any such error, and a decree be made upon the appeal, without correcting or noticing the error, such party will be concluded by the decree from appealing afterwards. Campbell v. Campbell, 22 Gratt. 649; Frazier v. Frazier, 77 Va. 775; Woodson v. Leyburn, 83 Va. 843, 3 S. E. Rep. 873; Krise v. Ryan, 90 Va. 711, 19 S. E. Rep. 783.

Taking Additional Evidence.—The fact that additional evidence was taken when the cause went back does not affect the conclusiveness of the decision of the court of appeals. Turner v. Staples, 86 Va. 300, 9 S. E. Rep. 1123.

Interlocutory Decrees of Lower Court.—The conclusiveness of the decree of the court of appeals is the same, whether the first appeal was from a final, or interlocutory decree of the court below. Henry v. Davis, 13 W. Va. 230; Mason v. Bridge Co., 20 W. Va. 223; Woodson v. Leyburn, 83 Va. 843, 3 S. E. Rep. 873; Lore v. Hash, 89 Va. 277, 15 S. E. Rep. 549; Miller v. Cook, 77 Va. 806; Campbell v. Campbell, 22 Gratt. 649.

Reservation in Decree.—But where a reservation is inserted in a decree of the court of appeals, saving to certain parties the power to assert their rights in another proceeding, against another party, they are not concluded by the decree from so asserting their rights, and they will not be confined to matters not adjudicated by that decree. The proper proceeding in such case is by cross bill. Young v. Cabell, 27 Gratt. 761.

Decree Affirming Order of Reference.—Where a decree is interlocutory and provides for a reference to a commissioner, an affirmance of such decree does not conclude the parties, but such decree may be modified by exception to the commissioner's report. Miller v. Cook, 77 Va. 806.

8. PERSONS BOUND.

Parties "Represented."—Persons interested though not technically parties are concluded by the first appeal, where by the doctrine of representation of parties, it was not necessary to make them parties, or they were not in esse or had a common interest with those who did sue. Hawthorne v. Beckwith, 89 Va. 786, 17 S. E. Rep. 241.

Persons Not Parties.—If the principles of res adjudicata, when applied to the parties to an appeal or to the parties to a cause, necessarily conflict with the rights of third persons, subsequently made parties, to be heard in repelling the facts assumed, or appearing theretofore in the cause, or to be heard upon the matter of law involved, and such a decision so made even by the appellate court, necessarily does injustice and wrong, to persons not parties to the cause, when the appellate court rendered such decision; these principles of res adjudicata, however inexorable they may be as a rule, must of necessity yield to the extent of not depriving such third persons, who were not then parties to the cause or appeal of the right to be thus heard, when subsequently made parties, and when heard to the extent of doing such third persons no wrong; but they will yield in such cases, no farther than is absolutely necessary to avoid such wrong and injustice to third persons. Renick v. Ludington, 20 W. Va. 511.

Where decrees for the sale of land, and for confirmation of the sale, are made in the absence of some of the joint owners of the land; and upon appeal these decrees are reversed, and the cause sent back that they may be made parties, and have an opportunity to defend their interest, though the decree is in other respects affirmed, these absent owners, when made parties, have a right to except to the sale and its confirmation, and are not precluded by the affirmance of the decree in other respects than those on which it is reversed. Crockett v. Sexton, 29 Gratt. 46.

Married Women.—A married woman when she is a party is as much bound as any one else. McCullough v. Dashiell, 85 Va. 37, 6 S. E. Rep. 610.

Infants.—But an infant is not concluded by an affirmation by the court of appeals of a decree in a proceeding to which she is not a party and was not represented, but in which she is interested, she may file a bill of review to such decree. Connolly v. Connolly, 32 Gratt. 657.

B. OF GENERAL COURT.—The general court having upon a writ of error reversed the judgment of the court below, and directed a new trial, that judgment is conclusive, and neither the court below, nor the general court on a second writ of error, can enquire into the correctness of the first decision. Marshall v. Com., 5 Gratt. 693.

XVI. APPEAL BONDS.

A. NOT A CONTRACT.—A supersedeas bond is not a contract within the purview of § 10, art. I of the Federal Constitution, forbidding the impairment of the obligation of contracts. It is simply an obligation imposed by law, it has no independent force apart from the judgment and has no more of the elements of a contract in it than the judgment itself, it is not a mutual agreement, nor is it voluntary on the part of those who sign it, it is executed under a sort of legal duress. The party is compelled under the requirement of the law to execute it or deny himself his legal right to have the judgment reviewed without it. White v. Crump, 19 W. Va. 583.

B. DEPENDENT ON JUDGMENT.—The effect of a supersedeas bond is dependent upon the fate of the judgment, without which it has no obligatory force, it has no separate existence, for whenever the judgment ceases to be binding, the bond becomes inoperative for any purpose. So when in an action on a supersedeas bond it is pleaded that the judgment was recovered because of an act done according to the usages of civilized warfare, under § 35, Art. VIII of the Constitution of West Virginia, such judgment is void though affirmed by the court of appeals, such affirmance being before the above section of the constitution was adopted, and consequently the bond is void also. Such proceedings constitute due process of law. White v. Crump, 19 W. Va. 583.

C. WHEN REQUIRED.

Executors and Administrators.—The statute requiring bond and security upon appeals although general in terms apply only to persons appealing in their own right, not to executors and administrators. Shearman v. Christian, 1 Rand. 393.

Executors and administrators are as much required to give security on appeal as any other appellants where the judgment is against them personally though it should have been against them in their representative capacity. Pugh v. Jones, 6 Leigh 299.

In a suit in equity against defendant as executor and in his own right as legatee, there is a decree against him personally; on appeal allowed him from the decree, an appeal bond with surety will be required of him. Ersine v. Henry, 6 Leigh 378; Bull v. Douglas, 4 Munf. 307. See monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

Where executors and legatees jointly appeal, the legatees (being in possession of the property in dispute), may be ruled to give security for the prosecution of the appeal. Sadler v. Green, 1 H. & M. 28.

Assignee of Bankrupt.—The assignee of a bankrupt is not the representative of a decedent so as to relieve him from the necessity of giving an appeal bond. Pace v. Flicklin, 76 Va. 292.

Under Act 1792.—Under the Act of 1792, where a plaintiff in chancery appealed, that court could not require of him any other bond than one in the penalty of twenty pounds. Braxton v. Morris, 1 Wash. 380.

Waiver.—The mere marking of his name by the counsel for the defendant in error on the docket of the court as counsel for defendant in error will not amount to a release of the plaintiff in error from his obligation to give the bond required by law. Otterback v. Alex., etc., R. Co., 26 Gratt. 940.

It might amount to a waiver of service of process on his client. Otterback v. Alex., etc., R. Co., 26 Gratt. 940.

Where a supersedeas has been granted and a cause has been docketed for more than six years without objection, it will not be dismissed on motion though the required bond was not given. Pugh v. Jones, 6 Leigh 299.

D. TIME TO EXECUTE BOND.—Where an appeal is allowed with unlimited time in which to execute an appeal bond, such appeal is irregular and a motion to docket it will be overruled. Broadus v. Turner, 2 Rand. 5.

Sec. 3 of the act March 15, 1867, which amended § of ch. 182 of the Code of 1860, changing the limitation of the time for presenting a petition for an appeal from, or writ of error or supersedeas to, any final decree or judgment, from five to two years after it was made or rendered, did not amend § 26 of that chapter, which allows five years for perfecting the appeal, by giving bond, etc. And therefore, where a petition for an appeal was presented within two years from the date of the decree it might be perfected in any time within five years from that date. But see now, Code of 1873, ch. 178, § 17; Bolling v. Lersner, 26 Gratt. 36.

A party who, on expressing an intention to appeal from an order of the county court made November 18th, and have the case tried de novo in the circuit court, is granted until November 17th to give the necessary bond, cannot complain that the court adjourned for the term on November 14th, unless the record shows that he was thereby prevented from giving the required bond. Sargeant v. Irving, 3 Va. Dec. 338.

E. FAILURE TO GIVE BOND.—If the appellant fails to give the bond directed to be given by the court, or the judge allowing the appeal or supersedeas, the appellee may have a rule upon him to compel him to give it. Williamson v. Gayle, 4 Gratt. 180.

The appeal being allowed, the cause is pending in the court of appeals; and the failure of the appellant to execute the bond directed by the court to be given, on granting the appeal, does not avoid the appeal. Williamson v. Gayle, 4 Gratt. 180.

F. SUSPENSION OF DECREE.—At common law, no court could suspend its judgment, but by § 4, ch. 17, Acts 1872-3, the power is given to suspend its judgment, upon the execution by the party desiring to appeal, of a suspending bond, in such cases, and only in such cases as may be taken up to an appellate court by writ of error and supersedeas. Swinburn v. Smith, 15 W. Va. 483.

Where, in case of upset bid and conditional setting aside of sale and suspension of decree of sale to a certain period in order to give an upset bidder opportunity to comply with the conditions of resale, he applies to the judge in vacation for an extension of such suspension, in order to give time to apply for appeal and supersedeas, and the judge delays acting on such application till after the period within which compliance was permissible, such action of the judge cannot be corrected by the appellate court. Yost v. Porter, 80 Va. 855.

G. OBLIGOR IN BOND.

Attorney.—In Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Vanderwarker, 19 W. Va. 265, the court said: "The law does not require that the party obtaining an appeal or supersedeas shall himself execute a bond with security; but, that he or some one else for him shall do so."

Where a supersedeas bond has been executed by the appellant's attorney, the benefit of which it has received and enjoyed, it is estopped to deny that a supersedeas was awarded in that case, by a recital of that fact in the bond. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Vanderwarker, 19 W. Va. 265.

An appeal bond need not be signed by the plaintiff in error, since it may be given by a stranger. York v. Free, 38 W. Va. 336, 18 S. E. Rep. 492.

H. OBLIGEE IN BOND.—Under § 6 and 8, ch. 12, Code 1873, an appeal bond may be made payable to the commonwealth, or to any person injured by a breach of the condition of such bond. Acker v. A. & F. R. Co., 84 Va. 648, 5 S. E. Rep. 688.

I. WHERE APPEAL BOND SHOULD BE GIVEN.

—Where an appeal is taken in court, the appeal bond cannot legally be given in the clerk's office, but should be given in court. Thomson v. Evans, 6 Munf. 397.

J. CONDITION OF BOND.

Where Supersedeas Is Awarded.—Where a supersedeas is awarded, but the bond on appeal required by Code 1887, §§ 3470, 3471, is conditioned to pay only costs and damages, and not the debt, the court will, on motion, discharge the supersedeas, but will allow the appeal to remain in force on filing a new bond. Reid v. Norfolk City R. Co., 2 Va. Dec. 86.

Under the Code of 1819, it was held that the penalty of a supersedeas bond was to be fixed by the judge granting it, and was not governed by the law respecting appeals by plaintiffs or demandants. Smock v. Dade, 5 Rand. 639.

Where the clerk, in copying a bond, conditioned by order of court "to pay any deficiency in the funds arising from the land sales decreed, to meet and discharge the sums decreed against the appellants," adds a condition "to pay the judgment," these two conditions, in the absence of a clearly manifested intention to the contrary, will be held to mean the same thing i. e. to pay the deficiency, not to pay the judgment and in addition to indemnify the original purchasers. Harnsberger v. Yancey, 33 Gratt. 527.

Where the recital in an appeal bond states that it was given to perfect a writ of error, but the condition adds a further obligation to satisfy the judgment if affirmed or if the writ of error be dismissed, it will be presumed that a supersedeas also was granted in accordance with the condition. State v. Dotts, 31 W. Va. 819, 8 S. E. Rep. 391.

Where No Supersedeas Issues.—If a party is unable to give bond and security for the debt, he may have his appeal on giving security for costs only, but the decree will not be superseded. Erskine v. Henry, 6 Leigh 378.

Appeal from Decree Dissolving Injunction.—The

penalty of the appeal and supersedeas bond should be sufficient to indemnify and save harmless the surety in the injunction bond. Cardwell v. Allen, 28 Gratt. 184.

A party appealing from an order dissolving an injunction can only be required to give security to perform the decree of the inferior court, and to pay the costs and damages awarded in the appellate court, if the decree shall be affirmed. Quere, whether, where bond and security have been given to perform the decree of the court below, and further security is required in the appellate court, which the party cannot give, the surety in the first bond is discharged. M'Kay v. Hite, 4 Rand. 564.

Injunction to Judgment.—When a party has obtained an injunction from the court of chancery to a judgment at law, which is afterwards dissolved, and he appeals to the court of appeals, he cannot be required to give security for the amount of the judgment enjoined, but only for such costs as may be awarded against him by the court of appeals. Eppes v. Thurman, 4 Rand. 384.

Rents and Profits.—Where a decree for the sale of the land is rendered in a chancery suit to enforce judgment liens on land, the supersedeas bond does not cover any loss occasioned by the receipt of rents and profits by the debtor during the pendency of the appeal and supersedeas in the court of appeals. Hutton v. Lockridge, 27 W. Va. 428; Beard v. Arbuckle, 19 W. Va. 145; Perry v. Horn, 21 W. Va. 732.

That portion of § 13, chapter 178, of the Code of 1873, prescribing the penalty of an appeal and supersedeas bond, refers only to the damages mentioned in § 24 of the same chapter, and was not intended to cover the rents and profits of real estate in the possession of the appellant who had given a deed of trust thereon to secure a debt fully equal to its value, he having obtained an injunction to prevent the sale of such real estate, which injunction was dissolved, and the bill dismissed; and the penalty of the appeal and supersedeas bond will not be fixed with reference to such "rents and profits." Cardwell v. Allen, 28 Gratt. 184.

The word "awarded," in said § 13, ch. 178, Code 1873, refers to the words "damages and costs;" and the word "incurred" to the word "fees" therein, so as to make the meaning the same as if the sentence had been written; "and also to pay all damages and costs which may be awarded against, and all fees which may be incurred by, the appellants or petitioners." Cardwell v. Allen, 28 Gratt. 184.

Decree Partly Executed.—Where an interlocutory decree directs the defendant to deliver up slaves to be divided among the plaintiffs, and then there is a final decree against him for the profits; and defendant appeals from both decrees. Held, if defendant has complied with the interlocutory decree by delivering the property, he will not be required to give an appeal bond with surety for delivery thereof in case of affirmance; if he has not so complied with it, such appeal bond will be required.

And upon the question, whether defendant has so complied or not, parol evidence, by affidavits, will be received in the appellate court. Erskine v. Henry, 6 Leigh 378; Bull v. Douglas, 4 Munf. 303.

Dismissal of Appeal.—The omission in the Code of 1869 of the provision in appeal bonds that the obligors should be responsible, if the appeal was dismissed, made no real change in the condition of the bond, since the dismissal is the equivalent of an affirmance, the condition as to which was retained. Cas- anova v. Kreusch, 21 W. Va. 720; Perry v. Horn, 21 W. Va. 732.

K. EFFECT ON ATTACHMENT.—Where, upon a decree in favor of an attaching creditor, and an appeal therefrom, the appellant gives an appeal bond, the giving of this bond does not release the attachment. Magill v. Sauer, 20 Gratt. 540.

L. DEFECTIVE BONDS.

Certiorari Instead of Appeal Bond.—Where an appeal is taken from the county court sitting in chancery, and a bond is given, which is in fact a certiorari, and not an appeal bond, but no objection is made to the regularity of the bond in the court of chancery, and an appeal is taken to the court of appeals, and in that court, an objection is made, for the first time, to the bond, the objection comes too late; but if it had been made in the court of chancery, that court could only have dismissed the appeal nisi, or have laid the party under a rule to give a proper bond, in a reasonable time. Brown v. Matthews, 1 Rand. 462.

So where the clause "all actual damages incurred in consequence of the supersedeas" is omitted from the condition. Virginia Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Mfg. Co., 95 Va. 515, 28 S. E. Rep. 888.

Misrecital—The fact that an appeal bond recites a judgment, not as the judgment of the circuit court of the city of Alexandria but as "a judgment of the circuit court of Alexandria" will not affect the validity of the bond being merely a clerical error, that may be amended by the record. Acker v. A. & F. R. Co., 84 Va. 648, 5 S. E. Rep. 688.

Failure to Waive Homestead.—So an omission to waive the homestead exemption. Acker v. A. & F. R. Co., 84 Va. 648, 5 S. E. Rep. 688.

Bond Executed by Surety Alone.—A bond for prosecuting a writ of supersedeas executed by a surety only, without any principal obligor, is insufficient; and a supersedeas issued thereupon ought to be quashed. Miller v. Blannerhassett, 5 Munf. 197; Rootes v. Holliday, 4 Munf. 323; Day v. Pickett, 4 Munf. 104.

Objection Must Be Made Promptly.—Where it is certified by the lower court that the appellant with his surety, upon the allowance of the appeal, executed the required bond, the appellee cannot, after the lapse of more than five years from the judgment, have the appeal dismissed for any supposed defect in the bond, e. g. a misrecital of the amount of the judgment, and so deprive the appellant of his right of appeal altogether. He should have moved promptly to have the appeal dismissed, by not doing so he will be held to have waived the defect. Jackson v. Henderson, 3 Leigh 196; Va. F. & M. Ins. Co. v. N. Y., etc., Co., 95 Va. 515, 28 S. E. Rep. 888.

In the above case the appellant had died and the appeal had been revived in the name of the appellant's administratrix and it was held that the appellee was not even entitled to a rule upon the appellant's administratrix to give further security, which as administratrix she was not required to give; but the court intimated that if the appellant were himself alive the error could be corrected. Jackson v. Henderson, 3 Leigh 196.

M. FILING OF BOND.—The filing of an appeal bond, with the clerk, must be in pursuance of an allowance of the appeal, entered on the record. Burch v. White, 3 Rand. 104.

N. INSUFFICIENCY OF SECURITY.—The appellate court is the sole judge of the sufficiency of the security, after security has been given. Anderson v. Anderson, 2 Call 198.

Section 3436, Code 1887, whereby a circuit judge may in vacation hear and determine upon appeal whether a judgment of the court below is right or wrong, does not authorize the judge in vacation to enquire into the sufficiency of an appeal bond, and to order a new bond, or new or additional security; such order is coram non judice and void. Chase v. Miller, 88 Va. 791, 14 S. E. Rep. 545.

Remedy.—The party injured by the insufficiency of an appeal bond has his remedy by action on the official bond of the clerk of the court. Sections 177, 178 and 180. Chase v. Miller, 88 Va. 791, 14 S. E. Rep. 545.

O. RIGHTS OF SURETY.—Where a judgment was rendered for 148 dollars 63 cents damages, with interest and costs, and on the same day an appeal was allowed, and, the judgment being affirmed, damages were recovered against the appellant for retarding the execution, and also costs in the appellate court, and, a fiat facias being then issued and returned nulla bona, the surety in the appeal bond paid 300 dollars 64 cents in satisfaction of the judgment, and within a year after the affirmance, filed a bill to charge real estate aliened by the debtor between the date of the original judgment and the date of the judgment of affirmance. Held, the surety is to be substituted in the place of the judgment creditor, and to have the benefit of his lien. M'Clung v. Beirne, 10 Leigh 394.

Abatement of Appeal by Death.—Where defendant appeals from a judgment against him, and the appeal abates by reason of his death and is not revived, the surety on the appeal bond is released. Nelson v. Anderson, 2 Call 286.

P. ACTION ON BOND.—Where the recital in an appeal bond states that it was given to perfect a writ of error, but the condition adds a further obligation to satisfy the judgment if affirmed or the writ of error be dismissed, it will be presumed that a supersedeas also was granted in accordance with the condition. The plaintiff may either allege in his declaration on such a bond that it was given to perfect a writ of error and supersedeas or he may simply set forth the bond and condition, and in the latter case his declaration is not demurrable. The defendant may plead directly that the bond was given to perfect a writ of error only. State v. Dotts, 81 W. Va. 819, 8 S. E. Rep. 391.

In actions on appeal bonds, the court of appeals will not consider either judicial errors, or clerical misprisions, in the court below, occurring in the original suit, and in which there has been an acquiescence by the parties not appealing to correct them. Miller v. M'Luer, Gilmer 838.

XVII. APPEALS FROM INFERIOR TRIBUNALS.

A. IN CIVIL CASES.

1. GENERALLY.—Where the inferior tribunal whose decision is sought to be reviewed has any discretion, the proper method is by certiorari and not mandamus. Board v. Minturn, 4 W. Va. 300.

It seems that it has ever been the law, that when it is proper to review the proceedings of inferior tribunals, and the law has not provided redress by appeal, writ of error or other process, resort may be had to the writ of certiorari to prevent a failure of justice. Morgan v. Ohio, etc., R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588; Railway Co. v. Board of Public Works, 28 W. Va. 268.

In Alderson v. Commissioners, 31 W. Va. 633, 8 S. E. Rep. 274, JOHNSON, P., said, § 12, art. 8 of the Constitution of West Virginia, declaring that "the cir-cult courts shall have the supervision and control of all proceedings before justices and other inferior tribunals, by mandamus, prohibition and certiorari" was a broad declaration that in the state of West Virginia there was no tribunal that was not subject to be legally controlled by the courts.

The mere fact that the word "control" in the clause of the constitution of 1863 giving the circuit courts "supervision and control of all proceedings before justices and other inferior tribunals by mandamus, prohibition and certiorari" is omitted from the similar clause in the constitution of 1872 does not deprive the circuit court of jurisdiction to review the judgment of the county court in contested election cases, by certiorari. Dryden v. Swinburne, 20 W. Va. 89.

Section 12, art. VII of the Constitution of West Virginia 1872, providing that the circuit courts shall have supervision of all proceedings before the county courts and other inferior tribunals by certiorari, etc., is restricted in § 29 of same article providing that the county court shall have jurisdiction of all appeals from the judgments of justices, and their decision upon such appeal shall be final in all cases, except in certain specified cases. Poe v. Machine Works, 24 W. Va. 517.

By § 2, ch. 153, Acts 1882 W. Va., the remedy by certiorari in the circuit court is greatly enlarged, both as to the questions that may be reviewed and the inferior tribunals to which it is made to lie. Whether it is extended to all inferior tribunals, whether executive, ministerial or judicial, was not necessary to the decision of the case since county courts were expressly mentioned. Chenoweth v. Commissioners, 26 W. Va. 230.

Notice of Writ.—It is not necessary for the court granting a writ of certiorari to give notice to the opposite party or to issue a rule against him to show cause against its being granted, but it is a matter within their discretion, and if they think it unnecessary and not tending to any useful purpose, they need not do so. But the other party, though not a formal party, must be notified of the pending of the proceeding before the court acts upon the writ after its return. Dryden v. Swinburn, 15 W. Va. 234.

In Dryden v. Swinburn, 15 W. Va. 234, supra, the court intimated, though not necessary to the decision, that if the other party was not a formal party, no merely formal objection could be made to the service of such notice, it would only be necessary to show that he had notice.

2. APPEALS FROM JUSTICES.

a. Technical Appeal.

(1) Generally.—The defendant may take an appeal as of right from the judgment of a justice, if he tender the required bond within ten days after judgment. Hubbard v. Yocum, 30 W. Va. 740, 5 S. E. Rep. 867; Parsons v. Aultman, 45 W. Va. 473, 31 S. E. Rep. 935.

The appeal was for a time to the county court, but by ch. 63, Acts 1877, the appeal is restored to the circuit courts. Hubbard v. Yocum, 30 W. Va. 740, 5 S. E. Rep. 867.

Though the judgment of a justice is erroneous yet if such error arises, not from want of jurisdiction in the justice, but merely from an erroneous exercise of a conceded jurisdiction, the remedy is only by appeal and not by certiorari. Poe v. Machine Works, 24 W. Va. 517.

(2) Where Appeal Is Not Taken within Ten Days.—It is settled by the decisions in West Virginia that unless

"good cause" appears in the petition for the failure to take the appeal within ten days as prescribed by § 174, ch. 50 of the Code, the appeal must be dismissed by the circuit court as improvidently awarded. § 174, ch. 8, Acts 1881; Lowther v. Davis, 33 W. Va. 132, 10 S. E. Rep. 20; Home Sewing Machine Co. v. Floding, 27 W. Va. 540.

But it may, and in a proper case should, be granted after the expiration of ten days, and within ninety days after the date of the judgment, when the party otherwise entitled to the writ shall show, by his own oath or otherwise, good cause for his not having applied for such writ within the ten days. Long v. Ohio River R. Co., 35 W. Va. 333, 13 S. E. Rep. 1010; State v. Larue, 37 W. Va. 828, 17 S. E. Rep. 397; Womer v. Ravenswood, etc., R. Co., 37 W. Va. 287, 19 S. E. Rep. 488.

Where such writ is not applied for within ten days but within ninety days after the judgment, and the record shows no excuse for not sooner applying, no presumption arises from the mere grant of the writ that good excuse was otherwise shown. The excuse or cause for not applying for the writ within ten days must always appear in writing as part of the record. Morgan v. Ohio, etc., R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588.

Where a justice renders judgment on a verdict on one day, and the next day a motion for a new trial is made and overruled, the ten days allowed for a certiorari begins to run on the latter day. A motion for a new trial suspends the finality of a judgment already entered, until the date of the denial of the new trial, for the purposes of limitation of a writ of certiorari or appeal. Straley v. Payne, 43 W. Va. 185, 27 S. E. Rep. 359.

Where a writ of certiorari is not taken within ten days after the judgment, the defendant to it will be given the benefit of that defense in the court of appeals, though the record merely shows that the case was heard in the circuit court on the record and proceedings, without showing any motion to quash or dismiss. Morgan v. Ohio, etc., R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588.

But a judgment on a certiorari granted more than ten days after a judgment is not void so that it may be vacated at any time, however erroneous it is. Morgan v. Ohio River R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588.

No Relation to Beginning of Term.—Although judgments and decrees relate back to the first day of the term at which they were rendered, yet there is an exception where the case was not ready for hearing on the first day of the term, so that even if the rule applied to a petition to the circuit court for a writ of certiorari, such a case would come within the exception, where on the first day of the term it was not in a condition to be heard, there being in fact no such case until the petition was filed. Hence the decision in such a case will not relate back to the first day of the term of the circuit court so as to bring the presentation of the petition within the ten days' limit. Womer v. Ravenswood, etc., R. Co., 37 W. Va. 287, 19 S. E. Rep. 488.

(3) What Constitutes "Good Cause."

Generally.—When the party has neglected to avail himself of his absolute right to an appeal within ten days, he can only obtain the new trial within ninety days upon showing such cause as would entitle him to a new trial; the facts shown to warrant the granting of the appeal after the expiration of the ten days must show fraud, accident, surprise or some adventitious circumstances beyond the control of the party. Home S. M. Co. v. Floding, 27 W. Va. 540; Ruffner v. Love, 24 W. Va. 181; Hubbard v. Yocum, 30 W. Va. 740, 5 S. E. Rep. 867; Powell v. Miller, 41 W. Va. 371, 23 S. E. Rep. 557.

Where a party desires to appeal from the judgment of a justice which has been rendered against him, goes to the justice's office within ten days after the date of such judgment, and informs the justice that he wishes to take an appeal, and the justice, being engaged at the time, promises him to prepare a bond, and bring it to his place of business for execution, and such party pays no further attention to the matter until after ten days have expired, the justice failing to comply with his promise within the ten days, these facts, stated in a petition to the judge of the circuit court in vacation, are not sufficient cause for granting an appeal, as prescribed by statute, within ninety days after the date of said judgment. Powell v. Miller, 41 W. Va. 371, 23 S. E. Rep. 557.

Negligence of Justice.—If a party to a judgment files a good and sufficient bond in the office of the justice who rendered the judgment within ten days thereafter, with the person in charge of the office during the temporary absence of the justice, he is entitled to his appeal as a matter of right, and no act of negligence on the part of the justice can deprive him of the same. Holmes v. Yoke, 48 W. Va. 267, 37 S. E. Rep. 545.

Refusal by Justice to Grant Appeal.—Where the petition stated that he applied to the justice for an appeal within the ten days, but the justice refused to grant it, this was held "good cause" for the failure. Lowther v. Davis, 33 W. Va. 132, 10 S. E. Rep. 20; Clark v. West Virginia, etc., R. Co., 50 W. Va. 1, 40 S. E. Rep. 351.

Where a justice who has no jurisdiction of the case tries it, and renders judgment, if such justice refuses to set aside such judgment and rehear such case, an appeal will lie from his judgment to the circuit court, as in other cases, and, if he refuse to grant the same within ten days, the circuit court of the county, or judge thereof in vacation, may grant the same on application. Parsons v. Aultman, 45 W. Va. 473, 31 S. E. Rep. 935.

Recovery of Judgment without the Knowledge of Defendant.—If a plaintiff in an action before a justice agrees with the defendant to dismiss it or abandon it, but afterwards, without the knowledge of the defendant, obtains judgment against the defendant, the defendant first discovering such judgment after ten days from its date, this constitutes good cause for obtaining an appeal from a circuit court within ninety days after the judgment. McCormick v. Short, 49 W. Va. 1, 37 S. E. Rep. 769.

But the fact that he did not know a judgment had been rendered against him, when he had been served with process is not "good cause." Hubbard v. Yocum, 30 W. Va. 740, 5 S. E. Rep. 867.

Ignorance of the Law.—Mere ignorance of what the law required of him is not "good cause." Home Sewing Machine Co. v. Floding, 27 W. Va. 540.

Nor is it material that the party desiring to appeal was a nonresident. Hubbard v. Yocum, 30 W. Va. 740, 5 S. E. Rep. 867.

Erroneous Advice of Counsel.—Erroneous advice of counsel is not "good cause." Ruffner v. Love, 24 W. Va. 181.

Miscarriage of Letter.—So the miscarriage of a letter is no excuse where enough time elapsed to arouse suspicion that it had miscarried, before the expiration of the ten days. Hubbard v. Yocum, 30 W. Va. 740, 5 S. E. Rep. 867.

How Shown.

Must Be in Writing.—Such "good cause" is to be shown by a written application, sworn to by the applicant or some one else and by affidavits or other written proofs filed with the application. Hubbard v. Yocum, 30 W. Va. 740, 5 S. E. Rep. 867.

If a petition for an appeal from the judgment of a justice states facts showing good cause for not having taken an appeal within ten days, and is verified by affidavit, and an appeal is granted, that appeal cannot be dismissed as improvidently granted merely because proof of such cause for not taking the appeal sooner is not made by affidavit or other proof independent of the petition and separate from it. McCormick v. Short, 49 W. Va. 1, 37 S. E. Rep. 769.

Must Be Ex Parte.—The "good cause" is to be shown to the court ex parte, the other party cannot contest the fact in the circuit court; his only remedy is by appeal. Hubbard v. Yocum, 30 W. Va. 740, 5 S. E. Rep. 867.

Where Appeal Is Not Taken within Ninety Days.—If an application be not made to the circuit court within ninety days from the rendition of the judgment of a justice, in no case can he grant an appeal, and if he grant one, it must be dismissed as improvidently granted. Home Sewing Machine Co. v. Floding, 27 W. Va. 540; State v. Larue, 37 W. Va. 828, 17 S. E. Rep. 397.

Refusal to Grant Appeal.—Mandamus is not a proper remedy when a justice refuses to grant an appeal from his decision, since the party aggrieved has an adequate remedy by petition to the circuit court or judge. Lowther v. Davis, 33 W. Va. 132, 10 S. E. Rep. 20.

(4) Effect of Appeal.—Where the effect of the appeal is to transfer the action to an appellate court in which the case is to be tried de novo, and the controversy is to be settled by a judgment in such court regardless of the judgment appealed from, the appeal operates not only to suspend the judgment of the justice or inferior tribunal, but vacates and sets it aside, so that it cannot be used as evidence or as the foundation of an action in any court. An appeal in such case is very different in its effect from a proceeding, which seeks to review a judgment by a writ of error. In the latter case the judgment is merely suspended, but in the former the judgment is vacated and made ineffectual for any purpose, the judgment in legal construction no longer remains in force and cannot be the foundation of a new action. Evans v. Taylor, 28 W. Va. 184.

An appeal from the judgment of a justice, which, in the appellate court, is tried de novo, is a continuation of the same suit, so that the liability of the obligor in a detinue bond continues until the appeal is decided. Bratt v. Marum, 24 W. Va. 652.

(5) Equivalent to Appearance in Appellate Court.—An appeal by a party to a case in the justice's court operates as a general appearance in the appellate court, and gives that court jurisdiction of the person of the appellant, and as a general rule the irregularities in the proceedings before the justice are waived by an appeal. Thorn v. Thorn, 47 W. Va. 4, 34 S. E. Rep. 759.

(6) Dismissal of Appeal.—Where a party appeals to the circuit court from a judgment rendered against him by a justice, he cannot, on his own motion, have his appeal dismissed, and the judgment of the justice affirmed, over the objection of the appellee. Watson v. Hurry, 47 W. Va. 809, 35 S. E. Rep. 830.

Lack of Jurisdiction in Justice.—Where a justice has no jurisdiction of a civil action, neither has a circuit court on appeal, though such circuit court would have original jurisdiction in the case, and therefore such court must dismiss the action for want of jurisdiction. Richmond v. Henderson, 48 W. Va. 389, 37 S. E. Rep. 654.

Title to Property Involved.—Where an appeal is taken from a judgment of a justice in an action of unlawful detainer, and it appears by answer filed that the title to property is involved, the circuit court will dismiss the action. Watson v. Watson, 45 W. Va. 290, 31 S. E. Rep. 939.

b. Certiorari.

(1) Generally.—The judges of the superior courts, within their respective jurisdictions, may award a certiorari to remove proceedings on an inquest of a riot taken before the justices. Mackaboy v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 268.

By § 2, ch. 110, Amend. Code passed in 1882, the circuit court is given power to review by certiorari every case before a justice except where the judgment does not exceed $15, exclusive of interest and costs. This statute was held constitutional. Fouse v. Vandervort, 30 W. Va. 327, 4 S. E. Rep. 298; Bee v. Seaman, 36 W. Va. 381, 15 S. E. Rep. 173.

Under the West Virginia statute, the writ of certiorari lies after judgment of the justice; and, upon the hearing in the circuit court, such court will review the judgment of the justice upon the merits, determining all questions arising on the law and the evidence, and render such judgment or make such order upon the whole matter as law and justice may require. Bee v. Seaman, 36 W. Va. 381, 15 S. E. Rep. 173.

The statutory remedy of certiorari to judgments of justices in civil cases is merely a form of appeal. Parsons v. Aultman, 45 W. Va. 473, 31 S. E. Rep. 935.

The two have therefore become, so far as applied to the review of civil cases before justices, synonymous terms, except that the certiorari appeal is granted as a matter of sound discretion, and the appeal certiorari is granted as a matter of right. Parsons v. Aultman, 45 W. Va. 473, 31 S. E. Rep. 935.

The remedy by writ of certiorari, given by ch. 110 of the Code, to review the judgment of a justice, is not given as a matter of right, but is awarded by the court, or judge, for cause, on proper case shown. Harrow v. Ohio River R. Co., 38 W. Va. 711, 18 S. E. Rep. 926.

The writ of certiorari, when awarded in civil cases before justices, under §§ 2, 3, ch. 110, Code, is an appellate process, designed to affect the ends of justice: and the circuit court has a large discretion in awarding the same, reviewing judgments, and granting new trials thereunder, and, unless such discretion is plainly abused, the court of appeals cannot interfere therewith. Michaelson v. Cantley, 45 W. Va. 533, 32 S. E. Rep. 170.

Where a cause is removed after verdict and judgment from a justice's court on a writ of certiorari to the circuit court, under the third section of chapter 153 of the Acts of 1882, upon the hearing, such circuit court will, where there is a certificate of the evidence incorporated in a bill of exceptions signed by the justice, review the judgment of the justice upon the merits, and if of opinion to reverse the judgment will direct a new trial before a jury, unless neither party requires a jury. Natural Gas. Co. v. Healy, 33 W. Va. 102, 10 S. E. Rep. 56.

Upon the presentation to the circuit court of a petition for a writ of certiorari to remove into said court the proceedings in a civil action before a justice, an agreement between the parties that said petitioner's application for said writ should be argued and discussed by them before said circuit court as if the writ of certiorari had been in fact issued, and due return had been made thereto, the record, proceedings and judgment in said civil action before said justice having been transmitted to and removed into the circuit court in pursuance of such agreement, will not bring the case before the circuit court for review on its merits, but brings up the transcript for the purpose of determining whether the application should be granted. State v. Larue, 37 W. Va. 828, 17 S. E. Rep. 397.

(2) Form of Writ.—Where no objection is made to the form of a writ of certiorari in the circuit court, it is too late to object in the court of appeals. Burke v. Supervisors, 4 W. Va. 371.

(3) Motion to Quash.—In a proper case the writ may, on motion, be superseded before its return, as on the ground that it was improvidently awarded; and by motion to quash, it may be quashed on any proper ground after the return. The language of the motion is not material, so that it gives notice of the thing asked to be done; nor the language of the order of the court, if it properly directs that it be done. Long v. Ohio River R. Co., 35 W. Va. 333, 13 S. E. Rep. 1010.

(4) The Record.—When a writ of certiorari under the statute is awarded to a justice to review his judgment, in order to respond to the exigency of the writ, he must certify and send the record as the writ finds it. As the record is when the writ reaches him, so it must be certified and sent. It is then too late to make contemplated or intended certificates of facts and bills of exception parts of such record, but it must be sent up as it is, without increase or diminution. Bee v. Seaman, 36 W. Va. 381, 15 S. E. Rep. 173.

(5) Proceedings after Reversal.—Under the West Virginia statute, the writ lies after judgment, and the circuit court, after reversing the judgment complained of, retains it for final disposition, if the amount in controversy is more than $15. Long v. Ohio River R. Co., 35 W. Va. 333, 13 S. E. Rep. 1010.

(6) Amendment of Summons.—Upon a writ of certiorari from a judgment of a justice, the circuit court may allow the return on the summons issued by the justice to be amended. McClure-Mable Lumber Co. v. Brooks, 46 W. Va. 732, 34 S. E. Rep. 921.

(7) Return to Writ.—Before hearing a case, matter, or proceeding removed by certiorari from an inferior tribunal, the circuit court should require a formal legal return thereto to be made by the officers to whom the same is directed, unless such return is waived by the parties to such case, matter, or proceeding. Cushwa v. Lamar, 45 W. Va. 326, 32 S. E. Rep. 10.

Generally the return to the writ is conclusive and no extrinsic evidence will be received either to support or overthrow the proceeding which is sought to be reviewed. Poe v. Machine Works, 24 W. Va. 517.

Defective Return.—The fact that the return of the writ of certiorari is made by one of the justices of the county court and not by the president is no ground for the dismissal of the case by the circuit court, but that court should order a new writ to be served on the president and require him to make a return. Bd. of Ed. v. Hopkins, 19 W. Va. 84.

(8) Petition for Writ.—The petition for the writ should disclose a proper case upon its face, and when issued it may be dismissed without a hearing.

when improvidently awarded. Long v. Ohio River R. Co., 35 W. Va. 333, 13 S. E. Rep. 1010.

Must Be Presented within Ten Days.—In applying to the circuit court for a writ of certiorari to the judgment of a justice, under ch. 110 of the Code of West Virginia, the general rule is that the petitioner must present his petition within ten days after the judgment complained of is rendered, according to the analogy of appeals in § 164, ch. 50 of the Code. Long v. Ohio River R. Co., 35 W. Va. 333, 13 S. E. Rep. 1010; State v. Larue, 37 W. Va. 828, 17 S. E. Rep. 397; Morgan v. Ohio River R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588; Womer v. Ravenswood, etc., R. Co., 37 W. Va. 287, 16 S. E. Rep. 488; Bee v. Seaman, 36 W. Va. 381, 15 S. E. Rep. 173.

Where the petition for, and the writ of certiorari to, the judgment of a justice shows that it was not applied for within ten days after the judgment was entered, it should not be granted, unless good cause be shown why the writ was not applied for within ten days; and, if so issued after the time without such showing, it should be quashed as improvidently awarded. Arnold v. Lewis County Court, 38 W. Va. 142, 18 S. E. Rep. 476.

Waiver of Objection.—The defendant in a writ of certiorari to a justice's decision does not waive the objection that it was not taken within ten days, by appearing to the writ, without a motion to quash or dismiss, or even by consenting to a continuance. Morgan v. Ohio River R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588.

(9) Showing Good Cause.—It was held in Morgan v. Ohio River R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588, that the "good cause" must be shown by written evidence on a writ of certiorari from a justice as well as on an appeal.

As to what constitutes "good cause," see supra, "Appeal from Justice."

c. Jurisdictional Amount.
In Virginia.

Under Rev. Code 1819.—Where there was a judgment of a justice of the peace, affirmed by the county court, for debt, principal, interest, damages and costs not amounting to $3 dollars 33 cents; it was held that the circuit court had no appellate jurisdiction to review such judgment, by certiorari or otherwise. Hay v. Pistor, 2 Leigh 707.

Under Code 1887.—Under § 2947 of the Code Va. 1887, there can be no appeal from the judgment of a justice, unless the matter in controversy, exclusive of interest and costs, is of greater amount or value than ten dollars. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Clark, 92 Va. 118, 22 S. E. Rep. 867.

In West Virginia.—Where a justice in a suit involving a matter merely pecuniary not exceeding $15, has jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person, and renders a bona fide judgment on the merits clearly wrong, but within the scope of his legitimate powers, the circuit court will not, upon a writ of certiorari issued in the exercise of its original supervisory jurisdiction conferred by the constitution, review and reverse such judgment, but will dismiss the writ, as improvidently awarded. Wilson v. West Virginia, C. & P. Ry. Co., 38 W. Va. 212, 18 S. E. Rep. 577.

Costs.—Under Code 1887, § 2947, costs are not to be computed as a part of the matter in controversy in determining the right of appeal from a judgment of a justice of the peace. Shafer v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 2 Va. Dec. 252.

Trial by Jury.—On the trial of an appeal, in the circuit court, from the judgment of a justice, where the amount in controversy exceeds $30, if required by either party, a jury of twelve men will be selected and impanelled to try the case in like manner as other juries are selected and impanelled in said court. Lovings v. Norfolk & W. Ry. Co., 47 W. Va. 582, 35 S. E. Rep. 902.

Section 169, ch. 50 of the Code of West Virginia, in so far only as it authorizes a jury of six men to try in the circuit court, appeals from judgments of justices, is unconstitutional and void. Lovings v. Norfolk & W. Ry. Co., 47 W. Va. 582, 35 S. E. Rep. 902.

d. Cases Tried by Jury.—No fact tried in a civil action by a jury of six persons before a justice can be retried de novo by the circuit court, or otherwise than according to the rules of the common law. Hall v. Wadsworth, 30 W. Va. 55, 3 S. E. Rep. 29.

Where a case has been tried by a jury of six before a justice as provided by § 13, art. III of the Constitution of W. Va., no appeal can be taken to the circuit court, the same section declaring that "No fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined, in any case, than according to the rules of the common law"; hence, no provision having been made for allowing a writ of error in such cases, such a judgment cannot be reviewed in any way. Barlow v. Daniels, 25 W. Va. 512; Barker v. Walton, 31 W. Va. 468, 7 S. E. Rep. 452.

It makes no difference that the defendant makes no defense before the justice. Hickman v. Railroad Co., 30 W. Va. 296, 4 S. E. Rep. 654; Vandervort v. Fouse, 30 W. Va. 326, 4 S. E. Rep. 660.

Hence a mandamus will not lie to compel him to grant an appeal. Woodford v. Hull, 31 W. Va. 470, 7 S. E. Rep. 450.

But in Richmond v. Henderson, 48 W. Va. 389, 37 S. E. Rep. 658, this was overruled, and it was held that an appeal lies from the judgment of a justice rendered upon the verdict of a jury of six, just as in cases tried by him without a jury, and the writ of certiorari does not lie in such case.

Where a party, against whom a judgment was rendered by a justice of the peace on the verdict of a jury, obtained a writ of certiorari, and removed the same into the circuit court to be reviewed, before the decision of the case of Richmond v. Henderson, 48 W. Va. 389, 37 S. E. Rep. 658, and said judgment was affirmed by the circuit court, and a writ of error awarded by the court of appeals, before said decision of Richmond v. Henderson, and the plaintiff in error has asked that said certiorari be treated as an appeal, the judgment of the circuit court will be reversed, and the case remanded, with directions to treat it as being in said circuit court on appeal, and proceed with it accordingly. Harbert v. Monongahela River R. Co., 50 W. Va. 233, 40 S. E. Rep. 377.

e. Harmless Error.—If there has been a full and fair trial on the merits of the controversy in a civil action commenced before a justice, the judgment will not be reversed for mere technical errors, not prejudicial to the fairness of such trial. Furbee v. Shay, 46 W. Va. 736, 34 S. E. Rep. 746.

When there is no note in the record of the filing of a complaint or answer in an action originating before a justice, but there is copied into the record both a complaint by the plaintiff and an answer by the defendant, signed by them respectively, with which the evidence of the parties adduced on the trial is entirely consistent, and the record shows there was a full and fair trial, the appellate court will presume that the pleadings were so made up. Griffin v. Haight, 45 W. Va. 460, 31 S. E. Rep. 957.

Where a party after obtaining an appeal from a judgment of a justice, appeared in the circuit court and moved the court to quash the return on the process in the justice's court on the ground that it did not appear that the person who served the process was a special constable, and, on the motion being overruled, defended the suit and had a fair trial, it was held that the circuit court did not err. Johnson v. McCoy, 32 W. Va. 552, 9 S. E. Rep. 887.

Although the jury, upon an appeal to the circuit court from a justice of the peace, were sworn "to try the issue joined" and not "to try whether he unlawfully withheld the premises in controversy," where it appears that the case was tried on the merits without objection and no injustice was done to the plaintiff in error, the judgment will not be reversed for such technicality. Chancey v. Smith, 25 W. Va. 404.

3. APPEALS FROM COUNTY COURT.—Wherever the action of the county court is judicial in its nature, it is reviewable by the circuit court by certiorari. Poteet v. County of Cabell, 30 W. Va. 58, 3 S. E. Rep. 97.

But where the power conferred on the county courts is not judicial, but legislative, or executive, neither the circuit court nor the supreme court of appeals can review the final order of the county court in such cases. Poteet v. County of Cabell, 30 W. Va. 58, 3 S. E. Rep. 97.

The addition to §§ 10, 12, ch. 47, Code 1873, allowing appeals to the circuit courts where the decision complained of is upon an order made by the county court or the judge thereof, has no application to orders made by the county court when composed of justices of the peace under the old constitution. Dinwiddle County v. Stuart, 28 Gratt. 526.

Condemnation Proceedings.—The circuit court has jurisdiction to award a writ of supersedeas to the judgment of a county court in a proceeding under § 15 of the act incorporating the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal Company to condemn lands. Ches., etc., Canal Co. v. Hoyer, 2 Gratt. 511.

Order Granting Appeal from Justice.—The order of a county court granting an appeal from the judgment of a justice is reviewable both in the circuit court and in the court of appeals. Ruffner v. Love, 34 W. Va. 181.

Cases Removed from Justice's Court.—Where a warrant is brought before a justice upon a claim exceeding twenty dollars, and upon the application of the defendant before trial, it is removed to the county court, an appeal lies to the circuit court, from the judgment of the county court in the case. Carter v. Kelly, 28 Gratt. 787.

Contested Election Cases.—But the statute of 1872 being silent as to the cases in which a writ of error or supersedeas may be awarded to the judgment of a county court, the common-law rule is in force and the reviewal must be by certiorari, in such cases as by the common law would only be reviewed in that manner, e. g. cases of contested election cases under the provision of ch. 118, Acts 1872-3. Dryden v. Swinburn, 15 W. Va. 234; Fowler v. Thompson, 22 W. Va. 106; Dryden v. Swinburne, 20 W. Va. 89.

Settlement of Sheriff's Account.—Although the settlement of a sheriff's account before commissioners, when confirmed by the county court, under Acts W. Va. 1872-3, ch. 198, § 2, is only prima facie correct and hence is not final, yet it may be reviewed in the circuit court by certiorari, since by § 3, ch. 15, of the same acts, the circuit courts are expressly given power to supervise all proceedings before the county court, and this proceeding is not excepted. Bd. of Ed. v. Hopkins, 19 W. Va. 84; Cunningham v. Squires, 2 W. Va. 422.

Relocation of County Seats.—The action of the county court in ascertaining and declaring the result of a vote on the question of the relocation of a county seat is reviewable by the circuit court by certiorari. Poteet v. County of Cabell, 30 W. Va. 58, 3 S. E. Rep. 97.

Refusal to Record Instrument of Emancipation.—A county court refuses to admit an instrument of emancipation of slaves to probate and record. Held, the circuit court cannot review this judgment, by way of appeal, writ of error or supersedeas. Mann v. Givens, 2 Leigh 762.

Criminal Cases.—A writ of error from a superior court lies to a judgment of a county court imposing a fine for contempt of said county court. Stokeley v. Com., 1 Va. Cas. 330.

Where Appeal is Taken Also.—If the superior court of chancery grants a certiorari to remove a cause, and the county court proceeds to a decree, upon an appeal from that decree, the superior court of chancery may hear the appeal and certiorari together, and make the proper decree upon the whole cause. Anthony v. Oldacre, 4 Call 489.

Jurisdictional Amount.—The Rev. Code, vol. 1, ch. 66, limited appeals from the county courts to the district courts to such personal actions as were of the value of ten pounds, leaving the right as at common law in real and mixed actions. Wingfield v. Crenshaw, 3 H. & M. 245.

In Clapham v. Lewis, 1 Va. Cas. 182, a writ of supersedeas was held to have been properly granted by a circuit court to the judgment of a county court, although the principal exclusive of the interest for which the judgment was rendered, was less than the prescribed amount giving jurisdiction.

The question arose under § 55 of the district court law, 1 Rev. Code, p. 83, which authorizes a supersedeas, where the value of the judgment is $33.33.

4. APPEALS FROM DECISION OF MAYOR.—No writ of error will lie to a judgment by the mayor of a city, proceeding as an ex officio justice of the peace, in the summary mode authorized by statute in case of the violation of a city ordinance. Acts 1881, ch. 8, §§ 231-3, such proceedings not being according to the course of the common law. Ridgway v. Hinton, 25 W. Va. 554.

5. APPEALS FROM DECISION OF RECORDER.—Where municipal courts and other inferior courts which have no juries are established, the right of trial by jury must be retained by granting appeals to courts where trial by jury may be had. Nor can this right of appeal be clogged by unreasonable restrictions, which would operate as a substantial denial of the right of trial by jury, though it may be limited as to time, and reasonable security may be required for appearance or for the payment of the fine, if affirmed by the higher court. Jelly v. Dills, 27 W. Va. 267.

6. APPEALS FROM DECISION OF CITY COUNCIL.—Certiorari is the proper remedy to review the action of a city council under § 28, ch. 47, Code W. Va., in declaring the running of a "merry-go-round" a nuisance, the statute giving no appeal in such cases. Davis v. Davis, 40 W. Va. 464, 21 S. E. Rep. 906.

7. APPEAL FROM DECISION OF BOARD OF SUPERVISORS.—An appeal from a decision of the board of supervisors of a county, rejecting a claim arising under an order of a county court, made in 1862, is properly taken to the county court of the county. Dinwiddle County v. Stuart, 28 Gratt. 526.

8. APPEAL FROM DECISION OF COUNTY COMMISSIONERS.—So where the county commissioners are convened as a returning board to ascertain the result of an election, no provision being made for a review of their proceedings by motion, appeal, writ of error or supersedeas, if its decisions cannot be reviewed by certiorari they cannot be reviewed at all. The appeal allowed from a final order of the county court in a contested election case, is another and different case. Chenoweth v. Commissioners, 26 W. Va. 230.

The rulings of the commissioners of a county sitting as a board of canvassers, after an election, to ascertain the result thereof in the county, are subject to review by the circuit court on writ of certiorari. Alderson v. Commissioners, 31 W. Va. 633, 8 S. E. Rep. 274.

Any candidate voted for at an election has the right, by himself or attorney, to be present at the counting of the votes, and request the commissioners to give him a bill of exceptions to their rulings against him; and he thus becomes a party to the proceedings, and has the right to have the rulings of such commissioners reviewed on certiorari. Alderson v. Commissioners, 31 W. Va. 633, 8 S. E. Rep. 274.

9. APPEAL FROM CORPORATION COURT.—Corporation and hustings courts are of co-ordinate dignity with circuit courts, by virtue of art. VI, § 14, Constitution of Virginia, and no right of appeal from the former to the latter can be conferred by the legislature. Section 5 of the act, approved March 6, 1890 (Acts 1889-90, p. 197) as amended by an act passed March 7, 1900 (Acts 1899-1900, p. 1202), attempting to confer such right of appeal is therefore unconstitutional, and the court of appeals will, by writ of prohibition, prevent the circuit courts from entertaining such appeals. Watson v. Blackstone, 98 Va. 618, 38 S. E. Rep. 939.

10. APPEAL FROM AUDITOR.—Appeals from the auditor are not confined to pleadings, as in ordinary cases; and therefore, for the sake of justice, new evidence is received, in the court of appeals, to show that the acts required by the opinion of the court, have been performed by the petitioners. Com. v. Banks, 4 Call 338.

An appeal lies, in all cases from the decision of the auditor, to the high court of chancery or to the Richmond district court according to the nature of the case; in matters of account, a technical appeal, in all other cases, a petition. Com. v. Beaumarchais, 3 Call 122; Attorney General v. Turpin, 3 H. & M. 548; Com. v. Bank, 2 Rob. 737.

11. REVIEW IN APPELLATE COURT.

a. Generally.—Where a record and judgment of a justice is removed and returned to the circuit court on writ of certiorari issued under chapter 110 of the Code (Ed. 1891), it is the duty of the clerk, upon receiving it, to file and docket the case in the same manner that other cases are docketed, and upon the hearing, the circuit court should review such judgment upon the merits, determine all questions arising on the law and the evidence, and render such judgment or make such order upon the whole matter as law and justice may require; and it is error in the court to have the case tried by a jury without having first reviewed such judgment. Arnold v. Lewis County Court, 38 W. Va. 142, 18 S. E. Rep. 476.

Now, by the West Virginia statute in every case before a justice, the record or proceeding may after a judgment or final order therein be removed by a writ of certiorari to the circuit court of the county in which such judgment was rendered, except where the amount in controversy, exclusive of interest and costs, does not exceed $15. Upon the hearing, such circuit court shall, in addition to determining such questions as might have been determined upon a certiorari, as the law heretofore was, review such judgment of the justice upon the merits, determining all questions arising on the law and evidence, and render such judgment or make such order upon the whole matter as law and justice may require; and to enable it to do this the methods of procedure in the circuit court are made to apply to the proceedings before the justice; that is, the justice shall, upon request of either party, in a civil case, matter, or proceeding, certify the evidence, if any, which may have been heard, and sign bills of exception, setting forth any rulings or orders which may not otherwise appear of record. Such certificate of evidence and bills of exceptions shall be a part of the record, and as such be removed and returned to the circuit court. Then the circuit court will confirm the judgment of the justice, if, upon the whole matter, law and justice may require it, but, if not, reverse it, and set it and the verdict of the jury aside, grant a new trial, or make such other order as the case may require. But if the judgment of the justice and verdict of the jury are set aside, the case shall be retained in the circuit court, and disposed of as if originally brought therein. Here the writ comes back to its original use and purpose as it was in like cases at common law; having first answered the additional purpose of appeal in jury cases, under chapter 50. Bee v. Seaman, 36 W. Va. 381, 15 S. E. Rep. 173.

b. Errors Correctible.—The general rule was, that upon certiorari to an inferior court, the court from which the writ issues will only inquire into errors and defects which go to the jurisdiction of the court below, and for all other errors and irregularities the party must resort to his remedy by appeal or writ of error. But in West Virginia, if the inferior tribunal proceeds in a summary manner and not according to the course of the common law, and there is no remedy by appeal or writ of error, then the courts will consider other than jurisdictional questions. Poe v. Machine Works, 24 W. Va. 517; Chenoweth v. Commissioners, 26 W. Va. 230.

Prior to the enactment of § 2, ch. 110, Code 1897, although the appellate court could review all questions of jurisdiction and regularity of proceeding and decide all questions of law and fact and render such judgment, in case of reversal, as the lower court ought to have rendered, it was doubtful whether it could consider evidence and reverse findings of fact by jury or court, but now the statute provides for embodying in the record the evidence and all questions passed upon in the lower court and requires the appellate court to pass on all questions arising on law and evidence and render such judgment as the lower court should have done without remanding. Morgan v. Ohio River R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588.

The appellate court in cases brought before them by certiorari may review and correct the errors of the inferior court, not only when these errors are errors on questions of jurisdiction, power and authority of the inferior tribunal, or on questions of the regularity of the proceedings, but also when there were any errors of law in their proceedings or any action taken by them on erroneous principles or in the absence of all evidence to justify it. Dryden v. Swinburne, 20 W. Va. 89.

In Dryden v. Swinburn, 15 W. Va. 234, GREEN, P., said: "Reason and authority both sustain the position that when a case is brought before a superior court by certiorari from the judgment of an inferior court of record, the judgment of the superior court should not be confined simply to an affirmance or reversal of the decision of the inferior court of record but in such case the superior court ought in cases of a reversal of an inferior court, either to remand the cause to be further proceeded with or enter such judgment as the court below ought to have done in a case brought before it by a writ of error. And § 26, ch. 17, Acts 1872-3 W. Va., does not apply, since that chapter applies only to writs of error and not to writs of certiorari." Fowler v. Thompson, 23 W. Va. 106.

c. Informal Plea.—In an action commenced before a justice, and taken by appeal to the circuit court if the defendant files an informal plea which sets up a valid defense to the action, the circuit court should not deny him the benefit of his defense when the plea is such that a person of common understanding may know what is intended by it. Jones v. Browse, 32 W. Va. 444, 9 S. E. Rep. 873.

d. Amendment of Pleading.—If a party during trial of an appeal from a justice is entitled to amend his pleadings, that right cannot be made to depend solely on whether the adverse party is then ready to proceed with the trial. If such amendment would be a surprise to the other party, a continuance will obviate that objection. Powell v. Love, 35 W. Va. 96, 14 S. E. Rep. 405.

If an appeal is taken, new or amended pleadings in writing may, if substantial justice requires it, be filed in the circuit court, or the case may be tried on the pleadings before the justice or, when oral, on the brief note of their contents on the justice's docket. But whether written pleadings be filed before the justice or in the circuit court, they need not be of any particular form but must be such as to enable a person of common understanding to know what was intended. Poole v. Dilworth, 26 W. Va. 363.

e. New Evidence in Superior Court.—Although, in controversies concerning mills, wills, roads, the probate of wills, and granting of administrations, the superior court of law, to which an appeal is taken from the county or corporation court, may hear new evidence upon questions submitted to its revisal by the record, it ought not to receive any evidence, but that of the record itself, to prove what questions were in fact tried in the court below. Bohn v. Sheppard, 4 Munf. 403.

f. Where Judgment Is Reversed.

In Virginia.—Where a superior court reverses the judgment of a lower court it cannot retain the cause for further proceedings without the consent of parties, but must send the cause back to the lower court. Janey v. Blake, 8 Leigh 88.

In bastardy proceedings, the county court having decided in favor of a putative father, and the overseers of the poor having spread the facts upon the record by an exception, and taken an appeal to the circuit court, that court, upon reversing the judgment of the county court, should not send the cause back for a new trial, but should render a judgment in favor of the overseers of the poor for the amount appearing to be due, but without interest. Willard v. Overseers of the Poor of Wood County, 9 Gratt. 126.

If the county court disregard the instruction of the district court, the latter court ought, upon the second appeal, to retain the cause for trial before themselves, and not send it back to the county court. Fine v. Cockshut, 6 Call 16.

In Smith v. Hutchinson, 78 Va. 683, where the circuit court remanded a case to the county court instead of retaining it, in violation of § 26, ch. 178, Code 1873 providing that "When any judgment, decree or order of a county court is reversed or affirmed, the cause shall not be remanded to said court for further proceedings, but shall be retained in the circuit court, and there proceeded in, unless by consent of the parties, or for good cause shown, the appellate court direct otherwise," the court said: "We do not decide that the circuit court should, where a cause is remanded for trial in the county court, spread in its order at large the character of the cause shown for so doing, for to do so would in many cases be inconvenient, and would unnecessarily cumber the record. It is necessary and proper, however, that the judgment in all such cases show either that it was done for good cause shown, or else by agreement of the parties." Such judgment will be reversed on appeal to the court of appeals. Pettit v. Cowherd, 83 Va. 20, 1 S. E. Rep. 392; Thompson v. Carpenter, 88 Va. 702, 14 S. E. Rep. 181.

Where the circuit court has reversed the order of the county court and remanded the case for further proceedings and adjourned, the circuit court has no jurisdiction afterwards to set aside the former order and dispose of the case on its merits on the ground that it should have retained the cause, §§ 3451-2 being applicable only to judgments by default or decree upon bill taken for confessed and cases of mistake, misrecital or miscalculation, not to the error committed in this case, of remanding the cause, when it should have retained and disposed of it. Thompson v. Carpenter, 88 Va. 702, 14 S. E. Rep. 181.

In West Virginia.—Where a cause is brought before a superior court by a writ of error the superior court is not confined to a simple affirmance or reversal of the decision of the inferior court of record, but in a case of a reversal of the judgment of an inferior court, it ought either to remand the cause to be further proceeded with or enter such judgment as the court below ought to have entered, except that by § 22, ch. 17, Acts 1872-3, where any judgment of the county court is reversed or affirmed, the cause shall not be remanded to that court, but shall be retained in the circuit court and be proceeded with there, but this has no application to a case reversed on a writ of certiorari. Dryden v. Swinburn, 15 W. Va. 234.

The circuit court, having obtained jurisdiction by writ of error, the statute authorizes it to retain the case, and there proceed in it, unless, by consent of the parties, or for good cause shown, the appellate court directs otherwise. State v. Kyle, 8 W. Va. 711.

The circuit court may in a proper case, if justice require it, set the verdict of a jury aside, and award a new trial, and when the judgment of the justice is set aside the case is not sent back, but must be retained in the circuit court, and disposed of as if originally brought therein. Bee v. Seaman, 36 W. Va. 381, 15 S. E. Rep. 173.

Before the Acts of 1882, ch. 153, upon reversal under a writ of certiorari, the court could simply reverse and remand the case to the lower court to enter a proper judgment or itself render proper judgment, but by that act the appellate court is re-

the affirmance of the decree in other respects than those on which it is reversed. Crockett v. Sexton, 29 Gratt. 46

Married Women.—A married woman when she is a party is as much bound as any one else. McCullough v. Dashiell, 85 Va. 37, 6 S. E. Rep. 610.

Infants.—But an infant is not concluded by an affirmation by the court of appeals of a decree in a proceeding to which she is not a party and was not represented, but in which she is interested, she may file a bill of review to such decree. Connolly v. Connolly, 32 Gratt. 657.

B. OF GENERAL COURT.—The general court having upon a writ of error reversed the judgment of the court below, and directed a new trial, that judgment is conclusive, and neither the court below, nor the general court on a second writ of error, can enquire into the correctness of the first decision. Marshall v. Com., 5 Gratt. 693.

XVI. APPEAL BONDS.

A. NOT A CONTRACT.—A supersedeas bond is not a contract within the purview of § 10, art. I of the Federal Constitution, forbidding the impairment of the obligation of contracts. It is simply an obligation imposed by law, it has no independent force apart from the judgment and has no more of the elements of a contract in it than the judgment itself, it is not a mutual agreement, nor is it voluntary on the part of those who sign it, it is executed under a sort of legal duress. The party is compelled under the requirement of the law to execute it or deny himself his legal right to have the judgment reviewed without it. White v. Crump, 19 W. Va. 583.

B. DEPENDENT ON JUDGMENT.—The effect of a supersedeas bond is dependent upon the fate of the judgment, without which it has no obligatory force, it has no separate existence, for whenever the judgment ceases to be binding, the bond becomes inoperative for any purpose. So when in an action on a supersedeas bond it is pleaded that the judgment was recovered because of an act done according to the usages of civilized warfare, under § 35, Art. VIII of the Constitution of West Virginia, such judgment is void though affirmed by the court of appeals, such affirmance being before the above section of the constitution was adopted, and consequently the bond is void also. Such proceedings constitute due process of law. White v. Crump, 19 W. Va. 583.

C. WHEN REQUIRED.

Executors and Administrators.—The statute requiring bond and security upon appeals although general in terms apply only to persons appealing in their own right, not to executors and administrators. Shearman v. Christian, 1 Rand. 393.

Executors and administrators are as much required to give security on appeal as any other appellants where the judgment is against them personally though it should have been against them in their representative capacity. Pugh v. Jones, 6 Leigh 299.

In a suit in equity against defendant as executor and in his own right as legatee, there is a decree against him personally; on appeal allowed him from the decree, an appeal bond with surety will be required of him. Ersine v. Henry, 6 Leigh 378; Bull v. Douglas, 4 Munf. 307. See monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

Where executors and legatees jointly appeal, the legatees (being in possession of the property in dispute), may be ruled to give security for the prosecution of the appeal. Sadler v. Green, 1 H. & M. 26.

Assignee of Bankrupt.—The assignee of a bankrupt is not the representative of a decedent so as to relieve him from the necessity of giving an appeal bond. Pace v. Flicklin, 76 Va. 292.

Under Act 1792.—Under the Act of 1792, where a plaintiff in chancery appealed, that court could not require of him any other bond than one in the penalty of twenty pounds. Braxton v. Morris, 1 Wash. 380.

Waiver.—The mere marking of his name by the counsel for the defendant in error on the docket of the court as counsel for defendant in error will not amount to a release of the plaintiff in error from his obligation to give the bond required by law. Otterback v. Alex., etc., R. Co., 26 Gratt. 940.

It might amount to a waiver of service of process on his client. Otterback v. Alex., etc., R. Co., 26 Gratt. 940.

Where a supersedeas has been granted and a cause has been docketed for more than six years without objection, it will not be dismissed on motion though the required bond was not given. Pugh v. Jones, 6 Leigh 299.

D. TIME TO EXECUTE BOND.—Where an appeal is allowed with unlimited time in which to execute an appeal bond, such appeal is irregular and a motion to docket it will be overruled. Broadus v. Turner, 2 Rand. 5.

Sec. 3 of the act March 15, 1867, which amended § 3 of ch. 182 of the Code of 1860, changing the limitation of the time for presenting a petition for an appeal from, or writ of error or supersedeas to, any final decree or judgment, from five to two years after it was made or rendered, did not amend § 26 of that chapter, which allows five years for perfecting the appeal, by giving bond, etc. And therefore, where a petition for an appeal was presented within two years from the date of the decree it might be perfected in any time within five years from that date. But see now, Code of 1873, ch. 178, § 17; Bolling v. Lersner, 26 Gratt. 36.

A party who, on expressing an intention to appeal from an order of the county court made November 18th, and have the case tried de novo in the circuit court, is granted until November 17th to give the necessary bond, cannot complain that the court adjourned for the term on November 14th, unless the record shows that he was thereby prevented from giving the required bond. Sargeant v. Irving, 3 Va. Dec. 338.

E. FAILURE TO GIVE BOND.—If the appellant fails to give the bond directed to be given by the court, or the judge allowing the appeal or supersedeas, the appellee may have a rule upon him to compel him to give it. Williamson v. Gayle, 4 Gratt. 180.

The appeal being allowed, the cause is pending in the court of appeals; and the failure of the appellant to execute the bond directed by the court to be given, on granting the appeal, does not avoid the appeal. Williamson v. Gayle, 4 Gratt. 180.

F. SUSPENSION OF DECREE.—At common law, no court could suspend its judgment, but by § 4, ch. 17, Acts 1872-3, the power is given to suspend its judgment, upon the execution by the party desiring to appeal, of a suspending bond, in such cases, and only in such cases as may be taken up to an appellate court by writ of error and supersedeas. Swinburn v. Smith, 15 W. Va. 483.

Where, in case of upset bid and conditional setting aside of sale and suspension of decree of sale to a certain period in order to give an upset bidder opportunity to comply with the conditions of resale, he applies to the judge in vacation for an extension of such suspension, in order to give time to apply for appeal and supersedeas, and the judge delays acting on such application till after the period within which compliance was permissible, such action of the judge cannot be corrected by the appellate court. Yost v. Porter, 80 Va. 855.

G. OBLIGOR IN BOND.

Attorney.—In Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Vanderwarker, 19 W. Va. 265, the court said: "The law does not require that the party obtaining an appeal or supersedeas shall himself execute a bond with security; but, that he or some one else for him shall do so."

Where a supersedeas bond has been executed by the appellant's attorney, the benefit of which it has received and enjoyed, it is estopped to deny that a supersedeas was awarded in that case, by a recital of that fact in the bond. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Vanderwarker, 19 W. Va. 265.

An appeal bond need not be signed by the plaintiff in error, since it may be given by a stranger. York v. Free, 38 W. Va. 336, 18 S. E. Rep. 492.

H. OBLIGEE IN BOND.—Under § 6 and 8, ch. 12, Code 1873, an appeal bond may be made payable to the commonwealth, or to any person injured by a breach of the condition of such bond. Acker v. A. & F. R. Co., 84 Va. 648, 5 S. E. Rep. 688.

I. WHERE APPEAL BOND SHOULD BE GIVEN.

—Where an appeal is taken in court, the appeal bond cannot legally be given in the clerk's office, but should be given in court. Thomson v. Evans, 6 Munf. 297.

J. CONDITION OF BOND.

Where Supersedeas is Awarded.—Where a supersedeas is awarded, but the bond on appeal required by Code 1887, §§ 3470, 3471, is conditioned to pay only costs and damages, and not the debt, the court will, on motion, discharge the supersedeas, but will allow the appeal to remain in force on filing a new bond. Reid v. Norfolk City R. Co., 2 Va. Dec. 86.

Under the Code of 1819, it was held that the penalty of a supersedeas bond was to be fixed by the judge granting it, and was not governed by the law respecting appeals by plaintiffs or demandants. Smock v. Dade, 5 Rand. 639.

Where the clerk, in copying a bond, conditioned by order of court "to pay any deficiency in the funds arising from the land sales decreed, to meet and discharge the sums decreed against the appellants," adds a condition "to pay the judgment," these two conditions, in the absence of a clearly manifested intention to the contrary, will be held to mean the same thing i. e. to pay the deficiency, not to pay the judgment and in addition to indemnify the original purchasers. Harnsberger v. Yancey, 38 Gratt. 527.

Where the recital in an appeal bond states that it was given to perfect a writ of error, but the condition adds a further obligation to satisfy the judgment if affirmed or if the writ of error be dismissed, it will be presumed that a supersedeas also was granted in accordance with the condition. State v. Dotts, 31 W. Va. 819, 8 S. E. Rep. 391.

Where No Supersedeas Issues.—If a party is unable to give bond and security for the debt, he may have his appeal on giving security for costs only, but the decree will not be superseded. Erskine v. Henry, 6 Leigh 378.

Appeal from Decree Dissolving Injunction.—The

penalty of the appeal and supersedeas bond should be sufficient to indemnify and save harmless the surety in the injunction bond. Cardwell v. Allen, 28 Gratt. 184.

A party appealing from an order dissolving an injunction can only be required to give security to perform the decree of the inferior court, and to pay the costs and damages awarded in the appellate court, if the decree shall be affirmed. Quare, whether, where bond and security have been given to perform the decree of the court below, and further security is required in the appellate court, which the party cannot give, the surety in the first bond is discharged. M'Kay v. Hite, 4 Rand. 564.

Injunction to Judgment.—When a party has obtained an injunction from the court of chancery to a judgment at law, which is afterwards dissolved, and he appeals to the court of appeals, he cannot be required to give security for the amount of the judgment enjoined, but only for such costs as may be awarded against him by the court of appeals. Eppes v. Thurman, 4 Rand. 384.

Rents and Profits.—Where a decree for the sale of the land is rendered in a chancery suit to enforce judgment liens on land, the supersedeas bond does not cover any loss occasioned by the receipt of rents and profits by the debtor during the pendency of the appeal and supersedeas in the court of appeals. Hutton v. Lockridge, 27 W. Va. 428; Beard v. Arbuckle, 19 W. Va. 145; Perry v. Horn, 21 W. Va. 782.

That portion of § 13, chapter 178, of the Code of 1873, prescribing the penalty of an appeal and supersedeas bond, refers only to the damages mentioned in § 24 of the same chapter, and was not intended to cover the rents and profits of real estate in the possession of the appellant who had given a deed of trust thereon to secure a debt fully equal to its value, he having obtained an injunction to prevent the sale of such real estate, which injunction was dissolved, and the bill dismissed; and the penalty of the appeal and supersedeas bond will not be fixed with reference to such "rents and profits." Cardwell v. Allen, 28 Gratt. 184.

The word "awarded," in said § 13, ch. 178, Code 1873, refers to the words "damages and costs;" and the word "incurred" to the word "fees" therein, so as to make the meaning the same as if the sentence had been written; "and also to pay all damages and costs which may be awarded against, and all fees which may be incurred by, the appellants or petitioners." Cardwell v. Allen, 28 Gratt. 184.

Decree Partly Executed.—Where an interlocutory decree directs the defendant to deliver up slaves to be divided among the plaintiffs, and then there is a final decree against him for the profits; and defendant appeals from both decrees. Held, if defendant has complied with the interlocutory decree by delivering the property, he will not be required to give an appeal bond with surety for delivery thereof in case of affirmance; if he has not so complied with it, such appeal bond will be required.

And upon the question, whether defendant has so complied or not, parol evidence, by affidavits, will be received in the appellate court. Erskine v. Henry, 6 Leigh 378; Bull v. Douglas, 4 Munf. 303.

Dismissal of Appeal.—The omission in the Code of 1869 of the provision in appeal bonds that the obligors should be responsible, if the appeal was dismissed, made no real change in the condition of the bond, since the dismissal is the equivalent of an affirmance, the condition as to which was retained. Cas- anova v. Kreusch, 21 W. Va. 720; Perry v. Horn, 21 W. Va. 732.

K. EFFECT ON ATTACHMENT.—Where, upon a decree in favor of an attaching creditor, and an appeal therefrom, the appellant gives an appeal bond, the giving of this bond does not release the attachment. Magill v. Sauer, 20 Gratt. 540.

L. DEFECTIVE BONDS.

Certiorari Instead of Appeal Bond.—Where an appeal is taken from the county court sitting in chancery, and a bond is given, which is in fact a certiorari, and not an appeal bond, but no objection is made to the regularity of the bond in the court of chancery, and an appeal is taken to the court of appeals, and in that court, an objection is made, for the first time, to the bond, the objection comes too late; but if it had been made in the court of chancery, that court could only have dismissed the appeal nisi, or have laid the party under a rule to give a proper bond, in a reasonable time. Brown v. Matthews, 1 Rand. 462.

So where the clause "all actual damages incurred in consequence of the supersedeas" is omitted from the condition. Virginia Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Mfg. Co., 95 Va. 515, 28 S. E. Rep. 888.

Misrecital—The fact that an appeal bond recites a judgment, not as the judgment of the circuit court of the city of Alexandria but as "a judgment of the circuit court of Alexandria" will not affect the validity of the bond being merely a clerical error, that may be amended by the record. Acker v. A. & F. R. Co., 84 Va. 648, 5 S. E. Rep. 688.

Failure to Waive Homestead.—So an omission to waive the homestead exemption. Acker v. A. & F. R. Co., 84 Va. 648, 5 S. E. Rep. 688.

Bond Executed by Surety Alone.—A bond for prosecuting a writ of supersedeas executed by a surety only, without any principal obligor, is insufficient; and a supersedeas issued thereupon ought to be quashed. Miller v. Blannerhassett, 5 Munf. 197; Rootes v. Holliday, 4 Munf. 823; Day v. Pickett, 4 Munf. 104.

Objection Must Be Made Promptly.—Where it is certified by the lower court that the appellant with his surety, upon the allowance of the appeal, executed the required bond, the appellee cannot, after the lapse of more than five years from the judgment, have the appeal dismissed for any supposed defect in the bond, e. g. a misrecital of the amount of the judgment, and so deprive the appellant of his right of appeal altogether. He should have moved promptly to have the appeal dismissed, by not doing so he will be held to have waived the defect. Jackson v. Henderson, 3 Leigh 196; Va. F. & M. Ins. Co. v. N. Y., etc., Co., 95 Va. 515, 28 S. E. Rep. 888.

In the above case the appellant had died and the appeal had been revived in the name of the appellant's administratrix and it was held that the appellee was not even entitled to a rule upon the appellant's administratrix to give further security, which as administratrix she was not required to give; but the court intimated that if the appellant were himself alive the error could be corrected. Jackson v. Henderson, 3 Leigh 196.

M. FILING OF BOND.—The filing of an appeal bond, with the clerk, must be in pursuance of an allowance of the appeal, entered on the record. Burch v. White, 3 Rand. 104.

N. INSUFFICIENCY OF SECURITY.—The appellate court is the sole judge of the sufficiency of the security, after security has been given. Anderson v. Anderson, 2 Call 198.

Section 8436, Code 1887, whereby a circuit judge may in vacation hear and determine upon appeal whether a judgment of the court below is right or wrong, does not authorize the judge in vacation to enquire into the sufficiency of an appeal bond, and to order a new bond, or new or additional security; such order is coram non judice and void. Chase v. Miller, 88 Va. 791, 14 S. E. Rep. 545.

Remedy.—The party injured by the insufficiency of an appeal bond has his remedy by action on the official bond of the clerk of the court. Sections 177, 178 and 180. Chase v. Miller, 88 Va. 791, 14 S. E. Rep. 545.

O. RIGHTS OF SURETY.—Where a judgment was rendered for 148 dollars 68 cents damages, with interest and costs, and on the same day an appeal was allowed, and, the judgment being affirmed, damages were recovered against the appellant for retarding the execution, and also costs in the appellate court, and, a fiat facias being then issued and returned nulla bona, the surety in the appeal bond paid 308 dollars 64 cents in satisfaction of the judgment, and within a year after the affirmance, filed a bill to charge real estate aliened by the debtor between the date of the original judgment and the date of the judgment of affirmance. Held, the surety is to be substituted in the place of the judgment creditor, and to have the benefit of his lien. M'Clung v. Beirne, 10 Leigh 394.

Abatement of Appeal by Death.—Where defendant appeals from a judgment against him, and the appeal abates by reason of his death and is not revived, the surety on the appeal bond is released. Nelson v. Anderson, 2 Call 286.

P. ACTION ON BOND.—Where the recital in an appeal bond states that it was given to perfect a writ of error, but the condition adds a further obligation to satisfy the judgment if affirmed or the writ of error be dismissed, it will be presumed that a supersedeas also was granted in accordance with the condition. The plaintiff may either allege in his declaration on such a bond that it was given to perfect a writ of error and supersedeas or he may simply set forth the bond and condition, and in the latter case his declaration is not demurrable. The defendant may plead directly that the bond was given to perfect a writ of error only. State v. Dotts, 21 W. Va. 819, 8 S. E. Rep. 391.

In actions on appeal bonds, the court of appeals will not consider either judicial errors, or clerical misprisions, in the court below, occurring in the original suit, and in which there has been an acquiescence by the parties not appealing to correct them. Miller v. M'Luer, Gilmer 338.

XVII. APPEALS FROM INFERIOR TRIBUNALS.

A. IN CIVIL CASES.

1. GENERALLY.—Where the inferior tribunal whose decision is sought to be reviewed has any discretion, the proper method is by certiorari and not mandamus. Board v. Minturn, 4 W. Va. 300.

It seems that it has ever been the law, that when it is proper to review the proceedings of inferior tribunals, and the law has not provided redress by appeal, writ of error or other process, resort may be had to the writ of certiorari to prevent a failure of justice. Morgan v. Ohio, etc., R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588; Railway Co. v. Board of Public Works, 28 W. Va. 268.

In Alderson v. Commissioners, 31 W. Va. 633, 8 S. E. Rep. 274, JOHNSON, P., said, § 12, art. 8 of the Constitution of West Virginia, declaring that "the cir-cult courts shall have the supervision and control of all proceedings before justices and other inferior tribunals, by mandamus, prohibition and certiorari" was a broad declaration that in the state of West Virginia there was no tribunal that was not subject to be legally controlled by the courts.

The mere fact that the word "control" in the clause of the constitution of 1863 giving the circuit courts "supervision and control of all proceedings before justices and other inferior tribunals by mandamus, prohibition and certiorari" is omitted from the similar clause in the constitution of 1872 does not deprive the circuit court of jurisdiction to review the judgment of the county court in contested election cases, by certiorari. Dryden v. Swinburne, 20 W. Va. 89.

Section 12, art. VII of the Constitution of West Virginia 1872, providing that the circuit courts shall have supervision of all proceedings before the county courts and other inferior tribunals by certiorari, etc., is restricted in § 29 of same article providing that the county court shall have jurisdiction of all appeals from the judgments of justices, and their decision upon such appeal shall be final in all cases, except in certain specified cases. Poe v. Machine Works, 24 W. Va. 517.

By § 2, ch. 153, Acts 1882 W. Va., the remedy by certiorari in the circuit court is greatly enlarged, both as to the questions that may be reviewed and the inferior tribunals to which it is made to lie. Whether it is extended to all inferior tribunals, whether executive, ministerial or judicial, was not necessary to the decision of the case since county courts were expressly mentioned. Chenoweth v. Commissioners, 26 W. Va. 230.

Notice of Writ.—It is not necessary for the court granting a writ of certiorari to give notice to the opposite party or to issue a rule against him to show cause against its being granted, but it is a matter within their discretion, and if they think it unnecessary and not tending to any useful purpose, they need not do so. But the other party, though not a formal party, must be notified of the pending of the proceeding before the court acts upon the writ after its return. Dryden v. Swinburn, 15 W. Va. 234.

In Dryden v. Swinburn, 15 W. Va. 234, supra, the court intimated, though not necessary to the decision, that if the other party was not a formal party, no merely formal objection could be made to the service of such notice, it would only be necessary to show that he had notice.

2. APPEALS FROM JUSTICES.

a. Technical Appeal.

(1) Generally.—The defendant may take an appeal as of right from the judgment of a justice, if he tender the required bond within ten days after judgment. Hubbard v. Yocum, 30 W. Va. 740, 5 S. E. Rep. 867; Parsons v. Aultman, 45 W. Va. 473, 31 S. E. Rep. 985.

The appeal was for a time to the county court, but by ch. 63, Acts 1877, the appeal is restored to the circuit courts. Hubbard v. Yocum, 30 W. Va. 740, 5 S. E. Rep. 867.

Though the judgment of a justice is erroneous yet if such error arises, not from want of jurisdiction in the justice, but merely from an erroneous exercise of a conceded jurisdiction, the remedy is only by appeal and not by certiorari. Poe v. Machine Works, 24 W. Va. 517.

(2) Where Appeal is Not Taken within Ten Days.—It is settled by the decisions in West Virginia that unless

"good cause" appears in the petition for the failure to take the appeal within ten days as prescribed by § 174, ch. 50 of the Code, the appeal must be dismissed by the circuit court as improvidently awarded. § 174, ch. 8, Acts 1881; Lowther v. Davis, 33 W. Va. 182, 10 S. E. Rep. 20; Home Sewing Machine Co. v. Floding, 27 W. Va. 540.

But it may, and in a proper case should, be granted after the expiration of ten days, and within ninety days after the date of the judgment, when the party otherwise entitled to the writ shall show, by his own oath or otherwise, good cause for his not having applied for such writ within the ten days. Long v. Ohio River R. Co., 35 W. Va. 333, 13 S. E. Rep. 1010; State v. Larue, 37 W. Va. 828, 17 S. E. Rep. 397; Womer v. Ravenswood, etc., R. Co., 37 W. Va. 287, 19 S. E. Rep. 488.

Where such writ is not applied for within ten days but within ninety days after the judgment, and the record shows no excuse for not sooner applying, no presumption arises from the mere grant of the writ that good excuse was otherwise shown. The excuse or cause for not applying for the writ within ten days must always appear in writing as part of the record. Morgan v. Ohio, etc., R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588.

Where a justice renders judgment on a verdict on one day, and the next day a motion for a new trial is made and overruled, the ten days allowed for a certiorari begins to run on the latter day. A motion for a new trial suspends the finality of a judgment already entered, until the date of the denial of the new trial, for the purposes of limitation of a writ of certiorari or appeal. Straley v. Payne, 43 W. Va. 185, 27 S. E. Rep. 359.

Where a writ of certiorari is not taken within ten days after the judgment, the defendant to it will be given the benefit of that defense in the court of appeals, though the record merely shows that the case was heard in the circuit court on the record and proceedings, without showing any motion to quash or dismiss. Morgan v. Ohio, etc., R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588.

But a judgment on a certiorari granted more than ten days after a judgment is not void so that it may be vacated at any time, however erroneous it is. Morgan v. Ohio River R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588.

No Relation to Beginning of Term.—Although judgments and decrees relate back to the first day of the term at which they were rendered, yet there is an exception where the case was not ready for hearing on the first day of the term, so that even if the rule applied to a petition to the circuit court for a writ of certiorari, such a case would come within the exception, where on the first day of the term it was not in a condition to be heard, there being in fact no such case until the petition was filed. Hence the decision in such a case will not relate back to the first day of the term of the circuit court so as to bring the presentation of the petition within the ten days' limit. Womer v. Ravenswood, etc., R. Co., 37 W. Va. 287, 16 S. E. Rep. 488.

(3) What Constitutes "Good Cause."

Generally.—When the party has neglected to avail himself of his absolute right to an appeal within ten days, he can only obtain the new trial within ninety days upon showing such cause as would entitle him to a new trial; the facts shown to warrant the granting of the appeal after the expiration of the ten days must show fraud, accident, surprise or some adventitious circumstances beyond the control of the party. Home S. M. Co. v. Floding, 27 W. Va. 540; Ruffner v. Love, 24 W. Va. 181; Hubbard v. Yocum, 30 W. Va. 740, 5 S. E. Rep. 867; Powell v. Miller, 41 W. Va. 371, 23 S. E. Rep. 557.

Where a party desires to appeal from the judgment of a justice which has been rendered against him, goes to the justice's office within ten days after the date of such judgment, and informs the justice that he wishes to take an appeal, and the justice, being engaged at the time, promises him to prepare a bond, and bring it to his place of business for execution, and such party pays no further attention to the matter until after ten days have expired, the justice failing to comply with his promise within the ten days, these facts, stated in a petition to the judge of the circuit court in vacation, are not sufficient cause for granting an appeal, as prescribed by statute, within ninety days after the date of said judgment. Powell v. Miller, 41 W. Va. 371, 23 S. E. Rep. 557.

Negligence of Justice.—If a party to a judgment files a good and sufficient bond in the office of the justice who rendered the judgment within ten days thereafter, with the person in charge of the office during the temporary absence of the justice, he is entitled to his appeal as a matter of right, and no act of negligence on the part of the justice can deprive him of the same. Holmes v. Yoke, 48 W. Va. 267, 37 S. E. Rep. 545.

Refusal by Justice to Grant Appeal.—Where the petition stated that he applied to the justice for an appeal within the ten days, but the justice refused to grant it, this was held "good cause" for the failure. Lowther v. Davis, 33 W. Va. 132, 10 S. E. Rep. 20; Clark v. West Virginia, etc., R. Co., 50 W. Va. 1, 40 S. E. Rep. 351.

Where a justice who has no jurisdiction of the case tries it, and renders judgment, if such justice refuses to set aside such judgment and rehear such case, an appeal will lie from his judgment to the circuit court, as in other cases, and, if he refuse to grant the same within ten days, the circuit court of the county, or judge thereof in vacation, may grant the same on application. Parsons v. Aultman, 45 W. Va. 473, 31 S. E. Rep. 935.

Recovery of Judgment without the Knowledge of Defendant.—If a plaintiff in an action before a justice agrees with the defendant to dismiss it or abandon it, but afterwards, without the knowledge of the defendant, obtains judgment against the defendant, the defendant first discovering such judgment after ten days from its date, this constitutes good cause for obtaining an appeal from a circuit court within ninety days after the judgment. McCormick v. Short, 49 W. Va. 1, 37 S. E. Rep. 769.

But the fact that he did not know a judgment had been rendered against him, when he had been served with process is not "good cause." Hubbard v. Yocum, 30 W. Va. 740, 5 S. E. Rep. 867.

Ignorance of the Law.—Mere ignorance of what the law required of him is not "good cause." Home Sewing Machine Co. v. Floding, 27 W. Va. 540.

Nor is it material that the party desiring to appeal was a nonresident. Hubbard v. Yocum, 30 W. Va. 740, 5 S. E. Rep. 867.

Erroneous Advice of Counsel.—Erroneous advice of counsel is not "good cause." Ruffner v. Love, 24 W. Va. 181.

Miscarriage of Letter.—So the miscarriage of a letter is no excuse where enough time elapsed to arouse suspicion that it had miscarried, before the expiration of the ten days. Hubbard v. Yocum, 30 W. Va. 740, 5 S. E. Rep. 867.

How Shown.

Must Be in Writing.—Such "good cause" is to be shown by a written application, sworn to by the applicant or some one else and by affidavits or other written proofs filed with the application. Hubbard v. Yocum, 30 W. Va. 740, 5 S. E. Rep. 867.

If a petition for an appeal from the judgment of a justice states facts showing good cause for not having taken an appeal within ten days, and is verified by affidavit, and an appeal is granted, that appeal cannot be dismissed as improvidently granted merely because proof of such cause for not taking the appeal sooner is not made by affidavit or other proof independent of the petition and separate from it. McCormick v. Short, 49 W. Va. 1, 37 S. E. Rep. 769.

Must Be Ex Parte.—The "good cause" is to be shown to the court ex parte, the other party cannot contest the fact in the circuit court; his only remedy is by appeal. Hubbard v. Yocum, 30 W. Va. 740, 5 S. E. Rep. 867.

Where Appeal Is Not Taken within Ninety Days.—If an application be not made to the circuit court within ninety days from the rendition of the judgment of a justice, in no case can he grant an appeal, and if he grant one, it must be dismissed as improvidently granted. Home Sewing Machine Co. v. Floding, 27 W. Va. 540; State v. Larue, 37 W. Va. 823, 17 S. E. Rep. 397.

Refusal to Grant Appeal.—Mandamus is not a proper remedy when a justice refuses to grant an appeal from his decision, since the party aggrieved has an adequate remedy by petition to the circuit court or judge. Lowther v. Davis, 33 W. Va. 132, 10 S. E. Rep. 20.

(4) Effect of Appeal.—Where the effect of the appeal is to transfer the action to an appellate court in which the case is to be tried de novo, and the controversy is to be settled by a judgment in such court regardless of the judgment appealed from, the appeal operates not only to suspend the judgment of the justice or inferior tribunal, but vacates and sets it aside, so that it cannot be used as evidence or as the foundation of an action in any court. An appeal in such case is very different in its effect from a proceeding, which seeks to review a judgment by a writ of error. In the latter case the judgment is merely suspended, but in the former the judgment is vacated and made ineffectual for any purpose, the judgment in legal construction no longer remains in force and cannot be the foundation of a new action. Evans v. Taylor, 28 W. Va. 184.

An appeal from the judgment of a justice, which, in the appellate court, is tried de novo, is a continuation of the same suit, so that the liability of the obligor in a detinue bond continues until the appeal is decided. Bratt v. Marum, 24 W. Va. 653.

(5) Equivalent to Appearance in Appellate Court.—An appeal by a party to a case in the justice's court operates as a general appearance in the appellate court, and gives that court jurisdiction of the person of the appellant, and as a general rule the irregularities in the proceedings before the justice are waived by an appeal. Thorn v. Thorn, 47 W. Va. 4, 34 S. E. Rep. 759.

(6) Dismissal of Appeal.—Where a party appeals to the circuit court from a judgment rendered against him by a justice, he cannot, on his own motion, have his appeal dismissed, and the judgment of the justice affirmed, over the objection of the appellee. Watson v. Hurry, 47 W. Va. 809, 35 S. E. Rep. 830.

Lack of Jurisdiction in Justice.—Where a justice has no jurisdiction of a civil action, neither has a circuit court on appeal, though such circuit court would have original jurisdiction in the case, and therefore such court must dismiss the action for want of jurisdiction. Richmond v. Henderson, 48 W. Va. 389, 37 S. E. Rep. 654.

Title to Property Involved.—Where an appeal is taken from a judgment of a justice in an action of unlawful detainer, and it appears by answer filed that the title to property is involved, the circuit court will dismiss the action. Watson v. Watson, 45 W. Va. 290, 31 S. E. Rep. 939.

b. Certiorari.

(1) Generally.—The judges of the superior courts, within their respective jurisdictions, may award a certiorari to remove proceedings on an inquest of a riot, taken before the justices. Mackaboy v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 268.

By § 2, ch. 110, Amend. Code passed in 1882, the circuit court is given power to review by certiorari every case before a justice except where the judgment does not exceed $15, exclusive of interest and costs. This statute was held constitutional. Fouse v. Vandervort, 30 W. Va. 327, 4 S. E. Rep. 298; Bee v. Seaman, 36 W. Va. 381, 15 S. E. Rep. 173.

Under the West Virginia statute, the writ of certiorari lies after judgment of the justice; and, upon the hearing in the circuit court, such court will review the judgment of the justice upon the merits, determining all questions arising on the law and the evidence, and render such judgment or make such order upon the whole matter as law and justice may require. Bee v. Seaman, 36 W. Va. 381, 15 S. E. Rep. 173.

The statutory remedy of certiorari to judgments of justices in civil cases is merely a form of appeal. Parsons v. Aultman, 45 W. Va. 473, 31 S. E. Rep. 985.

The two have therefore become, so far as applied to the review of civil cases before justices, synonymous terms, except that the certiorari appeal is granted as a matter of sound discretion, and the appeal certiorari is granted as a matter of right. Parsons v. Aultman, 45 W. Va. 473, 31 S. E. Rep. 985.

The remedy by writ of certiorari, given by ch. 110 of the Code, to review the judgment of a justice, is not given as a matter of right, but is awarded by the court, or judge, for cause, on proper case shown. Harrow v. Ohio River R. Co., 38 W. Va. 711, 18 S. E. Rep. 926.

The writ of certiorari, when awarded in civil cases before justices, under §§ 2, 3, ch. 110, Code, is an appellate process, designed to affect the ends of justice; and the circuit court has a large discretion in awarding the same, reviewing judgments, and granting new trials thereunder, and, unless such discretion is plainly abused, the court of appeals cannot interfere therewith. Michaelson v. Cautley, 45 W. Va. 583, 33 S. E. Rep. 170.

Where a cause is removed after verdict and judgment from a justice's court on a writ of certiorari to the circuit court, under the third section of chapter 153 of the Acts of 1882, upon the hearing, such circuit court will, where there is a certificate of the evidence incorporated in a bill of exceptions signed by the justice, review the judgment of the justice upon the merits, and if of opinion to reverse the judgment will direct a new trial before a jury, unless neither party requires a jury. Natural Gas. Co. v. Healy, 33 W. Va. 102, 10 S. E. Rep. 56.

Upon the presentation to the circuit court of a petition for a writ of certiorari to remove into said court the proceedings in a civil action before a justice, an agreement between the parties that said petitioner's application for said writ should be argued and discussed by them before said circuit court as if the writ of certiorari had been in fact issued, and due return had been made thereto, the record, proceedings and judgment in said civil action before said justice having been transmitted to and removed into the circuit court in pursuance of such agreement, will not bring the case before the circuit court for review on its merits, but brings up the transcript for the purpose of determining whether the application should be granted. State v. Larue, 37 W. Va. 828, 17 S. E. Rep. 397.

(2) Form of Writ.—Where no objection is made to the form of a writ of certiorari in the circuit court, it is too late to object in the court of appeals. Burke v. Supervisors, 4 W. Va. 371.

(3) Motion to Quash.—In a proper case the writ may, on motion, be superseded before its return, as on the ground that it was improvidently awarded; and by motion to quash, it may be quashed on any proper ground after the return. The language of the motion is not material, so that it gives notice of the thing asked to be done; nor the language of the order of the court, if it properly directs that it be done. Long v. Ohio River R. Co., 35 W. Va. 333, 13 S. E. Rep. 1010.

(4) The Record.—When a writ of certiorari under the statute is awarded to a justice to review his judgment, in order to respond to the exigency of the writ, he must certify and send the record as the writ finds it. As the record is when the writ reaches him, so it must be certified and sent. It is then too late to make contemplated or intended certificates of facts and bills of exception parts of such record, but it must be sent up as it is, without increase or diminution. Bee v. Seaman, 36 W. Va. 381, 15 S. E. Rep. 173.

(5) Proceedings after Reversal.—Under the West Virginia statute, the writ lies after judgment, and the circuit court, after reversing the judgment complained of, retains it for final disposition, if the amount in controversy is more than $15. Long v. Ohio River R. Co., 35 W. Va. 333, 13 S. E. Rep. 1010.

(6) Amendment of Summons.—Upon a writ of certiorari from a judgment of a justice, the circuit court may allow the return on the summons issued by the justice to be amended. McClure-Mable Lumber Co. v. Brooks, 46 W. Va. 732, 34 S. E. Rep. 921.

(7) Return to Writ.—Before hearing a case, matter, or proceeding removed by certiorari from an inferior tribunal, the circuit court should require a formal legal return thereto to be made by the officers to whom the same is directed, unless such return is waived by the parties to such case, matter, or proceeding. Cushwa v. Lamar, 45 W. Va. 326, 32 S. E. Rep. 10.

Generally the return to the writ is conclusive and no extrinsic evidence will be received either to support or overthrow the proceeding which is sought to be reviewed. Poe v. Machine Works, 24 W. Va. 517.

Defective Return.—The fact that the return of the writ of certiorari is made by one of the justices of the county court and not by the president is no ground for the dismissal of the case by the circuit court, but that court should order a new writ to be served on the president and require him to make a return. Bd. of Ed. v. Hopkins, 19 W. Va. 84.

(8) Petition for Writ.—The petition for the writ should disclose a proper case upon its face, and when issued it may be dismissed without a hearing.

when improvidently awarded. Long v. Ohio River R. Co., 35 W. Va. 333, 18 S. E. Rep. 1010.

Must Be Presented within Ten Days.—In applying to the circuit court for a writ of certiorari to the judgment of a justice, under ch. 110 of the Code of West Virginia, the general rule is that the petitioner must present his petition within ten days after the judgment complained of is rendered, according to the analogy of appeals in § 164, ch. 50 of the Code. Long v. Ohio River R. Co., 35 W. Va. 333, 18 S. E. Rep. 1010; State v. Larue, 37 W. Va. 828, 17 S. E. Rep. 397; Morgan v. Ohio River R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588; Womer v. Ravenswood, etc., R. Co., 37 W. Va. 287, 16 S. E. Rep. 488; Bee v. Seaman, 36 W. Va. 381, 15 S. E. Rep. 173.

Where the petition for, and the writ of certiorari to, the judgment of a justice shows that it was not applied for within ten days after the judgment was entered, it should not be granted, unless good cause be shown why the writ was not applied for within ten days; and, if so issued after the time without such showing, it should be quashed as improvidently awarded. Arnold v. Lewis County Court, 38 W. Va. 142, 18 S. E. Rep. 476.

Waiver of Objection.—The defendant in a writ of certiorari to a justice's decision does not waive the objection that it was not taken within ten days, by appearing to the writ, without a motion to quash or dismiss, or even by consenting to a continuance. Morgan v. Ohio River R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588.

(9) Showing Good Cause.—It was held in Morgan v. Ohio River R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588, that the "good cause" must be shown by written evidence on a writ of certiorari from a justice as well as on an appeal.

As to what constitutes "good cause," see supra, "Appeal from Justice."

c. Jurisdictional Amount.

In Virginia.

Under Rev. Code 1819.—Where there was a judgment of a justice of the peace, affirmed by the county court, for debt, principal, interest, damages and costs not amounting to 33 dollars 33 cents; it was held that the circuit court had no appellate jurisdiction to review such judgment, by certiorari or otherwise. Hay v. Pistor, 2 Leigh 707.

Under Code 1887.—Under § 2947 of the Code Va. 1887, there can be no appeal from the judgment of a justice, unless the matter in controversy, exclusive of interest and costs, is of greater amount or value than ten dollars. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Clark, 92 Va. 118, 22 S. E. Rep. 867.

In West Virginia.—Where a justice in a suit involving a matter merely pecuniary not exceeding $15, has jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person, and renders a bona fide judgment on the merits clearly wrong, but within the scope of his legitimate powers, the circuit court will not, upon a writ of certiorari issued in the exercise of its original supervisory jurisdiction conferred by the constitution, review and reverse such judgment, but will dismiss the writ, as improvidently awarded. Wilson v. West Virginia, C. & P. Ry. Co., 38 W. Va. 212, 18 S. E. Rep. 577.

Costs.—Under Code 1887, § 2947, costs are not to be computed as a part of the matter in controversy in determining the right of appeal from a judgment of a justice of the peace. Shafer v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 2 Va. Dec. 252.

Trial by Jury.—On the trial of an appeal, in the circuit court, from the judgment of a justice, where the amount in controversy exceeds $20, if required by either party, a jury of twelve men will be selected and impanelled to try the case in like manner as other juries are selected and impanelled in said court. Lovings v. Norfolk & W. Ry. Co., 47 W. Va. 582, 35 S. E. Rep. 962.

Section 169, ch. 50 of the Code of West Virginia, in so far only as it authorizes a jury of six men to try in the circuit court, appeals from judgments of justices, is unconstitutional and void. Lovings v. Norfolk & W. Ry. Co., 47 W. Va. 582, 35 S. E. Rep. 962.

d. Cases Tried by Jury.—No fact tried in a civil action by a jury of six persons before a justice can be retried de novo by the circuit court, or otherwise than according to the rules of the common law. Hall v. Wadsworth, 30 W. Va. 55, 3 S. E. Rep. 29.

Where a case has been tried by a jury of six before a justice as provided by § 13, art. III of the Constitution of W. Va., no appeal can be taken to the circuit court, the same section declaring that "No fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined, in any case, than according to the rules of the common law"; hence, no provision having been made for allowing a writ of error in such cases, such a judgment cannot be reviewed in any way. Barlow v. Daniels, 25 W. Va. 512; Barker v. Walton, 31 W. Va. 468, 7 S. E. Rep. 452.

It makes no difference that the defendant makes no defense before the justice. Hickman v. Railroad Co., 30 W. Va. 296, 4 S. E. Rep. 654; Vandervort v. Fouse, 30 W. Va. 326, 4 S. E. Rep. 660.

Hence a mandamus will not lie to compel him to grant an appeal. Woodford v. Hull, 31 W. Va. 470, 7 S. E. Rep. 450.

But in Richmond v. Henderson, 48 W. Va. 389, 37 S. E. Rep. 653, this was overruled, and it was held that an appeal lies from the judgment of a justice rendered upon the verdict of a jury of six, just as in cases tried by him without a jury, and the writ of certiorari does not lie in such case.

Where a party, against whom a judgment was rendered by a justice of the peace on the verdict of a jury, obtained a writ of certiorari, and removed the same into the circuit court to be reviewed, before the decision of the case of Richmond v. Henderson, 48 W. Va. 389, 37 S. E. Rep. 653, and said judgment was affirmed by the circuit court, and a writ of error awarded by the court of appeals, before said decision of Richmond v. Henderson, and the plaintiff in error has asked that said certiorari be treated as an appeal, the judgment of the circuit court will be reversed, and the case remanded, with directions to treat it as being in said circuit court on appeal, and proceed with it accordingly. Harbert v. Monongahela River R. Co., 50 W. Va. 233, 40 S. E. Rep. 377.

e. Harmless Error.—If there has been a full and fair trial on the merits of the controversy in a civil action commenced before a justice, the judgment will not be reversed for mere technical errors, not prejudicial to the fairness of such trial. Furbee v. Shay, 46 W. Va. 786, 34 S. E. Rep. 746.

When there is no note in the record of the filing of a complaint or answer in an action originating before a justice, but there is copied into the record both a complaint by the plaintiff and an answer by the defendant, signed by them respectively, with which the evidence of the parties adduced on the trial is entirely consistent, and the record shows there was a full and fair trial, the appellate court will presume that the pleadings were so made up. Griffin v. Haught, 45 W. Va. 460, 31 S. E. Rep. 957.

Where a party after obtaining an appeal from a judgment of a justice, appeared in the circuit court and moved the court to quash the return on the process in the justice's court on the ground that it did not appear that the person who served the process was a special constable, and, on the motion being overruled, defended the suit and had a fair trial, it was held that the circuit court did not err. Johnson v. McCoy, 33 W. Va. 552, 9 S. E. Rep. 887.

Although the jury, upon an appeal to the circuit court from a justice of the peace, were sworn "to try the issue joined" and not "to try whether he unlawfully withheld the premises in controversy," where it appears that the case was tried on the merits without objection and no injustice was done to the plaintiff in error, the judgment will not be reversed for such technicality. Chancey v. Smith, 25 W. Va. 404.

3. APPEALS FROM COUNTY COURT.—Wherever the action of the county court is judicial in its nature, it is reviewable by the circuit court by certiorari. Poteet v. County of Cabell, 30 W. Va. 58, 3 S. E. Rep. 97.

But where the power conferred on the county courts is not judicial, but legislative, or executive, neither the circuit court nor the supreme court of appeals can review the final order of the county court in such cases. Poteet v. County of Cabell, 30 W. Va. 58, 3 S. E. Rep. 97.

The addition to §§ 10, 12, ch. 47, Code 1873, allowing appeals to the circuit courts where the decision complained of is upon an order made by the county court or the judge thereof, has no application to orders made by the county court when composed of justices of the peace under the old constitution. Dinwiddle County v. Stuart, 28 Gratt. 526.

Condemnation Proceedings.—The circuit court has jurisdiction to award a writ of supersedeas to the judgment of a county court in a proceeding under § 15 of the act incorporating the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal Company to condemn lands. Ches., etc., Canal Co. v. Hoyer, 2 Gratt. 511.

Order Granting Appeal from Justice.—The order of a county court granting an appeal from the judgment of a justice is reviewable both in the circuit court and in the court of appeals. Ruffner v. Love, 24 W. Va. 181.

Cases Removed from Justice's Court.—Where a warrant is brought before a justice upon a claim exceeding twenty dollars, and upon the application of the defendant before trial, it is removed to the county court, an appeal lies to the circuit court from the judgment of the county court in the case. Carter v. Kelly, 28 Gratt. 787.

Contested Election Cases.—But the statute of 1872 being silent as to the cases in which a writ of error or supersedeas may be awarded to the judgment of a county court, the common-law rule is in force and the reviewal must be by certiorari, in such cases as by the common law would only be reviewed in that manner, e. g. cases of contested election cases under the provision of ch. 118, Acts 1872-3. Dryden v. Swinburn, 15 W. Va. 234; Fowler v. Thompson, 23 W. Va. 106; Dryden v. Swinburne, 20 W. Va. 89.

Settlement of Sheriff's Account.—Although the settlement of a sheriff's account before commissioners, when confirmed by the county court, under Acts W. Va. 1873-3, ch. 198, § 2, is only prima facie correct and hence is not final, yet it may be reviewed in the circuit court by certiorari, since by § 3, ch. 15, of the same acts, the circuit courts are expressly given power to supervise all proceedings before the county court, and this proceeding is not excepted. Bd. of Ed. v. Hopkins, 19 W. Va. 84; Cunningham v. Squires, 2 W. Va. 422.

Relocation of County Seats.—The action of the county court in ascertaining and declaring the result of a vote on the question of the relocation of a county seat is reviewable by the circuit court by certiorari. Poteet v. County of Cabell, 30 W. Va. 58, 3 S. E. Rep. 97.

Refusal to Record Instrument of Emancipation.—A county court refuses to admit an instrument of emancipation of slaves to probate and record. Held, the circuit court cannot review this judgment, by way of appeal, writ of error or supersedeas. Mann v. Givens, 2 Leigh 762.

Criminal Cases.—A writ of error from a superior court lies to a judgment of a county court imposing a fine for contempt of said county court. Stokeley v. Com., 1 Va. Cas. 330.

Where Appeal is Taken Also.—If the superior court of chancery grants a certiorari to remove a cause, and the county court proceeds to a decree, upon an appeal from that decree, the superior court of chancery may hear the appeal and certiorari together, and make the proper decree upon the whole cause. Anthony v. Oldacre, 4 Call 489.

Jurisdictional Amount.—The Rev. Code, vol. 1, ch. 66, limited appeals from the county courts to the district courts to such personal actions as were of the value of ten pounds, leaving the right as at common law in real and mixed actions. Wingfield v. Crenshaw, 3 H. & M. 245.

In Clapham v. Lewis, 1 Va. Cas. 182, a writ of supersedeas was held to have been properly granted by a circuit court to the judgment of a county court, although the principal exclusive of the interest for which the judgment was rendered, was less than the prescribed amount giving jurisdiction.

The question arose under § 55 of the district court law, 1 Rev. Code, p. 82, which authorizes a supersedeas, where the value of the judgment is $33.33.

4. APPEALS FROM DECISION OF MAYOR.—No writ of error will lie to a judgment by the mayor of a city, proceeding as an ex officio justice of the peace, in the summary mode authorized by statute in case of the violation of a city ordinance. Acts 1881, ch. 8, §§ 231-3, such proceedings not being according to the course of the common law. Ridgway v. Hinton, 25 W. Va. 554.

5. APPEALS FROM DECISION OF RECORDER.—Where municipal courts and other inferior courts which have no juries are established, the right of trial by jury must be retained by granting appeals to courts where trial by jury may be had. Nor can this right of appeal be clogged by unreasonable restrictions, which would operate as a substantial denial of the right of trial by jury, though it may be limited as to time, and reasonable security may be required for appearance or for the payment of the fine, if affirmed by the higher court. Jelly v. Dils, 27 W. Va. 287.

6. APPEALS FROM DECISION OF CITY COUNCIL.—Certiorari is the proper remedy to review the action of a city council under § 28, ch. 47, Code W. Va., in declaring the running of a "merry-go-round" a nuisance, the statute giving no appeal in such cases. Davis v. Davis, 40 W. Va. 464, 21 S. E. Rep. 906.

7. APPEAL FROM DECISION OF BOARD OF SUPERVISORS.—An appeal from a decision of the board of supervisors of a county, rejecting a claim arising under an order of a county court, made in 1862, is properly taken to the county court of the county. Dinwiddie County v. Stuart, 28 Gratt. 526.

8. APPEAL FROM DECISION OF COUNTY COMMISSIONERS.—So where the county commissioners are convened as a returning board to ascertain the result of an election, no provision being made for a review of their proceedings by motion, appeal, writ of error or supersedeas, if its decisions cannot be reviewed by certiorari they cannot be reviewed at all. The appeal allowed from a final order of the county court in a contested election case, is another and different case. Chenoweth v. Commissioners, 26 W. Va. 230.

The rulings of the commissioners of a county sitting as a board of canvassers, after an election, to ascertain the result thereof in the county, are subject to review by the circuit court on writ of certiorari. Alderson v. Commissioners, 31 W. Va. 633, 8 S. E. Rep. 274.

Any candidate voted for at an election has the right, by himself or attorney, to be present at the counting of the votes, and request the commissioners to give him a bill of exceptions to their rulings against him; and he thus becomes a party to the proceedings, and has the right to have the rulings of such commissioners reviewed on certiorari. Alderson v. Commissioners, 31 W. Va. 633, 8 S. E. Rep. 274.

9. APPEAL FROM CORPORATION COURT.—Corporation and hustings courts are of co-ordinate dignity with circuit courts, by virtue of art. VI, § 14, Constitution of Virginia, and no right of appeal from the former to the latter can be conferred by the legislature. Section 5 of the act, approved March 6, 1890 (Acts 1889-90, p. 197) as amended by an act passed March 7, 1900 (Acts 1899-1900, p. 1202), attempting to confer such right of appeal is therefore unconstitutional, and the court of appeals will, by writ of prohibition, prevent the circuit courts from entertaining such appeals. Watson v. Blackstone, 98 Va. 618, 38 S. E. Rep. 939.

10. APPEAL FROM AUDITOR.—Appeals from the auditor are not confined to pleadings, as in ordinary cases; and therefore, for the sake of justice, new evidence is received, in the court of appeals, to show that the acts required by the opinion of the court, have been performed by the petitioners. Com. v. Banks, 4 Call 338.

An appeal lies, in all cases from the decision of the auditor, to the high court of chancery or to the Richmond district court according to the nature of the case; in matters of account, a technical appeal, in all other cases, a petition. Com. v. Beaumarchais, 3 Call 122; Attorney General v. Turpin, 3 H. & M. 548; Com. v. Bank, 2 Rob. 737.

11. REVIEW IN APPELLATE COURT.

a. Generally.—Where a record and judgment of a justice is removed and returned to the circuit court on writ of certiorari issued under chapter 110 of the Code (Ed. 1891), it is the duty of the clerk, upon receiving it, to file and docket the case in the same manner that other cases are docketed, and upon the hearing, the circuit court should review such judgment upon the merits, determine all questions arising on the law and the evidence, and render such judgment or make such order upon the whole matter as law and justice may require; and it is error in the court to have the case tried by a jury without having first reviewed such judgment. Arnold v. Lewis County Court, 38 W. Va. 142, 18 S. E. Rep. 476.

Now, by the West Virginia statute in every case before a justice, the record or proceeding may after a judgment or final order therein be removed by a writ of certiorari to the circuit court of the county in which such judgment was rendered, except where the amount in controversy, exclusive of interest and costs, does not exceed $15. Upon the hearing, such circuit court shall, in addition to determining such questions as might have been determined upon a certiorari, as the law heretofore was, review such judgment of the justice upon the merits, determining all questions arising on the law and evidence, and render such judgment or make such order upon the whole matter as law and justice may require; and to enable it to do this the methods of procedure in the circuit court are made to apply to the proceedings before the justice: that is, the justice shall, upon request of either party, in a civil case, matter, or proceeding, certify the evidence, if any, which may have been heard, and sign bills of exception, setting forth any rulings or orders which may not otherwise appear of record. Such certificate of evidence and bills of exceptions shall be a part of the record, and as such be removed and returned to the circuit court. Then the circuit court will confirm the judgment of the justice, if, upon the whole matter, law and justice may require it, but, if not, reverse it, and set it and the verdict of the jury aside, grant a new trial, or make such other order as the case may require. But if the judgment of the justice and verdict of the jury are set aside, the case shall be retained in the circuit court, and disposed of as if originally brought therein. Here the writ comes back to its original use and purpose as it was in like cases at common law; having first answered the additional purpose of appeal in jury cases, under chapter 50. Bee v. Seaman, 36 W. Va. 381, 15 S. E. Rep. 173.

b. Errors Correctible.—The general rule was, that, upon certiorari to an inferior court, the court from which the writ issues will only inquire into errors and defects which go to the jurisdiction of the court below, and for all other errors and irregularities the party must resort to his remedy by appeal or writ of error. But in West Virginia, if the inferior tribunal proceeds in a summary manner and not according to the course of the common law, and there is no remedy by appeal or writ of error, then the courts will consider other than jurisdictional questions. Poe v. Machine Works, 24 W. Va. 517; Chenoweth v. Commissioners, 26 W. Va. 230.

Prior to the enactment of § 2, ch. 110, Code 1887, although the appellate court could review all questions of jurisdiction and regularity of proceeding and decide all questions of law and fact and render such judgment, in case of reversal, as the lower court ought to have rendered, it was doubtful whether it could consider evidence and reverse findings of fact by jury or court, but now the statute provides for embodying in the record the evidence and all questions passed upon in the lower court and requires the appellate court to pass on all questions arising on law and evidence and render such judgment as the lower court should have done without remanding. Morgan v. Ohio River R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588.

The appellate court in cases brought before them by certiorari may review and correct the errors of the inferior court, not only when these errors are errors on questions of jurisdiction, power and authority of the inferior tribunal, or on questions of the regularity of the proceedings, but also when there were any errors of law in their proceedings or any action taken by them on erroneous princpies or in the absence of all evidence to justify it. Dryden v. Swinburne, 20 W. Va. 89.

In Dryden v. Swinburn, 15 W. Va. 234, GREEN, P., said: "Reason and authority both sustain the position that when a case is brought before a superior court by certiorari from the judgment of an inferior court of record, the judgment of the superior court should not be confined simply to an affirmance or reversal of the decision of the inferior court of record but in such case the superior court ought in cases of a reversal of an inferior court, either to remand the cause to be further proceeded with or enter such judgment as the court below ought to have done in a case brought before it by a writ of error. And § 26, ch. 17, Acts 1872-3 W. Va., does not apply, since that chapter applies only to writs of error and not to writs of certiorari." Fowler v. Thompson, 23 W. Va. 106.

c. Informal Plea.—In an action commenced before a justice, and taken by appeal to the circuit court if the defendant files an informal plea which sets up a valid defense to the action, the circuit court should not deny him the benefit of his defense when the plea is such that a person of common understanding may know what is intended by it. Jones v. Browne, 32 W. Va. 444, 9 S. E. Rep. 873.

d. Amendment of Pleading.—If a party during trial of an appeal from a justice is entitled to amend his pleadings, that right cannot be made to depend solely on whether the adverse party is then ready to proceed with the trial. If such amendment would be a surprise to the other party, a continuance will obviate that objection. Powell v. Love, 35 W. Va. 96, 14 S. E. Rep. 405.

If an appeal is taken, new or amended pleadings in writing may, if substantial justice requires it, be filed in the circuit court, or the case may be tried on the pleadings before the justice or, when oral, on the brief note of their contents on the justice's docket. But whether written pleadings be filed before the justice or in the circuit court, they need not be of any particular form but must be such as to enable a person of common understanding to know what was intended. Poole v. Dilworth, 26 W. Va. 563.

e. New Evidence in Superior Court.—Although, in controversies concerning mills, wills, roads, the probate of wills, and granting of administrations, the superior court of law, to which an appeal is taken from the county or corporation court, may hear new evidence upon questions submitted to its revisal by the record, it ought not to receive any evidence, but that of the record itself, to prove what questions were in fact tried in the court below. Bohn v. Sheppard, 4 Munf. 403.

f. Where Judgment Is Reversed.

In Virginia.—Where a superior court reverses the judgment of a lower court it cannot retain the cause for further proceedings without the consent of parties, but must send the cause back to the lower court. Janey v. Blake, 8 Leigh 88.

In bastardy proceedings, the county court having decided in favor of a putative father, and the overseers of the poor having spread the facts upon the record by an exception, and taken an appeal to the circuit court, that court, upon reversing the judgment of the county court, should not send the cause back for a new trial, but should render a judgment in favor of the overseers of the poor for the amount appearing to be due, but without interest. Willard v. Overseers of the Poor of Wood County, 9 Gratt. 120.

If the county court disregard the instruction of the district court, the latter court ought, upon the second appeal, to retain the cause for trial before themselves, and not send it back to the county court. Fine v. Cockshut, 6 Call 16.

In Smith v. Hutchinson, 78 Va. 683, where the circuit court remanded a case to the county court instead of retaining it, in violation of § 25, ch. 178, Code 1873 providing that "When any judgment, decree or order of a county court is reversed or affirmed, the cause shall not be remanded to said court for further proceedings, but shall be retained in the circuit court, and there proceeded in, unless by consent of the parties, or for good cause shown, the appellate court direct otherwise," the court said: "We do not decide that the circuit court should, where a cause is remanded for trial in the county court, spread in its order at large the character of the cause shown for so doing, for to do so would in many cases be inconvenient, and would unnecessarily cumber the record. It is necessary and proper, however, that the judgment in all such cases show either that it was done for good cause shown, or else by agreement of the parties." Such judgment will be reversed on appeal to the court of appeals. Pettit v. Cowherd, 83 Va. 20, 1 S. E. Rep. 392; Thompson v. Carpenter, 88 Va. 702, 14 S. E. Rep. 181.

Where the circuit court has reversed the order of the county court and remanded the case for further proceedings and adjourned, the circuit court has no jurisdiction afterwards to set aside the former order and dispose of the case on its merits on the ground that it should have retained the cause, §§ 3451-2 being applicable only to judgments by default or decree upon bill taken for confessed and cases of mistake, misrecital or miscalculation, not to the error committed in this case, of remanding the cause, when it should have retained and disposed of it. Thompson v. Carpenter, 88 Va. 702, 14 S. E. Rep. 181.

In West Virginia.—Where a cause is brought before a superior court by a writ of error the superior court is not confined to a simple affirmance or reversal of the decision of the inferior court of record, but in a case of a reversal of the judgment of an inferior court, it ought either to remand the cause to be further proceeded with or enter such judgment as the court below ought to have entered, except that by § 22, ch. 17, Acts 1872-3, where any judgment of the county court is reversed or affirmed, the cause shall not be remanded to that court, but shall be retained in the circuit court and be proceeded with there, but this has no application to a case reversed on a writ of certiorari. Dryden v. Swinburn, 15 W. Va. 234.

The circuit court, having obtained jurisdiction by writ of error, the statute authorizes it to retain the case, and there proceed in it, unless, by consent of the parties, or for good cause shown, the appellate court directs otherwise. State v. Kyle, 8 W. Va. 711.

The circuit court may in a proper case, if justice require it, set the verdict of a jury aside, and award a new trial, and when the judgment of the justice is set aside the case is not sent back, but must be retained in the circuit court, and disposed of as if originally brought therein. Bee v. Seaman, 36 W. Va. 381, 15 S. E. Rep. 173.

Before the Acts of 1882, ch. 153, upon reversal under a writ of certiorari, the court could simply reverse and remand the case to the lower court to enter a proper judgment or itself render proper judgment, but by that act the appellate court is required to render judgment without remanding, and, by the act of 1889, if the certiorari is from a justice's judgment and the amount in controversy exceed $15, if the judgment of the justice is set aside, the cause must be tried de novo in the appellate court. Prior to that statute there could be no new trial in the appellate court, but where further proceedings were necessary beyond what a judgment rendered on the record could effect, the cause had to be remanded. But none of these changes render the judgment of reversal any less final. Morgan v. Ohio River R. Co., 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. Rep. 588.

In Meeks v. Windon, 10 W. Va. 180, the court of appeals, while declining to decide whether § 12, art. VIII of the Constitution of West Virginia giving the circuit courts supervision of all proceedings before the county courts, by certiorari, etc., gave the circuit courts power to correct errors appearing on the face of the record, in spite of § 29 of same article making the judgment of the county court final on all appeals from justices except in certain excepted cases, and only made such judgment final on the merits, held that at any rate it had no jurisdiction where no such error is made to appear by the applicant for the writ of certiorari, and a writ of prohibition will be granted to the circuit judge prohibiting him from proceeding with the writ of certiorari.

12. REVIEW OF ACTION OF CIRCUIT COURT.—Writ of error is the proper method of bringing the action of the circuit court in refusing a writ of certiorari to a judgment of a justice, before the supreme court of appeals for review. Fouse v. Vandervort, 30 W. Va. 327, 4 S. E. Rep. 298.

A writ of error lies from the supreme court of appeals to the order of a judge of a circuit court improperly refusing an appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace. Clark v. West Virginia Cent. & P. Ry. Co., 50 W. Va. 1, 40 S. E. Rep. 351.

The court of appeals has appellate jurisdiction in all cases of certiorari awarded by the circuit court in review of matters and proceedings pending before or determined by a municipal council. Cushwa v. Lamar, 45 W. Va. 326, 32 S. E. Rep. 10.

A writ of error lies to the order of the circuit court reversing the judgment of a justice, and setting aside the verdict of a jury on which such judgment is founded, and directing a trial de novo. Such writ will not be sustained by the court of appeals unless the circuit court has plainly erred, but the judgment will be affirmed. Cleavenger v. Rohrbach, 46 W. Va. 148, 32 S. E. Rep. 1016.

Error Must Appear by the Record.—On appeal from a justice, when a motion is made by the appellee to dismiss the appeal because improvidently awarded, and the motion is overruled, the appellate court cannot review such ruling, unless it was objected to and exception taken when the ruling was made, or the point saved, and a bill of exceptions duly taken, showing the ruling complained of, or unless the error appears upon the record. Hines v. Board of Education of Springfield Dist., 49 W. Va. 426, 38 S. E. Rep. 550.

B. IN CRIMINAL CASES.

1. GENERALLY.—It is only by the common-law writ of error, and not by appeal or supersedeas, that the judgment of an inferior court upon a presentment for a misdemeanor can be reviewed and reversed by a superior court: and the writ of error may issue without regard to costs or the value of the judgment, and without the assent of the commonwealth's attorney. Temple v. Com., 1 Va. Cas. 163.

2. APPEALS FROM JUSTICE.—It is error in a county court to reverse the judgment of a justice and remand the case to the justice to be tried by him; and any subsequent trial of the case by the justice is null and void. Read v. Com., 24 Gratt. 618.

Where, in such case, the justice again tries and convicts the accused, and he again appeals to the county court, the proceedings before the justice on the second trial being null, the accused is in the county court upon the first appeal, and is to be tried by a jury as if the case had originated in that court. Read v. Com., 24 Gratt. 618.

The accused having been tried by a jury in the county court, and found guilty and sentenced, the errors in the proceedings of the justice on his second trial cannot affect the judgment of the county court. Read v. Com., 24 Gratt. 618.

When to Be Taken.—Appeals from the decisions of justices of the peace in misdemeanor cases must be taken at the time of the rendition of the judgment appealed from. They cannot be taken afterwards. Combs v. Com., 95 Va. 88, 27 S. E. Rep. 817.

Endorsement of "Appeal" on Warrant.—Where a person convicted of petit larceny before a justice moved the county court to review the judgment, and an endorsement on warrant showed that the witnesses had been recognized to appear before the county court, and after trial and conviction in the county court, the defendant objects that there is no indorsement of "appeal" on the warrant by the justice. Held, the objection comes too late. Harrison's Case, 81 Va. 491.

3. APPEAL FROM DECISION OF MAYOR.—The provision allowing appeals from the judgment of the mayor of Moundsville, § 9, ch. 60, Acts W. Va. 1866, where the fine exceeds five dollars, or imprisonment is imposed, gives an appeal of right and supplies the requirement of a jury trial in such cases. Moundsville v. Fountain, 27 W. Va. 182, 206.

XVIII. APPEALS OF RIGHT.

A. CONTROVERSIES CONCERNING ROADS.—The law authorizing appeals as of right from orders of the county courts in controversies concerning roads, is applicable only to a controversy concerning the establishment of a road, and not to a collateral controversy concerning the damages occasioned by a road already established: and in such collateral controversy, the order of the county court can be revised by the circuit court only by means of a writ of supersedeas. Hancock v. R. & P. R. Co., 3 Gratt. 328.

An order overruling a motion to quash the report of a commission of freeholders appointed on the application of a turnpike company to assess the damages caused by the opening of a road, is not an order in a "controversy concerning a road" within the meaning of the Act April 16, 1831, Sess. Acts, p. 50, giving appeals as of right to the circuit courts from the orders of county courts in controversies concerning mills, roads and the like, so that an appeal will lie from it as of right. Hill v. Salem Turnpike Co., 1 Rob. 263.

In Jeter v. Board, 27 Gratt. 910, the court said that an appeal lay as of right from an interlocutory order of a county court in a controversy concerning the establishment of a road, but also held that in that case the judgment was final.

But in Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Johnson, 90 Va. 282, 38 S. E. Rep. 195, it was held, expressly overruling the above case, that § 3453 of the Code, which gives an appeal of right to any person who thinks himself aggrieved by an order in a controversy concerning a roadway refers to a final order only, and that an order appointing commissioners to ascertain a just compensation is not a final order and no appeal lies therefrom.

B. CONTROVERSIES CONCERNING WHARVES.—Where an application for leave to establish a wharf is dismissed, the applicant may appeal under §1, ch. 178, Code 1873, as of right, to the circuit court during the term at which said order was made, on giving bond as required by law and may have the case heard de novo in that court or he may bring his case up under §2 of the same chapter, upon a writ of error for errors assigned, but in the latter case he is confined to the record to show error and if none appears the judgment of the lower court will be presumed to have been right. The rule in the court of appeals will be the same, so that if the circuit court erroneously reversed the judgment of the county court, its judgment must be in turn reversed and that of the county court affirmed. Neale v. Farinholt, 79 Va. 54.

And though it was entered in the judgment of the county court, by consent of parties that instead of the evidence before the county court being reduced to writing that either party might produce oral or documentary evidence before the circuit court, while this may allow them to introduce such evidence, it will not alter the rule that error must appear in the record, though such agreement result in a waiver of errors. Neale v. Farinholt, 79 Va. 54.

In such a case on appeal by the defendant, it is his right and duty to begin; the judgment of the county court being prima facie right. Mitchell v. Thorne, 21 Gratt. 164.

C. CONTROVERSIES CONCERNING MILLS.—An appeal was allowed in all cases concerning mills from the decision of the county court. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 66, §53; Wingfield v. Crenshaw, 3 H. & M. 245.

If a supersedeas be granted to an order of an inferior court, giving leave to build a mill, the superior court is not confined to errors apparent on the face of the record. Lee v. Turberville, 2 Wash. 102.

D. APPOINTMENT OR QUALIFICATION OF PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVES.—To the judgment of a county court refusing to permit a person named as executor in a will, to qualify as such without giving security, an appeal, demandable as of right, lies to the circuit court. Fairfax v. Fairfax, 7 Gratt. 36.

The act, Supp. Rev. Code, ch. 109, § 30, p. 145, authorizes appeals as of right from the county to the superior courts, in the case of a sentence or order made under § 41 of the act concerning wills, intestacy and distributions, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, p. 385, revoking, whether absolutely or conditionally, for any of the causes in that section mentioned, the powers of the executor or administrator, with a view to the appointment in his stead of an administrator de bonis non, or the committing the estate to the sheriff. Atkinson v. Christian, 3 Gratt. 46.

E. JUDGMENT ON FORTHCOMING BOND.—Where a county court overrules a motion for award of execution on a forthcoming bond, and the circuit court reverses this judgment and awards execution, an appeal lies from such judgment of the circuit court, as of right; aliter, where circuit court affirms judgment of county court awarding execution, or itself give original judgment awarding execution, on such bond. Anderson v. Leitch, 1 Leigh 402.

F. REMEDY FOR REFUSAL.—If the district court refuse to grant a supersedeas to a judgment of the county court concerning a road, and enter the refusal on record, the court of appeals will not grant a mandamus, but will award a supersedeas to the order of the district court. Mayo v. Clarke, 2 Call 389.

XIX. APPEALS TO SUPREME COURT OF UNITED STATES.

In Hunter v. Martin, 4 Munf. 1, it was held that the court of appeals of Virginia will consider whether a mandate issued by the supreme court of the United States directing the former court to enter a judgment reversing one which it had before pronounced, be authorized by the constitution or not, and being of opinion that such mandate was not so authorized, will disobey it, and it was also held that so much of § 25 of the act of Congress passed September 24, 1789, entitled "an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States" as extended the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court of the United States, to judgment pronounced by the supreme court of a state, is not warranted by the constitution.

Where a decision of a circuit court, affirmed by the supreme court of appeals of West Virginia, is reversed by the supreme court of the United States, the supreme court of appeals will reverse its decision as well as that of the circuit court, in compliance with the mandate of the supreme court of the United States and will remand the cause to the circuit court to be proceeded with in accordance with said mandate. Peerce v. Carskadon, 6 W. Va. 383.

Creel v. Brown.

August, 1842, Lewisburg.

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Pleading—Demurrer*—Misjoinder of Counts.—Where one of the counts in a declaration is in case for a tort, and another in assumpsit, a general demurrer to the declaration for such misjoinder ought to be sustained.

Appellate Practice—Defective Declaration—Demurrer—Reversal.†—There being a demurrer to a declaration, and an issue in fact, a verdict is found for the plaintiff, and it does not appear that any judgment was given on the demurrer, otherwise than by implication from the fact that final judgment was given for the plaintiff after the verdict. The Demurrer—Misjoinder of Causes.—See monographic note on "Demurrers" appended to Com. v. Jackson, 2 Va. Cas. 501.

†Appellate Practice—Demurrer to Declaration—Judgment Reversed.—See foot-notes to Strange v. Floyd, 9 Gratt. 474; Hamtramck v. Selden, 12 Gratt. 28.

In Hamtramck v. Selden, 12 Gratt. 32, it is said: "I think the court erred in sustaining the general demurrer to the pleas filed, and that the judgment should be reversed. And under the authority of Creel v. Brown, 1 Rob. 265, Strange v. Floyd, 9 Gratt. 474, and other cases in this court, the cause should be remanded with instructions to overrule the demurrer, and render judgment for the defendants below on their pleas, unless the plaintiffs below should ask leave to withdraw their demurrer and reply; which, if asked for, should be granted."

The principal case is cited in this connection in Strange v. Floyd, 9 Gratt. 476; Reid v. Field, 83 Va.

court of appeals is of opinion that the demurrer ought to have been sustained. HELD, the judgment must be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded to the circuit court, that it may proceed to judgment on the demurrer, unless the plaintiff shall, on leave obtained in that court, amend his declaration; and if the declaration be amended, for such further proceedings as may in that case be proper.

In an action in the circuit court of Wood county, by William Brown against Bushrod W. Creel, the declaration contained two counts, of which one was in case for a tort, and the other in assumpsit. The defendant demurred generally to the declaration, in which demurrer the plaintiff 266 joined; and issues in fact were *also joined, upon the plea of not guilty to one count, and non assumpsit to the other. On the issues in fact, a verdict was found for the plaintiff; and then a motion for a new trial being made and overruled, it was considered by the court that the plaintiff recover against the defendant the damages assessed by the jury, and the costs. On the petition of the defendant, a super-seedeas was awarded.

Fisher, for plaintiff in error.

William A. Harrison, for defendant in error.

STANARD, J., delivered the following as the opinion of the court:

It appears to the court that the issue in fact was tried before any judgment on the demurrer to the declaration, and it does not appear that any judgment was given by the court on the demurrer, otherwise than by implication from the fact that final judgment was given after the verdict. Though, according to the decision of this court in the cases of Green v. Dulany, 2 Munf. 518, and Jones v. Stevenson, 5 Munf. 7, it was irregular to try the issue of fact before judgment on the demurrer, yet if it appeared that the demurrer ought to have been overruled, and so no inconvenience had ensued from that irregularity, it would not be sufficient cause to reverse the judgment. But as it appears to this court, that by reason of the misjoinder of action, (one of the counts in the declaration being in case as for a tort, and the other in assumpsit) the demurrer ought to have been sustained; and as the plaintiff might (had the right judgment on the demurrer in the court below preceded the trial of the issue) have cured the defect in the declaration by amendment, and from that benefit the irregularity of first trying the issue in fact would have precluded him, the objection founded on this irregularity

267 *becomes substantial, and ought to prevail, so far as to entitle him to have the cause placed in the court below in the position it would have occupied had the irregularity not occurred. The court is therefore of opinion that the judgment be reversed with costs, the verdict set aside, and a new trial of the issue in fact awarded; and that the cause be remanded to the circuit superior court, that it may proceed to judgment on the demurrer, unless the plaintiff should, on leave obtained in that court, amend his declaration; and if the declaration be amended, for such further proceedings as may be proper on the present pleadings, and such other pleadings as may be offered by either party and admitted by the court.

Chapman &c. v. Wilson & Co.

August, 1842, Lewisburg.

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Partnership—Issue as to Existence of—Evidence—Competency.—In assumpsit against S. B. & C. as partners under the firm of S. & Co. for goods sold, the question being whether B. and C. were partners of S. by whom the goods were purchased, and B. and C. appearing to have had a storehouse in another town, a witness was asked whether he saw boxes of goods marked S. & Co. at the storehouse of B. and C. The defendants objected to the question, but the circuit court permitted it to be answered, and the defendants excepted. HELD, the evidence had a connexion, though very slight, with the matter in controversy, and though it might have been of very little weight, it was not error to permit it to go to the jury as a link in the chain of circumstances.

Same—Same—Same—Same.—A second bill of exceptions stated that the defendants asked a witness whether he was present at a settlement made between S. B. and C. of their accounts relative to their mercantile transactions, after goods had been furnished the first by the two last? whether he knew for what certain bonds then executed by S. to *B. and C. were given? and 268 whether 20 per cent. on the amount stated to be due was not included in said bonds? The plaintiffs objected to the question, on the ground that the acts and declarations of the defendants could not be given in evidence for them, and the court sustained the objection. HELD, the evidence was properly rejected; the bill of exceptions not shewing the time of the transaction between the defendants, nor suggesting any connexion between the fact which the evidence was offered to prove, and the matter in controversy, nor stating anything from which such connexion could be inferred.

Same—Same—Same—Same.—A third bill of exceptions stated, that the plaintiffs asked a witness if he had heard S. say what representations he had made to the plaintiffs at the time he purchased the goods from them, as to the existence of a partnership between himself and the other defendants. HELD, the evidence was properly admissible to prove that the plaintiffs intended to sell to, and S. intended to purchase for, a partnership, but was no proof against B. and C. that they were the partners. That evidence, however, was not regularly admissible, even for this limited purpose, until the plaintiffs had offered evidence tending to shew that there was a partnership between S. B. and C. which authorized S. to purchase on the credit of the three.

84, 1 S. E. Rep. 395. See also. Cromer v. Cromer, 20 Gratt. 286; 1 Va. Law. Reg. 900.

Demurrer to Special Plea—Failure to Pass upon.—Failure of the court to pass upon demurrer to one special plea, and motion to exclude another special plea, affords no ground for reversing the judgment, if these pleas presented no bar to the action. Peshine v. Shepperson, 17 Gratt. 480, 94 Am. Dec. 468, citing the principal case.

Same—Same—Instructions*—What Does Not Constitute Partnership.—A fourth bill of exceptions stated, that the court was asked by the defendants to give the jury the following instructions: 1. If the jury shall believe from the evidence, that in June 1832, S. bought of B. and C. $1000 worth of goods, to commence merchandizing with on Brush creek, and that S. was to pay B. and C. for said goods 20 per cent. upon the cost thereof, or a portion of the profits of the same, to be left to the election of B. and C. and that in September succeeding the purchase, and before all the $1000 worth of goods had been received by S., B. and C. did elect to take the 20 per cent., and that when the goods were sold and delivered, they were charged by B. and C. to S., and the business upon Brush creek conducted, not only to the time of the election, but afterwards, in the name of S., then the said contract is not in law a partnership. 2. If the jury shall believe from the evidence, that the election by B. and C. under the contract with S. of June 1832, was made in September thereafter, and was to take the 20 per cent., and that the same was previous to the purchase of goods by S. of the plaintiffs, and that the plaintiffs at the time of giving the credit to S. did not know of the said contract made in June 1832, then they ought to find for the defendants. HELD, the instructions so asked correctly expound the law of the case stated therein, and the circuit court erred in refusing to give them.

269 *Same—Same—Same—Limited Partnership—

Notice of Dissolution.—The fourth bill of exceptions further shewed that the circuit court, instead of the instructions so asked, gave the following: "If the jury shall believe from the evidence, that B. and C. entered into a contract with S. by which they agreed to furnish him with 1000 dollars worth of goods for the purpose of merchandizing on Brush creek, for which, by said contract, they were entitled to demand from S. either an advance of 20 per cent. or to take a portion of the profits arising from the sale thereof, and that the said goods or a portion thereof were furnished to S. who traded thereon previous to the said election being made, it constituted B. and C. partners of S. until such period as they have made their said election and given notice thereof to the world, and responsible for his contracts in relation to said business." HELD, the instruction so given was wrong in this, that though the case stated might have created a temporary partnership until election, it was limited to the sale of the goods furnished and to the profits thereof, and did not extend to purchases and sales of other goods, and the dissolution of such partnership was effectual in respect to all who may have had actual notice, though such notice may not have been given to the world, or even publicly.

Instructions Erroneous—Judgment Reversed.—The principal case is cited in Strader v. Goff, 6 W. Va. 264, to the point that when an instruction given and excepted to, is apparently erroneous, the judgment must be reversed, though it be not shown whether it prejudiced the party who excepted or not. See foot-note to Colvin v. Menefee, 11 Gratt. 87, and monographic note on "Instructions" appended to Womack v. Circle, 29 Gratt. 192.

Appellate Court—Refusal to Give Instruction—Review.

—Where a court refuses to give an instruction asked, and its opinion is excepted to, if the bill of exceptions does not state that evidence was offered tending to prove the case supposed by the instruction, and the court has simply declined to give the instruction, such refusal may perhaps be justified, on the ground that the case was merely hypothetical, and the instruction asked on an abstract question. But if the court not only declines to give the instruction asked, but proceeds to give another in lieu thereof, the inference is a reasonable one, that there was evidence tending to prove the case supposed, and the appellate court will not only enquire whether the law is correctly expounded in the instruction given, but will also enquire whether it is correctly stated in the instruction asked.

John S. Wilson and Bernard Peyton, merchants and partners trading under the firm and style of John S. Wilson & Co. brought an action of assumpsit in the circuit court of Giles against French C. Smith, Augustus A. Chapman and Andrew Beirne, as merchants and partners trading under the firm and style of French C. Smith & Co. for goods, wares and merchandize alleged 270 to have been sold by the plaintiffs to the defendants. The *defendants Chapman and Smith severally pleaded non assumpsit, upon which pleas issues were joined. At the trial, five bills of exceptions were filed to opinions given by the court.

The first bill of exceptions stated, that the plaintiffs, to support the issue on their part, introduced first as a witness Samuel Peck, and after several other questions to the witness, he was asked whether he saw boxes of goods marked French C. Smith & Co. at the storehouse of Beirne & Chapman (the partners in which firm were the defendants Andrew P. Beirne and Augustus A. Chapman) in Parisburg. To the answering of this question the defendants objected; but the court, being of opinion that it was a circumstance which, taken in connexion with others, was proper for the consideration of the jury in deciding the question of partnership, overruled the objection, and permitted the question to be asked.

The second bill of exceptions stated, that the defendants introduced James M'Clagherty as a witness, and asked him whether he was present at a settlement made between French C. Smith, Andrew P. Beirne and Augustus A. Chapman of their accounts relative to their mercantile transactions, after goods had been furnished the first by the two last? whether he knew for what certain bonds then executed by Smith to Beirne & Chapman were given? and whether 20 per cent. on the amount stated to be due was not included in said bonds? The plaintiffs objected to the question, on the ground that the acts and declarations of the defendants could not be given in evidence for them; and the court sustained the objection.

The third bill of exceptions stated, that the plaintiffs introduced a witness, and asked him if he had heard French C. Smith say, what representations he had made to the plaintiffs, at the time he purchased the goods from them, as to the existence of a partnership between himself and the 271 other defendants? and the defendants *objected to this question being answered, on the ground that the declarations of Smith after the purchase was made were not evidence of what took place at the time of the purchase, and on the further ground that his declarations were no evidence against his codefendants; but the court permitted the question to be asked, instructing the jury that said declarations of Smith were no evidence against his codefendants, unless they should be of opinion that a partnership was proved independently thereof, nor were they evidence for the purpose of establishing such partnership; and the defendants excepted, both to the admission of the evidence and to the opinion of the court accompanying it.

The fourth bill of exceptions stated, that the court was asked by the defendants' counsel to give to the jury the following instructions:

1. If the jury shall believe, from the evidence in the cause, that in the month of June 1832, French C. Smith, one of the defendants, bought of Andrew P. Beirne and Augustus A. Chapman 1000 dollars worth of goods, to commence merchandizing with on Brush creek, and that the said Smith was to pay said Beirne & Chapman for the said goods the sum of 20 per cent. upon the prime cost of the goods, or a portion of the profits of the same, to be left to the election of the said Beirne & Chapman, and that in the month of September succeeding the purchase of the same by Smith, and before all the 1000 dollars worth of goods had been received by the said Smith, the said Beirne & Chapman did elect to take the 20 per cent. and that when the goods were sold and delivered they were charged by said Beirne & Chapman to said French C. Smith, and the business upon Brush creek conducted, not only to the time of the election but afterwards, in the name of French C. Smith, then the said contract is not in law a partnership.

2dly. If the jury shall believe, from the evidence, that the election by Beirne 272 & Chapman, under the contract *with Smith of June 1832, was made in September thereafter, and was to take the 20 per cent. and that the same was previous to the purchase of goods by Smith of the plaintiffs, and that the plaintiffs, at the time of giving the credit to Smith, did not know of the said contract made as aforesaid in June 1832, then they ought to find for the defendants.

The court refused to give the instructions so asked, and instead thereof gave the following:

If the jury shall believe, from the evidence, that the defendants Augustus A. Chapman and Andrew P. Beirne entered into a contract with the defendant French C. Smith, by which they agreed to furnish him with 1000 dollars worth of goods for the purpose of merchandizing on Brush creek, for which, by said contract, they were entitled to demand from the said French C. Smith either an advance of 20 per cent. or to take a portion of the profits arising from the sale thereof, and that the said goods or a portion thereof were furnished to the said French C. Smith, who traded thereon previous to the said election being made, it constituted the said Augustus A. Chapman and Andrew P. Beirne partners of the said French C. Smith until such period as they may have made their said election and given notice thereof to the world, and responsible for his contracts in relation to said business.

The fifth bill of exceptions stated, that the defendants moved the court to instruct the jury,

1. That if they shall believe, from the evidence, that in June 1832 the defendant French C. Smith purchased by private contract of Andrew P. Beirne and Augustus A. Chapman 1000 dollars worth of goods to commence a mercantile business on Brush creek, and that the said Smith was to pay to the said Beirne & Chapman 20 per cent. upon the prime cost of the goods so sold, or a portion of the profits, at the election of the said Beirne & Chapman, and that in the month of September thereafter, 273 *before all the said goods were delivered to said Smith, the said Beirne & Chapman did elect to take the 20 per cent. and that the goods when sold were charged by the said Beirne & Chapman to the said French C. Smith, and the business on Brush creek, both before and after the said election, was conducted in the name of French C. Smith, then the said contract was not in law a partnership.

2dly. That if the jury shall believe that French C. Smith, in the month of June 1832, purchased of Andrew P. Beirne and Augustus A. Chapman 1000 dollars worth of goods to merchandize on Brush creek, for which the said Smith was to pay to the said Beirne & Chapman 20 per cent. on the prime cost of said goods or a part of the profits, and that said contract was a private and not a public contract, and that the said Beirne & Chapman, in the month of September 1832, and previous to the delivery of all the goods, did elect to take the 20 per cent. and that in the months of February and June thereafter French C. Smith purchased the goods of the plaintiffs, they the said plaintiffs not knowing of the existence of the contract of June 1832, then they ought to find for the defendants. If the jury shall believe, from the evidence in the cause, that the contract of June 1832, referred to in the foregoing instructions, was a private one, and that the election was made in September thereafter, no notice of such election was necessary.

The court gave these instructions, but further instructed the jury that if they should be of opinion that the said Augustus A. Chapman and Andrew P. Beirne, after the delivery of a portion of the said goods, and before they had made their election, represented themselves as partners, and acted as such, then they are in law partners of the said French C. Smith (even though the contract aforesaid may have been private), and responsible for his contracts, until such time as they shall 274 *have given public notice of their having made such election and ceased to be partners.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs for 1183 dollars 58 cents damages, with interest from the 25th of April 1834 till paid; and judgment was rendered for the same, with costs.

On the petition of the defendants Chapman and Beirne, a supersedeas was awarded.

M'Comas, for plaintiffs in error. We cannot well conceive any circumstance with which the evidence mentioned in the first bill of exceptions could be connected, that would make that evidence of partnership.

II. The testimony mentioned in the second bill of exceptions was a link in the chain of evidence, and ought to have been admitted.

III. It is difficult to conceive for what purpose the evidence mentioned in the third bill of exceptions could have been received, unless to prove partnership. Yet the jury must have supposed it was to prove something.

IV. and V. Upon the question whether the contract supposed by the instructions asked constituted a partnership, the authorities will first be examined that are relied on upon the other side. The principle established by the case Ex parte Hamper, 17 Ves. 404, and laid down in Gow on Partn. 15, and 3 Kent's Comm. 32, is, that a person who has a specific interest in the profits themselves, as profits, is a partner. In Weaver v. Tapscott, 9 Leigh 424; Cary on Partnership 8, 10, 14; Waugh v. Carver, 2 H. Black. 235, and Smith on Mercantile Law 3, it is laid down, that a share of the profits constitutes a partnership, and that when there is no community of profits there is no partnership. The question then is, whether in this case there was a community of profits? Was there ever a time, after the contract by Beirne & Chapman with Smith, in which *the two 275 former had a specific interest in the profits? Until they made their election, there was no such interest; and after their election, there could be none. Had Beirne & Chapman elected to take a part of the profits, their election might have related back to the delivery of the goods. And if it would so have related back, an election to take the 20 per cent. must equally relate back. No case has been found in which a contract like this has been held to create a partnership. Here the credit was not even given during the time that the right of election existed.

But if any partnership existed, what kind of partnership was it? A partnership may be general, or limited to a particular branch of business or particular object. 3 Kent's Comm. 30; Willett v. Chambers, Cowp. 814; Gow on Partn. 7; Montague on Partn. 9; Ensign v. Wands, 1 Johns. Ch. Rep. 171; Livingston v. Roosevelt, 4 Johns. Rep. 251. Here the partnership was limited to the sale of a 1000 dollars worth of goods, and the only interest which Beirne & Chapman could have in the concern was a portion of the profits arising from the sale of those goods. Such a partnership could not authorize Smith to purchase goods upon the joint credit of himself and Beirne & Chapman. Moreover, if there was a partnership, whether general or limited, Beirne & Chapman were only dormant partners, and not liable for the contracts of Smith made after they had retired from the concern, whether notice was given of the dissolution or not. 3 Kent's Comm. 68; Armstrong v. Hussey, 12 Serg. & Rawle 315. It is said in Evans v. Drummond, 4 Esp. N. P. Cas. 89, that "if the acting partner represents the dormant partner as a partner even after the dissolution, the dormant partner will be bound, unless he gives notice of the dissolution." But Kent, with this case before him, lays down the law differently. And the doctrine is also questioned by Starkie; 3 Starkie on Evid. 1080. His reason 276 is conclusive, *to wit, that the moment the partnership ceases, the right to bind ceases.

The court manifestly erred in instructing the jury that Beirne & Chapman were liable until public notice was given of the dissolution. A person dealing with a firm, who has notice of its dissolution, cannot hold the partner bound who has retired, although there may have been no public notice of such dissolution.

It will not do to argue that the instructions asked for and given were mere abstractions. The appellate court cannot presume that instructions given by the court below were inapplicable to the case. There is a great difference between an instruction refused and one given. An erroneous instruction, even upon an abstract question, might mislead the jury.

Peyton, for defendants in error. Where a partnership is denied, creditors of the firm, not being privy to or in possession of the partnership agreement, can only establish the partnership by circumstances. If it can be shewn that the defendants suffered their connexion as partners to be known, or suffered their names to be used as partners, this is conclusive. Roscoe on Evid. 212. Now Beirne & Chapman (two of the alleged partners in the firm of French C. Smith & Co.) having a store at Parisburg, the fact of goods being boxed or in boxes at the store last mentioned for French C. Smith & Co. would be a circumstance to lead the public to conclude that they were partners. It must be born in mind, that though in point of fact persons are not partners, yet if they so represent themselves, and thus credit is gotten, they are liable. De Berkorn v. Smith, 1 Esp. N. P. C. 29; Kell v. Nainby, 10 Barn. & Cress. 20; 21 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 17; Gurdon v. Robson, 2 Camp. 302; Waugh v. Carver, 2 H. Black. 235.

II. It is supposed by the second bill of exceptions that goods had been furnished one defendant by the two others, and that after such goods were furnished, 277 *the three defendants had a settlement of their mercantile accounts; and the object seems to be, to prove that in that settlement 20 per cent. was added to the amount due for the goods furnished. But what goods were furnished, when, and for what purpose, is unexplained. What this settlement embraced, whether the whole mercantile dealings of the parties, or the goods furnished; and for what purpose the 20 per cent. was included, whether as an agreed profit, or as an advance upon the sale of the goods furnished, is equally unexplained. The evidence was of transactions to which the plaintiffs were strangers, and by which, if true, they could not be affected. The only legitimate purpose for which it could be offered was to prove a dissolution of the concern. A partnership formed by parol may, it is true, be dissolved by parol. Rackstraw v. Imber, 1 Holt 368; 3 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 132. But though a partnership may be dissolved as it regards the partners themselves, their liability to creditors may still continue. And as this consequence can only be obviated by notice, the evidence offered, without evidence of notice, was altogether irrelevant and of course inadmissible. All persons dealing with a concern rely upon the united credit of all its members. Therefore when a dissolution takes place, justice requires that the world should be fully apprized of the fact. Those having dealings with the concern must have particular, and the world general notice. Godfrey v. Turnbull, 1 Esp. N. P. C. 371; Parkin v. Carruthers, 3 Esp. N. P. C. 248; Fox v. Hambury, Cowp. 445. Though a partner whose name does not appear in the firm is only liable for goods furnished during the time that he is actually a partner, yet if he be known to be a dormant partner, though his name does not appear in the firm, the usual notice of dissolution is necessary to avoid liability. Cary on Partn. 187; Evans v. Drummond, 4 Esp. N. P. C. 89.

278 *III. It was competent to the plaintiffs to prove that French C. Smith bought the goods not upon his own credit, but upon the credit of the defendants. The declarations of Smith on this point were conclusive, and his admission that such declarations were made was equally conclusive. The defendants Beirne & Chapman, it is admitted, were not bound by these representations unless they were partners; and the court instructed the jury that the declarations of Smith were inadmissible to establish the partnership. This opinion of the court, thus limited, seems to be correct. Cary on Partn. 139; Evans v. Drummond, 4 Esp. N. P. C. 89; Parkin v. Carruthers, 3 Esp. N. P. C. 248; Gow on Partn. 273.

IV. What constitutes a partnership between individuals contracting together, is one question; but what constitutes a partnership as to third persons, is another and different question. The first species of partnership is the result of a contract inter se. The latter species may be created without contract. For the law is, that he who lends his credit to a firm, or holds himself out as a partner, is liable for the engagements of the partnership with third persons, though he may not be interested in the capital or profits. Alderson v. Clay, 1 Starkie 405; 2 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 445; Smith on Mercantile Law, p. 6; Ex parte Hamper, 17 Ves. 404; Waugh v. Carver, 2 H. Black. 235; Weaver v. Tapscott, 9 Leigh 424. In this case, Beirne & Chapman have held themselves out to the world as partners in the store on Brush creek, have furnished the capital in goods, and have reserved to themselves an election to take a portion of the profits. This election, by the terms of the contract, could not be made until the goods were sold: for, until that period, it was not in the power of Beirne & Chapman to make the election with a proper regard to their own interests. After the sale, they could see from the books whether it was to their interest to take the 20 per cent. or a portion of the profits.

279 Any variation *of this contract, made in September, after the business was commenced by the defendants and before a sale of the goods, and not made known to creditors, could not screen the defendants from their liability as partners to third persons. Cary on Partn. 8, 10, 14; Alderson v. Pope, 1 Camp. 404; Ex parte Hamper, 17 Ves. 404; Godfrey v. Turnbull, 1 Esp. N. P. C. 371, and the cases cited on the second point.

But it is argued that the defendants were associated for a limited purpose or branch of business, viz. for vending the goods sold by Beirne & Chapman to Smith. In answer to this we say, there was nothing that could apprise the public that this was a limited partnership. The public saw Smith commencing mercantile business upon Brush creek. They saw that the goods to be vended were in part procured from Beirne & Chapman; that Beirne & Chapman were interested in the store, and were, at their election, to receive a portion of the profits. How was the public to know that this trading was limited to the vending of the goods gotten from Beirne & Chapman? If they could know this, still, might not occasional additions to the stock be indispensably necessary to effect a sale of the original 1000 dollars worth of goods bought of Beirne & Chapman? If so, the subsequent purchase from the appellees would have been within the scope of this limited partnership.

The appellees therefore insist that the instruction given by the circuit court is free from error; that the contract constituted the appellants partners previous to election, and subsequent thereto (no notice being given thereof) as it regarded third persons.

Neither did the court err in refusing to give the instructions asked. The court was clearly right in refusing to give the first instruction asked. For there was clearly a partnership, between the contract of sale in June 1832, and the period of election in September *1832. The store was opened, and a part of the goods sold. The election in September, if it amounted to any thing, must have been a dissolution. For the election was not made according to the contract of June 1832; that contract only authorizing election when the goods were sold. Gow on Partn. 15; Grace v. Smith, 2 W. Black. 998; Ex parte Hamper, 17 Ves. 404; Fromont v. Coupland, 2 Bingh. 170; 9 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 366; Purviance v. M'Clintee, 6 Serg. & Rawle 259; 3 Kent's Comm. 32.

The same principles and authorities shew that the second instruction asked was properly refused. This instruction seems to proceed upon the ground that partners are not liable to creditors who are ignorant of the terms of the partnership contract; a contract rarely, if ever, known to creditors in any case. A partnership is often created by construction of law; as where one person engages jointly with another in a transaction, either as agent or otherwise, and has an interest in the profits. As frauds might be practised if such agreements bound third persons, and the law will protect third persons against frauds, it has therefore declared all persons entering into such agreements liable to the world as partners. Cary on Partn. 8, 9, 10. Whoever shares in the profits of a concern is a partner as it regards the public. Waugh v. Carver, 2 H. Black. 235. Where a merchant employs a broker to purchase goods, and it is agreed between them that the broker shall receive a portion of the profits as a recompense for his trouble, they are partners as it regards third persons. Smith v. Watson, 2 Barn. & Cress. 401; 9 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 122; Reid v. Hollinshead, 4 Barn. & Cress. 867; 10 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 460; Ex parte Hamper, 17 Ves. 404.

It is moreover apparent that the judge of the circuit court considered, that the facts supposed by the instructions asked did not correspond strictly with the *facts proved. That the goods purchased in June 1832 were in part immediately delivered, and the store opened upon Brush creek, and the sales going on before the election made, are facts kept out of view, though not expressly negatived. And the instruction of the judge seems to have been given with a view of bringing to the consideration of the jury those facts, and the law arising thereon. His object was to prevent the jury from being misled by a plausible but incorrect statement of facts.

V. The same object seems to have influenced the judge in giving the instruction mentioned in the fifth bill of exceptions. The instructions appearing by this bill to have been asked only vary from those appearing by the fourth bill to have been asked, in this, that in the instructions last asked the contract of June 1832 is represented as a private contract, unknown to the plaintiffs when they extended credit to Smith. The judge having heard evidence going to prove that both Beirne and Chapman, from the time of the contract in June 1832 till the period of their election in September, had publicly represented themselves and acted as the partners of Smith in the store upon Brush creek, considered it his duty, while he gave the instructions last asked, to bring to the consideration of the jury a state of facts entitling the plaintiffs to recover notwithstanding those instructions.

All of the exceptions are liable to the following observations: 1. In none of them is the evidence set forth, so as to enable an appellate court to ascertain whether the verdict was rendered under the influence of any opinion excepted to. 2. When the defendants excepted to the admission or exclusion of evidence, they should have taken care to state such a case as would shew the relevancy of the evidence excluded, or the irrelevancy of the evidence admitted, because it is always incumbent on a party seeking to reverse a judgment *to shew that there is error. Rowt's adm'r v. Kyle's adm'r, 1 Leigh 216. 3. There is no statement of the facts proved, to enable the court to ascertain whether the instructions asked for and given had any application to the case, or to shew that the opinions were erroneous.

C. Johnson, in reply, cited the cases referred to in 1 Rob. Pract. 344-348, and said, the establishment of the proposition which the counsel on the other side was endeavouring to establish as to the imperfect nature of the bills of exceptions, would lead to a reversal of the judgment. He proceeded then to examine the opinions excepted to.

I. Although (he remarked) the statement in the first bill of exceptions does not shew what was the point in issue, yet enough is stated to shew that testimony was improperly admitted. All testimony is improper which is irrelevant. If testimony be prima facie irrelevant, it is incumbent on the party who offers it, to make it appear that it is relevant. If, for example, declarations of a stranger be offered, it is not necessary for the party who excepts to the opinion of the court admitting them, to do more in the bill of exceptions than state that such declarations were offered and received. And yet such hearsay evidence might be proper in consequence of some evidence previously given. They might, for example, be declarations of a witness who had been examined, contradicting what he had deposed to. But in such case the party offering them must take care to have enough stated in the bill of exceptions to shew the propriety of receiving them. In the present case, how could the evidence set forth in the first bill of exceptions tend to prove a partnership? By itself, we cannot see that it would have such tendency; and if any other evidence had been given that would have authorized it to be admitted, that other evidence ought to have been stated.

283 *II. In the second bill of exceptions, the previous evidence not being stated, the case is governed by those already cited which require a reversal because of the imperfect nature of the bill of exceptions.

III. The third bill of exceptions shews that declarations respecting the existence of the partnership were permitted to be given in evidence, with an instruction that they were not evidence of its existence. Of what else could they be evidence? This bill of exceptions is at least obnoxious to the objection of the want of certainty.

IV. We admit that if the compensation had not been in the alternative; if the contract had been to take a part of the profits without any condition, it would have been a case of partnership. But we have been unable to find any case in which a party thus contingently entitled to a share of the profits has been held a partner. The main reason assigned for holding one who shares in the profits a partner, is, that he who so shares ought, in reference to the other dealers, to be held to share in the losses, because those dealers give credit trusting to the profits as a fund belonging to those whom they trust. Where the interest is alternative and contingent, there is, until the election of one thing or the other, no right to either, and until a share of the profits is elected, there is no community of profits. The vendor must not wait until he sees that profit is sure. The vendee has a right to require that the election be made in a reasonable time. But when the election is made, it relates back to the commencement of the dealing. What objection can there be to this view of the subject, as it regards the public? If they know the contract and deal in reference to it, they cannot complain that they are injured by it. If the contract be secret, they deal on the credit of him to whom they sell, and from him no part of the profits is taken. The court should therefore have given the first instruction asked. It was evi-

284 dently pertinent *to the issue, and the court did not refuse it because there was no evidence of the facts supposed by it, but gave an instruction based upon the same state of facts. An appellate court can never presume that the court below gave an instruction not pertinent to the matter in issue. And in giving that instruction, as well as in refusing the second instruction asked, that court has clearly erred. If there had been a partnership, it was certainly dissolved before the transaction in question, and the former partners then cannot be liable unless for want of notice. The cases cited by Mr. M'Comas shew that ner is not necessary at all. And the circuit court has held that there must be notice to the world. Surely, there is no foundation in law for this. If notice had been given to the plaintiffs, it would not only have been good, but better than notice in the papers. The court was eminently wrong in another respect. It should have told the jury that if they thought there was a partnership, it was limited to a single object,—to the vending of these goods, and the business properly connected with it; not that it was a partnership in other goods. The argument on the other side supposes that a very curious mode might be adopted to sell these goods; viz. to purchase others.

V. What has been said upon the fourth bill of exceptions will also apply to the fifth; the variations being very slight.

STANARD, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The court is of opinion that the evidence mentioned in the first bill of exceptions had a connexion, though very slight, with one of the questions involved in the issue, and though it might have been of very little weight, it was not error to permit it, as a link in a chain of circumstances, to go to the jury.

285 *The evidence mentioned in the second bill of exceptions was properly rejected. The exception does not shew the time of the transaction between the defendants, nor suggest any connexion between the fact the evidence was offered to prove, and any matter in controversy in the suit; nor is there any thing stated in the exception from which such connexion can be inferred.

The evidence mentioned in the third bill of exceptions was properly admissible, to prove that the plaintiffs intended to sell to, and Smith intended to purchase for, a partnership, but was no proof against Chapman & Beirne that they were the partners. That evidence, however, was not regularly admissible in this case, even for this limited purpose, until the plaintiffs had offered evidence tending to shew that there was a partnership (either by express contract, or by Chapman & Beirne permitting their names to be used as partners, or otherwise,) between Smith, Chapman and Beirne, that authorized Smith to purchase on the credit of the three.

The law of the case stated in the fourth exception is correctly expounded by the instruction asked for thereon by the defendants. But it is not stated that evidence was offered tending to prove such case; and if the court had simply declined to give the instruction, such refusal might have been justified, on the ground that the case was merely hypothetical, and the law arising on it an abstract question. As the court, however, not only overruled the instruction asked, but proceeded to give an instruction, it is a reasonable implication that there was evidence tending to prove the case, and therefore the rectitude of the judgment on the instruction overruled, and on that given, is proper for enquiry in the appellate court. As before stated, the court erred in overruling the instruction sought. The case stated, to which the instruction given was applied, differs from that on which the instruction was asked; and if such case had been made out by the proof, the instruction *was wrong in this, that though the case so stated might create a temporary partnership until election, it was limited to the sale of the goods furnished, and to the profits thereof, and did not extend to purchases and sales of other goods; and the dissolution of such partnership was effectual in respect to all who may have had actual notice, though such notice may not have been given to the world, or even publicly.

The addition to the instructions, which is the subject of the fifth exception, was not error, if it be understood that the representing themselves and acting as partners by Chapman & Beirne, mentioned in that addition, had relation to an existing and continuing partnership for the sale and purchase of goods, or to a partnership generally, without express qualification or limitation as to the subject or the continuance thereof.

It does not however appear with sufficient clearness, that the said addition was, or was intended to be so understood; and for that reason the addition was error.

The judgment ought to be reversed with costs, the verdict set aside, and a new trial awarded, on which the principles herein declared in respect to the admission and rejection of evidence, and the instructions to the jury on the law of the case, are to govern, should occasions occur on the new trial for their application, and the court be asked to apply them.

Equity Jurisdiction—Mistake—Conveyance of Land.*

Sale is made of land embraced by a deed under which the vendor claims, but by mistake the conveyance from the vendor embraces some land not conveyed by that deed, and omits some comprised in it. On a bill by the vendee against the administrator and heirs of the vendor, HELD, equity will correct the mistake, by directing a

Courts of equity have jurisdiction to render decrees for the value of the deficiency in the quantity of land sold by the acre. The basis of this jurisdiction is either mutual mistake, or the mistake of one party occasioned by the fraud or culpable negligence of the other. Hull v. Watts, 95 Va. 12, 27 S. E. Rep. 829, citing the principal case.

cases of excess and deficiency in the estimated quantity upon the sale of lands, is where there is a mistake, whether the mutual mistake of the parties, or the mistake of one of them, occasioned by the fraud or culpable negligence of the other. The general rule is that an estimate of the quantity by the parties, whether in a contract executed or a contract executory, ought to be taken prima facie to have influenced the price. Nichols v. Beatty, 1 Rob. 304, JUDGE BALDWIN reviewed all the prior decisions of this court upon the subject in hand; and the principle deduced therefrom was, that courts of equity entertain jurisdiction and grant relief upon the ground of mistake, and this whether the sale was at a specified price per acre, or a sale of a tract supposed by both parties to contain a definite number of acres, for an aggregate sum or gross price, and that if, in either case, there was a mistake as to the quantity, equity will give relief, with compensation for the excess or deficiency, as the case may be; but that the right to relief, otherwise clear, may be excluded by a stipulation at the time of the sale, that the estimated quantity shall, in any event, be taken as the actual quantity—the parties thus making a contract of hazard."

Same—Rule When Purchase Money Paid.—It was said in Kelly v. Riley, 22 W. Va. 249, citing the principal case, that if equity has jurisdiction in the case of a deficiency in quantity of land, the sale being by the acre, to enjoin the collection of purchase money after conveyance executed, it would seem to be clear that it ought to grant relief when the purchase money has been paid as no objection to its jurisdiction could be urged in the one case which would not equally apply to the other.

+Sale by Acre or by Tract of Land.—A question frequently arises as to whether a sale is by the acre or is of a tract of land, the acreage being merely for description and not determining the amount of the price. The question is largely one of intention. Jolliffe v. Hite, 1 Call 262; Keyton v. Brawford, 5 in case of excess, or to vendee in case of deficiency in the estimated quantity of land, examined by BALDWIN, J.

Same—Estimate of Quantity by Parties—"More or Less."—An estimate by the parties of the quantity of land sold, whether in a contract executed or in

Leigh 39; Weaver v. Carter, 10 Leigh 45; Norfolk Trust Co. v. Foster, 78 Va. 419. In this latter case the court said: "Whether a contract of sale is one of hazard as to quantity—in other words, whether it is a contract for the sale of a certain tract of land, whatever number of acres it may contain, or of a specified quantity—depends upon the intention of the contracting parties, to be gathered from the terms of the contract, and all the facts and circumstances connected with it. And while contracts of hazard in such cases are not invalid, courts of equity do not regard them with favor. The presumption is against them, and can be repelled only by clear and cogent proof. Consequently, a contract will be construed to be a contract by the acre whenever it does not clearly appear that the land was sold by the tract, and not by the acre. And so, where the contract is for the payment of a gross sum for a tract of land, upon an estimate of a given quantity, the presumption is that the quantity influences the price to be paid, and that the agreement is not one of hazard. These propositions have been affirmed by this court in numerous cases. Keyton v. Brawford, 5 Leigh 39; Blessing v. Beatty, 1 Rob. Rep. 304; Triplett v. Allen, 26 Gratt. 721; Watson v. Hoy, 28 Gratt. 698; Yost v. Geisler, 7 Va. L. J. 624."

The principal case is cited in this connection in Watson v. Hoy, 28 Gratt. 704, 705; Boschen v. Jurgens, 92 Va. 759, 24 S. E. Rep. 390; Graham v. Larmer, 87 Va. 233, 12 S. E. Rep. 389. See foot-note to Triplett v. Allen, 26 Gratt. 721, and foot-note to Caldwell v. Craig, 21 Gratt. 132.

‡"More or Less"—Effect on Purchaser.—When the real contract is to sell a tract of land for so many acres as it may contain, more or less, fully understood to be so, the purchaser takes the tract at the risk of gain or loss, by deficiency or excess. Tucker v. Cocke, 2 Rand. 51; Russell v. Keeran, 8 Leigh 9; Pendleton v. Stewart, 5 Call 1; Hull v. Cunningham, 1 Munf. 330; Weaver v. Carter, 10 Leigh 37; Grantland v. Wight, 2 Munf. 179; Caldwell v. Craig, 21 Gratt. 132; Allen v. Shriver, 81 Va. 174; Jolliffe v. Hite, 1 Call 301, 1 Am. Dec. 579; Pratt v. Bowman, 37 W. Va. 715, 17 S. E. Rep. 210; Depue v. Sergeant, 21 W. Va. 326; Anderson v. Snyder, 21 W. Va. 633.

But in Jolliffe v. Hite, 1 Call 329, where the principles applicable to this subject were discussed, it was decided that wherever the primary contract is for a sale by the acre, though it be carried into execution by a deed conveying a certain quantity, more or less, the vendee is not precluded from claiming for deficiency, nor the vendee for excess.

Same—Sale in Gross or by Acre.—A sale of a tract of land, described by metes and bounds as containing a certain number of acres, "more or less," is a sale in gross and not by the acre, though the price named be an exact multiple of the number of acres named. Depue v. Sergeant, 21 W. Va. 326; Anderson v. Snyder, 21 W. Va. 633; Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 438; Pratt v. Bowman, 37 W. Va. 715, 17 S. E. Rep. 210; Weaver v. Carter, 10 Leigh 39; Russell v. Keeran, 8 Leigh 9; Hull v. Cunningham, 1 Munf. 330; Pendleton v. Stewart, 5 Call 1, 2 Am. Dec. 583; Benson v. Humphreys, 75 Va. 196. The principal case is cited a contract executory, ought to be taken prima facie to have influenced the price. Therefore where a sale was made, for 2000 dollars, of a tract of land, which, in the articles of sale and in the deed of conveyance, was mentioned as "containing 280 acres," without the addition of the customary in this connection in Crawford v. M'Daniel, 1 Rob. 458.

Virginia Case Disapproved.—The case of Benson v. Humphreys, 75 Va. 196, is disapproved in Depue v. Sergeant, 21 W. Va. 327. The court said: "It is true that where the words 'more or less' were not added to the description of the quantity of the land, the court of appeals of Virginia in the case of Benson v. Humphreys, Law Journ. April, 1881, did hold, where the price was an exact multiple of the quantity, though it was not stated exactly but was qualified by the addition of the words 'more or less,' yet, that this was still a contract of sale by the acre. But this case met the express and decided disapproval of our court, in Crislip, Guardian, v. Cain, 19 W. Va. pp. 551 and 552. It is entirely unsustained by reason or authority in Virginia or elsewhere."

Distinction between Sale in Gross and by the Acre.—The distinction pointed out in Pendleton v. Stewart, 5 Call 1, 2 Am. Dec. 583, between a sale in gross and by the acre is as follows: Where the sale is by the acre for a stipulated number of acres, the words "more or less" will cover only very small errors, such as might reasonably be imputed to the variation of instruments or other similar causes; but if it is a sale in gross and it is fully understood that the contract is to sell a tract of land, as it may contain more or less, both parties are presumed to take the risks of the excess or deficiency in the quantity.

An agreement to sell land contained within specified boundaries, supposed to be a certain number of acres, at a fixed price per acre, is a sale by the acre, and not in gross. Carter v. Campbell, Gilm. 159.

Same—Same—Rights of Vendee.—It was held in Keyton v. Brawford, 5 Leigh 39, that a vendee of land, in a sale by the acre, is entitled to an abatement from the purchase money, in case of a deficiency of quantity; but in a sale of land in gross, a contract of hazard on both sides, the vendee is not entitled to relief, in case of deficiency; and whether the sale be a sale by the acre, or a sale in gross, is a question of intention of the parties to the contract, to be collected from all the circumstances of the transaction.

Payment of Gross Sum upon Estimate of Given Quantity.—The principal case is cited in Watson v. Hoy, 28 Gratt. 698, and Camp v. Norfleet, 83 Va. 382, 5 S. E. Rep. 374, to the point that where the parties contract for the payment of a gross sum for a tract or parcel of land upon an estimate of a given quantity, the presumption is that the quantity influences the price to be paid, and that the agreement is not one of hazard. See Grayson v. Buchanan, 88 Va. 251, 13 S. E. Rep. 457.

As Estimated—As Supposed.—The words "more or less," are not construed to mean "as estimated," "as supposed," but are construed to mean "about" the specified number of acres, and are considered or designated to cover only such small errors of surveying as usually occur in surveys. Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 442. See also, Benson v. Humphreys, 75 Va. 196; Anderson v. Snyder, 21 W. Va. 647.

Warranted That Thing Sold Will Correspond to Representation.—A warranty tacitly annexed to every contract, that things bought or sold shall correwords "more or less," and the tract proved to contain only 253 acres, it was considered that although the purchase money was not an equimultiple of the number of acres, yet the presumption was spond with the representation made of it, at the time of concluding the contract between the parties, is neither waived nor destroyed by the insertion of the words "more or less," in a contract for the sale of land by a specified number of acres, if an error beyond what may reasonably be imputed to the variation of instruments, or other similar causes, be afterwards discovered. Jolliffe v. Hite, 1 Call 301, 1 Am. Dec. 519; Pendleton v. Stewart, 5 Call 5; opinion of TUCKER, J., Caldwell v. Craig, 21 Gratt. 137.

Contract of Hazard.—A sale in gross, when applied to the thing sold, means a sale by the tract, without regard to quantity, and in that sense is ex vi termini a contract of hazard. Shoemaker v. Cake, 83 Va. 1, 1 S. E. Rep. 387; Russell v. Keeran, 8 Leigh 9; Yost v. Mallicote, 77 Va. 616.

Material and Immaterial Differences—Immaterial Differences.—Where the contract is for a tract or parcel of land in gross, without reference to its quantity, whatever the deficiency, no allowance is made to either party, even where the deficiency is great. Thus, in the case of Tucker v. Cocke, 2 Rand. 51, the deficiency was a thousand acres. In Russell v. Keeran, 8 Leigh 9, the deficiency amounted to one hundred acres in a tract of four or five hundred acres.

In Caldwell v. Craig, 21 Gratt. 132, there was a deficiency of two hundred acres in a conveyance of one thousand acres, more or less, for a consideration of six thousand five hundred dollars. See also, Graham v. Larmer, 87 Va. 222, 12 S. E. Rep. 389.

If a tract of land be sold for 1100 acres more or less at a fixed price, and it turns out that it is less, the purchaser will not be relieved in equity. Pendleton v. Stewart, 5 Call 1, 2 Am. Dec. 583.

A deficiency of eight acres in a tract of 552 acres, is no more than a purchaser who buys for more or less may reasonably expect. Nelson v. Matthews, 2 H. & M. 164, 3 Am. Dec. 620.

Material Differences.—But ten acres, in a tract of 100 acres, is not one of these small deficiencies to be covered by the phrase "more or less." Triplett v. Allen, 26 Gratt. 731. Nor a deficiency of one hundred and ninety-two acres in a conveyance of eight hundred acres, more or less. Quesnel v. Woodlief, 6 Call 230, opinion of JUDGE LYONS.

Quantity Considerably Less—The principal case is cited in Walsh v. Hale, 26 Gratt. 317, to the point that a purchaser, if the quantity be considerably less than was stated, will be entitled to an abatement, although the agreement contain the words "more or less."

Sale of Five Hundred and Three Acres, Deficiency, Thirty-Four Acres.—In a sale of lands described in the deed as containing five hundred and three acres, the presumption is that the specified number of acres was intended, and if there is a considerable deficiency—here thirty-four acres—the purchaser is entitled to an abatement of price. Watson v. Hoy, 26 Gratt. 698, and note. See foot-note to Caldwell v. Craig, 21 Gratt. 132.

Fraud or False Representation.—Although the sale be in gross, and not by the acre, if the vendor, to induce the vendee to purchase, falsely represents to him that the land contains a specified number of acres, or that number "more or less," and the vendee, relying on the truth of such representation, against the contract being one of hazard, and the vendor was held liable for the deficiency; dissentiente STANARD, J.

Same—Rule of Compensation.—Where, at the time of the sale of a tract of land, it is estimated that there is a certain number of acres within the boundaries by which the tract is conveyed, and it afterwards appears that the vendee is entitled to be compensated for a deficiency in the quantity, the rule of compensation will generally be according to the average value of the whole tract. Appellate Practice—Costs—Administrator—Amendment of Decree.—In the court below, there having is thereby induced to purchase the same as containing about that number of acres, at a price he would not otherwise have given for it, such representation even if innocently made, may amount to an implied warranty of the number of acres, and the vendor may be compelled to account to the vendee for a deficiency in the number of acres. Anderson v. Snyder, 21 W. Va. 633; Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 438; Sine v. Fox, 33 W. Va. 521, 11 S. E. Rep. 218; Kelly v. Riley, 22 W. Va. 247; Boggs v. Harper, 45 W. Va. 554, 31 S. E. Rep. 943; Allen v. Shriver, 81 Va. 174.

Failure to Disclose Quantity of Land Sold.—If the contract be for 900 acres, more or less, and the tract be found to contain only 765 acres, the purchaser will be relieved, if it appear, that the seller knew of the deficiency at the time of the sale, but did not disclose it. Bedford v. Hickman, 5 Call 236, 2 Am. Dec. 590. To the same effect, see Anthony v. Oldacre, 4 Call 489; Nelson v. Matthews, 2 H. & M. 164, 2 Am. Dec. 620.

Though land be sold in gross, for so much, be it more or less, yet, if it be evident that both parties were mistaken in a material point, as to the lines by which the vendor held, and there was no express agreement on the part of the purchaser to take the risk upon himself, a court of equity will give relief for a deficiency. Hull v. Cunningham, 1 Munf. 330.

Rule of Compensation Stated.—The rule of compensation or abatement in case of an excess or deficiency in the quantity of land sold is according to the average value per acre of the whole tract, unless particular circumstances require a departure from that rule. Watson v. Hoy, 26 Gratt. 698, citing the principal case, and Hoback v. Kilgore, 26 Gratt. 442; Triplett v. Allen, 26 Gratt. 721; Nelson v. Matthews, 2 H. & M. 164, 178; Nelson v. Carrington, 4 Munf. 332, 340; Hundley v. Lyons, 5 Munf. 342.

The principal case is cited for this proposition in Yost v. Mallicote, 77 Va. 615, 617; Hoback v. Kilgore, 26 Gratt. 442; Sergeant v. Linkous, 83 Va. 667, 3 S. E. Rep. 295; Trinkle v. Jackson, 86 Va. 241, 9 S. E. Rep. 986; Caldwell v. Craig, 21 Gratt. 139. See foot-note to Hoback v. Kilgore, 26 Gratt. 442.

Same.—The general rule in the case of an abatement on account of deficiency in the quantity of land sold, is to allow for the deficiency the average price of the whole land. Depue v. Sergeant, 21 W. Va. 345, citing the principal case, and Hull v. Cunningham, 1 Munf. 330; Nelson v. Matthews, 2 H. & M. 164; Lowther v. Com., 1 H. & M. 202; Crawford v. McDaniel, 1 Rob. 448; Nichols v. Cooper, 2 W. Va. 347; Stockton v. Union Oil & Coal Co., 4 W. Va. 278. See also, Kelly v. Riley, 22 W. Va. 247; Boggs v. Harper, 45 W. Va. 554, 31 S. E. Appellate Practice—Decreeing Costs of Appeal to Appellee.—The principal case is cited in Marks v.

been a clerical misprision in decreeing jointly against two defendants as administrators of a decedent, when the pleadings indicated that one of them was sole administrator, and the decree for costs having through oversight been entered against him, as well as against certain heirs of the deceased, de bonis propriis, the appellate court amended the decree in these particulars. The appellate court being farther of opinion that what was declared in the decree would, by necessary implication, relieve the heirs from responsibility for *certain land, but that it would have been more regular to direct a release of that land, decreed such release accordingly. And the decree, being thus amended, was thereupon affirmed.

By deed bearing date the 5th of January 1816, between William Poston and Charles Tate of the one part and Jacob Blessing of the other part, it was recited that Poston and Tate, by virtue of a decree of the superior court of chancery holden at Staunton in July 1808, in a case therein depending between Jacob Blessing plaintiff and Arthur Campbell defendant, had sold to Blessing "a certain tract or parcel of land with the appurtenances, lying in Washington county on the middle fork of Holston and Mill creek, containing 280 acres," and that the court afterwards confirmed the sale and ordered the commissioners to convey the said land to Blessing; and when the deed witnessed that Poston and Tate, the commissioners aforesaid, conveyed to Blessing the said tract or parcel of land with the appurtenances; but the deed, instead of stopping there, proceeded to describe the said tract or parcel of land as bounded by particular metes and bounds set forth therein.

On the 6th of September 1828, articles of agreement were entered into between Blessing and Robert Beatty, which witnessed that Blessing had sold to Beatty "a certain tract or parcel of land containing 280 acres, called Staley creek place, lying and being in the county of Washington and state of Virginia, and on both sides of the main road, adjoining the lands of John Townsend, the heirs of John Irons deceased, the heirs of Robert Thompson deceased, Wyatt M'Ghees and Augustine M'Ghees." Beatty, on his part, bound himself to pay to Blessing 2000 dollars, to be paid in the manner set forth in the articles.

By deed bearing date the 5th of January 1830, Blessing and wife, for the consideration of 2000 dollars, conveyed to Beatty the said tract or parcel of land, describing it as "lying and being in the county of Washington *and state of Virginia, and on both sides of the middle fork of Holston river, also on a creek called Staley's creek, containing 280 acres, adjoining the lands of John Irons deceased and others, and bounded as followeth, to wit:" (after which, particular metes and bounds were set forth). The deed contained a covenant that Blessing and his heirs would warrant and defend the right and title "to the above described premises," to Beatty and his heirs, free and clear from the claim or claims of any person or persons whatever.

After the death of Blessing, to wit, on the 24th of October 1834, a suit in equity was brought by Beatty against the administrator and heirs of Blessing, in the circuit court of Smyth county. The bill set forth, that since Blessing's death the plaintiff had discovered that the boundaries by which the land was conveyed by Blessing to him do not contain 280 acres, and that of the land included in the said boundaries there is between 15 and 30 acres to which Blessing had no title. And then the bill proceeded to explain how this arose. It stated, that the tract of land conveyed by Blessing to the plaintiff as containing 280 acres was mortgaged by a certain Arthur Campbell to Blessing; that under this mortgage it was decreed to be sold, and was sold by Poston and Tate as commissioners, and Blessing the mortgagee became the purchaser thereof; that in the conveyance to Blessing, the commissioners included land which was not included in the mortgage, and that in this way Blessing was probably led into the error of attempting to convey to the plaintiff land to which he had no valid claim. The bill prayed that a survey might be directed, to ascertain the deficiency in the land conveyed by Blessing to the plaintiff, and that for this deficiency satisfaction might be decreed the plaintiff out of Blessing's estate.

The administrator of Blessing, after excepting to the jurisdiction of equity, answered, that he knew nothing *of the terms of the contract between Blessing and Beatty. He did not know whether Beatty purchased the land by the quantity, or in gross; and he called upon the plaintiff to shew what the contract was. He did not know that there were not 280 acres contained in the tract mentioned in the bill, nor that Blessing had conveyed any land to the plaintiff to which he had not right; and he called for proof. Blessing, he said, had put the plaintiff into possession of the land contained in the deed, and the plaintiff had never been evicted; and if he had voluntarily surrendered possession of it to others, it was his fault,—a fault for which Blessing's estate was not liable. At all events, he insisted, the plaintiff should have brought a suit at law upon the warranty, and not resorted to a court of equity for relief.

Some of the defendants were out of the commonwealth, and the cause was proceeded in against them by publication. Some were infants, and answered by guardian ad litem.

Under an order of survey made in the cause, the surveyor of the county returned a plat and report; but the report was deficient in clearness. The deposition of the surveyor was taken, which stated, that he ran the lines agreeably to the courses of the mortgage given by Campbell to Blessing; "or rather, running to the corners, where they could be found, and where not found, according to the courses and distances of said mortgage;" and found the tract of land to contain 253 acres. In answer to a question of the plaintiff's counsel, he stated that he had compared the courses of the mortgage with the courses of the deed made by Blessing to Beatty, and found them to differ, the deed last mentioned including some land that the mortgage would not cover; to wit, land on the south side of the main road, in the possession of James P. Strother. Other depositions were taken, but it is not material to state the purport of them.

291 *The cause coming on to be heard the 3d of May 1839, the following opinion and decree were entered: "The court, not being able from the evidence before it to perceive the extent of relief to be decreed to the complainant, supposes the difficulty may be removed by an additional report of the surveyor on the survey already made, or by making another survey and report; and perceiving that the probable relief to be granted will be a correction of the conveyance from Blessing to the complainant, so as to conform it to the deed of conveyance from the commissioners Poston and Tate to Blessing, under which Blessing held said land, and which (by mistake, as is believed) was departed from in the conveyance from Blessing to the complainant, so as to leave out some of the lands held by him under said deed, and to include others not conveyed to him; and then, by ascertaining the deficiency, to compensate the complainant therefor, leaving him to action at law upon his warranty for compensation for eviction of any portion thereof of which he does not now complain: therefore it is adjudged, decreed and ordered that the said surveyor so amend his report, if it can be one without a farther survey, as to shew how much land is contained in the tract in the bill mentioned, surveyed according to the lines of the conveyance made by the said commissioners Tate and Poston to Jacob Blessing, and also to shew the amount of acres included in Blessing's conveyance to the complainant; also to shew the number of acres included in the latter and not embraced by the former, and how much of the former is left out in the latter; reporting also whether or not he finds marked trees and corners on the lines surveyed by him: and if he cannot do so in the survey by him now reported, that he again go upon the land in controversy, and survey and lay off the same."

The surveyor made an additional report, setting forth the boundaries called for in the mortgage from Campbell

292 *to Blessing, and the boundaries called for in the deed from the commissioners Poston and Tate to Blessing, and specifying wherein the two deeds corresponded and wherein they differed, and accounting for the variations between the two. The principal difference was the omission in the latter deed of one course and distance specified in the former. The surveyor supposed that a mistake was committed in copying the courses of the one deed into the other. There were, he said, two white oak corners following in succession, and he supposed that the copyist, after writing the words "white oak," overlooked the description of the first corner and passed to the description of the second. This supposition, he said, was strengthened by the fact that thenceforward the lines of the commissioners' deed pursued the calls of the mortgage, except that one course in the mortgage was S. 71 E. whilst the course of the correspondent line in the other deed was S. 21 E. which was a mistake that might readily happen with a negligent copyist, the words twenty and seventy, when written, being often mistaken for each other. The surveyor had no doubt that the commissioners intended to convey to Blessing according to the boundaries of the mortgage. This opinion, he said, was confirmed by the fact that the plat made from the courses of the mortgage closed accurately, whilst the plat according to the lines of the commissioners' deed failed to close, by a difference of 11 degrees in course, and a deficiency of 90 poles in distance.

It seemed to the surveyor that the deed from Blessing to Beatty was made upon actual survey, and that the surveyor who made that survey went by the calls of the commissioners' deed (making some corrections in course and distance) until he reached two white oaks at one of the corners described in the mortgage deed, after which he left entirely the courses both of the mortgage and of the deed from the 293 commissioners, and *struck out a new course for himself. This error was committed in attempting to run with the surrounding lands of Robert Thompson's heirs and Wyatt M'Ghees, mentioned in the deed from Blessing to Beatty.

The surveyor reported that the quantity of land conveyed by the mortgage deed, according to his survey thereof as actually run by marked boundaries, when found, and by courses and distances taken from the mortgage deed, when corners were gone, was 253 acres; so that the quantity of land embraced in the mortgage deed was less by 27 acres than the quantity for which Beatty contracted. He further reported that the deed from Blessing to Beatty embraced 231.5 acres of land not contained in the mortgage deed, and left out 8 acres included in it.

The cause came on to be finally heard the 7th of May 1840. The circuit court, being of opinion that an error was committed in the conveyance from Blessing to Beatty by departing from the mortgage deed, and being satisfied that the sale from Blessing to Beatty was intended to include all the lands within the bounds of the mortgage, to which Blessing had, as mortgagee, the legal title, and that the boundaries thereof were departed from by mistake, decreed that the heirs of Blessing, or, in case of their failure, a commissioner appointed for the purpose, should convey to the complainant the land embraced by the mortgage deed, according to the calls thereof. And it appearing by the report of the surveyor, that the quantity of land embraced within the mortgage was only 253 acres, and it also appearing (as the court thought) by the original contract, that Blessing contracted to sell to the complainant 280 acres, and the average price paid for said land per acre being 7 dollars 14 cents, at which price the 27 acres deficient would amount to 192 dollars 78 cents, the court therefore decreed that the administrators of Blessing, out of his estate, pay to the complainant 294 *the said sum of 192 dollars 78 cents, with interest thereon from the 6th of September 1830 (when the last payment of the purchase money fell due) till paid; and that the complainant recover against the defendants his costs.

Although Arthur M. Bowen was the only person sued as administrator of Jacob Blessing deceased, and his son Jacob Blessing was no otherwise a defendant than as one of the heirs of the deceased, yet the decree was against both Arthur M. Bowen and Jacob Blessing as administrators.

On their petition, an appeal was allowed from the decree.

The cause was argued in writing by M'Comas and B. R. Johnston for the appellants, and by Sheffey for the appellee.

I. It was contended for the appellants, that the sale of the land was not by the acre, but in gross. Where the contract is not explicit, they argued, the question whether it is of the one character or the other, depends upon the particular circumstances of the case. The insertion or omission of the terms more or less is immaterial. In the case of Keytons v. Brawfords, 5 Leigh 39, the land was mentioned in the deed as containing a specified number of acres; but the court considered that this was merely descriptive of the tract of land, and could not be referred to the clause of warranty, so as to bind the party to make good a deficiency. The sale was held to be in gross, and the circumstance that the purchase money was not an equimultiple of the number of acres was strongly relied on. That circumstance equally exists here. The price per acre in this case, if it were considered to be by the acre, would be 7 dollars 14 cents and eight twenty-eighths part of a cent. The deficiency, moreover, is not excessive. Under the authority of Keytons v. Brawfords, no allowance should be made for it.

295 *For the appellee, it was contended to be a general principle of equity, that for deficiencies relief will be granted. Only in peculiar cases will that relief be refused. From the cases on the subject, this rule is fairly to be deduced: that where it can clearly be shewn by the vendor that the parties understood and expressly agreed that the one should risk the loss of a surplus and the other of a deficiency, let the quantity be what it might, no relief will be granted; but where the parties did not contemplate a deficiency, or expressly contract with reference to risk as to quantity, and there turns out to be a deficiency, there equity will relieve. Jolliffe &c. v. Hite &c., 1 Call 329; Hull v. Cunningham's ex'or, 1 Munf. 330; Nelson v. Carrington & others, 4 Munf. 332. Is it shewn by the appellants that such was the express contract and understanding of the parties? What evidence is there that a deficiency was contemplated, or made the subject of a contract? It does not appear by the contract, nor by the deed of conveyance. Not even the usual words 'more or less' are used; and if they were used, they would not be conclusive. Who shews that Beatty expressly took upon himself the risk of a deficiency? No one. There is no principle of equity, then, which will throw upon him the loss. The only circumstance that can be relied upon to make the contract a sale in gross, is, that the average price per acre is not an even one. In Keytons v. Brawfords, this circumstance was expressly held not to be sufficient by itself. There were other strong circumstances in connexion with that; and from the whole the court inferred that the sale was a sale in gross.

II. It was contended for the appellants, that the case was not proper for the interference of equity. In Long's ex'or &c. v. Israel &c., 9 Leigh 556, it is decided, that while equity will interfere by way of injunction to restrain the collection of purchase money, where a defect of title is alleged by the vendee, yet it is only 296 in that *mode that it will take jurisdiction; and that where the purchase money has been paid, and there is a mere covenant of general warranty, as in this case, the party will be left to his action at law, which only accrues when there has been eviction by paramount title. Though the facts in that case were stronger than in this, the party was left to his remedy at law. No compensation was allowed for land which, upon the proof, was covered by an elder and better title. In the case at bar, it appears that the appellee was put in possession under Blessing's deed, and the bill sets forth no complaint of eviction. But if equity interfere, it should only allow for so much as the land embraced in the deed from Blessing to Beatty falls short of 280 acres.

For the appellee it was said, that though the allowance for deficiency would be ascertained by the deed from Blessing to Beatty if that deed was correct, yet as there was a mistake in that deed, it was right to correct the mistake. The case of Long's ex'or v. Israel &c. was an authority in support of the decree in this respect. Blessing having contracted to sell, and Beatty to buy, according to the mortgage deed, it was proper to give compensation for the deficiency ascertained by running the lines according to that deed.

III. It was contended that the allowance per acre for the deficiency was too high.

The counsel for the appellee relied upon Nelson v. Matthews &c., 2 Hen. & Munf.

164, and Nelson v. Carrington & others, 4 Munf. 332, as sustaining the allowance, which was of the average value of the whole tract.

For the appellants, it was said, that where there is a mere defect of quantity (the boundaries of the deed not including the full number of acres), the only rational and attainable standard of damages is the average value per acre; but that where, on the contrary, land is included within the boundaries which is lost by defect of title, the land itself is subject to view and 297 *valuation, and no more damages will be given than the actual value of that very portion lost.

IV. It was insisted, that no correction could be made according to the mortgage deed, without making the heirs of Campbell parties. The counsel for the appellee answered, that all the interest of Campbell had been parted with by the mortgage, the sale under it, and the purchase by Blessing at that sale.

V. It was contended that the decree was clearly erroneous in decreeing against Jacob Blessing as administrator, when he was not sued in that character.

For the appellee it was said, that this, though erroneous, was an error without an injury. Blessing was not directed to pay out of his own funds, but out of the estate of the decedent. Having in his hands no estate of the decedent, he incurs no contempt by not performing the decree of the court, and his rights are no way affected. The burthen must fall upon the assets in the hands of Bowen the true administrator, and the associating another's name erroneously with his neither lessens his obligation to pay, nor renders the payment by him more difficult.

The counsel for the appellants replied that the decree as to Blessing was not so harmless as was supposed. For, while it remained unreversed, it fixed conclusively that there were assets in his hands, though he had never had the opportunity of pleading that he had no assets.

VI. It was insisted that the decree was erroneous in giving costs jointly against the administrators and heirs, and giving them, as against the administrators, de bonis propriis. Long's ex'or &c. v. Israel &c., 9 Leigh 556.

The counsel for the appellee said, he did not understand the decree as making Bowen individually liable; and Blessing stood on the same footing with his coheirs.

BALDWIN, J. I am well satisfied, from all the circumstances of the case, that 298 it was the intention of *Blessing to sell, and of Beatty to purchase, the land embraced by the mortgage deed, according to the true boundaries, whatever those might be, and adopting the estimate of quantity expressed in that deed, to wit, 280 acres; but that a mistake occurred in relation to the boundaries, occasioned by errors in the deed from the commissioners to Blessing, and an unfortunate attempt to correct those errors without resorting to the calls of the mortgage deed. The consequence has been that the deed from Blessing to Beatty embraces some land not conveyed by the mortgage deed, to which Blessing had no colour of title, and omits some comprised in that deed, to which there does not appear to have been any adverse claim. The decree of the circuit court very properly corrected the mistake, by directing a conveyance from the heirs of Blessing according to the calls of the mortgage deed. The corrected boundaries contain only 253 acres, shewing a deficiency of 27 acres: and the questions presented for our consideration upon merits are, whether compensation ought to be made for that deficiency, and if so, what should be the measure of compensation?

The principle upon which equity gives relief in cases of deficiency or excess in the estimated quantity upon the sale of lands, I understand to be that of mistake; whether the mutual mistake of the parties, or the mistake of one of them, occasioned by the fraud or culpable negligence of the other. I do not perceive any other principle upon which the jurisdiction can be founded; for if there has been no mistake, either in the contract itself or the execution of the contract, the parties must stand upon their legal rights, to be adjudicated and enforced in a legal forum, unless the question should arise incidentally in a court of chancery, in the exercise of some other branch of its jurisdiction. The principle was recognized in Hill v. Buckley, 17 Ves. 394, 401; Glover v. Smith, 1 Desaus. 433, and Duvals 299 v. Ross*, 2 Munf. 290. It was the expressed and sole ground of decision in Quesnel v. Woodlief. That case, though commented upon and approved in Jolliffe &c. v. Hite &c., 1 Call 301, was for some time misunderstood and questioned, 5 Call 9, 10, 2 Rand. 67, from the want of a correct report of it; (see an imperfect one in 2 Hen. & Munf. 173, note,) but it is now well and accurately reported in 6 Call 218, and its authority no longer disputed, but recognized; Bierne &c. v. Erskine, 5 Leigh 64. The cases of Nelson v. Matthews &c., 2 Hen. & Munf. 164, and Hull v. Cunningham's ex'or, 1 Munf. 330, must have been founded upon the same principle. The idea is sometimes adverted to, of a tacit warranty annexed to every contract, that the thing bought or sold shall correspond with the representation made of it at the time, 5 Call 5, but this is only another mode of suggesting the same principle, and imports nothing more than the duty of one party to correct a mistake to which he has been instrumental, committed to the prejudice of the other. In the application of the principle, it is wholly immaterial whether a deficiency arises from a miscalculation of the area within the boundaries, as in Duvals v. Ross, or the exclusion by the described boundaries of a part of the tract sold, as in Hull v. Cunningham's ex'or, or the inclusion of a part unquestionably belonging to a third person, as in one aspect of Nelson v. Matthews &c.

The cases proper for compensation on account of deficiency or excess are of three classes. The first I will mention is that of a sale by the acre, by the express terms of the contract; for example, the sale of a tract stated at 1000 acres, for the price of five dollars per acre. Here the quantity mentioned is manifestly mere matter of description, or conjectural or temporary estimate; either party having a perfect right to ascertain accurately the precise quantity by actual admeasurement; which quantity, when so correctly ascertained, 300 *gives infallibly, by the application of the stipulated price per acre, the exact amount of the purchase money. But if the parties, relying too much upon the estimated quantity, go on to adjust the consideration by that criterion, and it turns out that the estimate is erroneous, the mistake is undoubtedly one which must be corrected. In such a case, the mistake is not in the terms of the contract, but in the result of those terms when applied to the subject. The parties may, however, by their agreement, make the estimated quantity conclusive, by stipulating to dispense with a survey and to be governed in all events by the given estimate. This changes the sale into a contract of hazard, and necessarily excludes the interposition of equity on the ground of mistake.

A second class of cases is where the agreement or understanding of the parties is for a sale at a stipulated price per acre, but instead of stating those terms in the contract, they express, as the consideration, the result of a calculation based upon an erroneous estimate of the quantity. Here the mistake is in the terms of the contract, a gross sum having been adopted under the belief of its being the aggregate of the agreed price per acre. In such cases, also, the right to relief, otherwise clear, may be excluded by a stipulation that the estimated shall in any state of facts be taken as the actual quantity; the parties thus contracting for an anticipated hazard.

The third class of cases is where the parties contract for the payment of a gross sum for a tract or parcel, upon an estimate of a given quantity, which influences the price agreed to be paid. Here there is no mistake in the terms of the contract, nor in the application of those terms to the subject, but in an important element of the contract, which, if correctly understood at the time, would in all probability have prevented the contract from being made, or have varied its terms.

301 That *such cases require relief in equity, is well established; Hill v. Buckley, Glover v. Smith, Quesnel v. Woodlief, and Duvals v. Ross, above cited; to which may be added Bierne &c. v. Erskine, 5 Leigh 59, and the authorities cited by judge Lyons in 1 Call 316. The proper relief is to set aside the contract, or to give a just compensation, such as will place the parties in the same relative situation in which they would probably have placed themselves, if the true state of the fact had been known when they made their agreement. In this, however, as in the other classes of cases, the relief being founded upon a mistake unprovided for, it is repelled by shewing that it was anticipated as probable, and provided for by an agreement that the contingency should be a matter of hazard.

This is briefly my view of what I consider the correct doctrine on this subject; over which it is true there is some obscurity, attributable, as I conceive, not so much to a difference of opinion in regard to the principles, as to an occasional want of accuracy and precision in the terms employed to express them; which has arisen in a great measure out of the use of the same words in different senses. Thus the word "gross" is applicable as well to the price as the thing sold, and "a sale by the acre" has reference to both. But we must bear in mind that upon the question of compensation, the substantial distinction is between a sale that is a contract of hazard, and one that is not. When "a sale in gross" is used as equivalent to a contract of hazard, the term is properly applicable not to the price but to the subject: for a sale by the acre may be a contract of hazard, and a sale for a gross sum may not. A sale in gross, when applied to the thing sold, means a sale by the tract without regard to quantity; and in that sense is (as was said by judge Cabell in Russell &c. v. Keeran &c., 8 Leigh 19,) ex vi termini a contract of hazard. In that sense, however, the distinction sometimes taken 302 between *a sale in gross and a sale by the acre is too narrow; inasmuch as, though a sale in gross, thus understood, is a contract of hazard, a sale by the acre may be so too: and this want of comprehensiveness in the distinction is apt to beget a confusion of ideas, and lead us into error. Thus, when a sale for a gross sum is spoken of as a sale by the acre, because the quantity is not hazarded, two distinct classes of cases are confounded, and the absence of a provision regulating the price in the event of deficiency or excess, substituted for an express provision which does regulate it; in other words, a mistake of the parties as quantity, not provided for by the terms of the contract, is treated as identical with one which is provided for by the terms of the contract: for a sale at a given sum per acre carries out the intention of the parties, whether they are correct or mistaken in their estimate of the quantity; whereas a sale for a gross sum effectuates their intention, only where they are correct, and not where they are incorrect, as to the quantity. The inadequacy of the distinction tends to obscure the doctrine, and lead us away from the true ground of relief (the mistake of the parties) into delusive speculations as to the specific character of the contract. For example, where a given sum per acre is not an even quotient of the gross price stipulated, it cannot, as has been sometimes supposed, serve to show that the sale is a sale in gross (understood as a contract of hazard), inasmuch as it may well have happened, not merely that there was no sale by the acre, but no estimate of the price per acre which the gross sum would give, and yet the gross price may have been influenced by the supposed quantity, by enhancing or diminishing the value according to an aggregate and not a distributive estimate.

The question of compensation usually arises (for reasons already suggested) not in sales by the acre, but in sales for a gross sum. In the latter cases, the enquiry 303 *to be made in the first place is, whether the parties made a mistaken estimate of the quantity, which influenced the price; and then, whether, notwithstanding such mistaken estimate, they have waived the right to compensation, by an agreement of hazard. In the absence of all direct evidence, the safest general rule, I think, is, that an estimate of the quantity by the parties, whether in a contract executed or a contract executory, ought to be taken prima facie to have influenced the price; for quantity is usually an important element of the agreement, and can hardly be supposed to have been disregarded by the parties, or to have been unmeaningly stated by them in a solemn contract. As a mere matter of description in a conveyance, it is for the most part useless; and more emphatically so in an executory contract. That the statement of the quantity has not generally been regarded as a matter of indifference, is evident from the frequent introduction of the additional words "more or less," the habitual employment of which can be for no other purpose than to shew that the parties do not intend to bind themselves for the precise number of acres mentioned: and the effect which the courts have given to those words (which have been construed to cover only small deficiencies or excesses, attributable to variations of instruments and the like, and not important deviations, Quesnel v. Woodlief, 6 Call 218; Jolliffe &c. v. Hite &c., 1 Call 301), illustrates the strong leaning of the courts against the inference of a contract of hazard; a construction which has moreover been expressly declared in several cases to be one that ought not to be favoured. Hundley v. Lyons, 5 Munf. 342; Keytons v. Brawfords, 5 Leigh 48.

In the case before us, the quantity is unequivocally and expressly stated at 280 acres, in the deed of conveyance from Blessing to Beatty, without even the addition of the customary words "more or less;" and the articles of agreement between them

304 evidence a sale of *"a certain tract or parcel of land containing 280 acres, called Staley creek place." These terms, to my mind, furnish at least strong presumptive evidence against a contract of hazard; and I am aware of no circumstances in the cause, by which that presumption is rebutted. The case of Keytons v. Brawfords, 5 Leigh 39, relied on by the appellants' counsel, is not like this. There, the claim to compensation was not for a deficiency within the boundaries contemplated by the parties, but for the loss of land out of those boundaries, not intended to be sold, and which had been long held by an adverse claimant under a good title; and the deviations in the deed were from the known boundaries by which the land was sold and had been long held, the parties being misled in the description of the boundaries by erroneous title papers. Here, the deviations were from the true, but not accurately known boundaries of a correct title paper, by which the parties intended to be governed. There, the statement of the quantity in the deed was not an estimate according to the known and contemplated boundaries, but an incident of the erroneous description of the boundaries. Here, the statement of the quantity in the deed corresponds with that in the correct title paper, and must have been a mistaken estimate from the true and contemplated boundaries. These points of difference between the two cases are sufficient for my purpose; and I need not notice the various other circumstances relied on in the case cited, and not existing here, tending to shew a contract of hazard. The case of Pendleton's ex'ors v. Stewart, 5 Call 1, is more like this; but that case turned upon the effect of the words "more or less" in an executory contract, which, under the circumstances, were held to make a contract of hazard, upon the authority of Jolliffe &c. v. Hite &c., 1 Call 301, where a public sale by an executor for more or less, so distinctly understood, was held to be of 305 that character. *I do not consider the authority of Pendleton's ex'ors v. Stewart as applicable to the case before us, which is very much like, and cannot be distinguished in principle from, that of Bierne &c. v. Erskine, 5 Leigh 59, where a purchaser was compelled to make compensation for an excess, upon an executory contract for the sale, at a gross price, of a tract stated in the agreement to contain 100 acres.

For the reasons above stated, I am of opinion that the decree of the circuit court was right in holding the representatives of Blessing liable for the deficiency of 27 acres. As to the measure of compensation, I think there can be no difficulty. If the deed from Blessing to Beatty had been correct in the first instance, it would have presented the case of a mere deficiency in quantity within the boundaries of the tract conveyed; and such is the real nature of the case, after the correction of that deed according to the true boundaries. In such a case the general rule of compensation is according to the average value of the whole tract; and there are no particular circumstances here, requiring a departure from that rule.

The other objections to the decree require but little notice. There was no necessity for making the heirs of Campbell, the mortgagor, parties in the cause; he having been divested, by the mortgage and the decree of foreclosure, of all title, legal and equitable. The joint decree de bonis testatoris against Bowen and Jacob Blessing, as joint administrators with the will annexed of the vendor Blessing, for the value of the deficiency, when the pleadings indicated that Bowen was the sole administrator, is not an error of judgment, but a clerical misprision, which may yet be amended. And so the decree against the administrator Bowen, jointly with the other defendants, the heirs of Blessing, for costs de bonis propriis, was evidently not intentional, but a mere oversight, which might have been corrected, on motion, 306 *by the court in which the decree was rendered, and which is still amendable. And the declaration contained in the decree, of the true boundaries of the tract, would by necessary implication relieve the heirs of Blessing from any responsibility, upon their ancestor's warranty, for the land out of those limits, but comprised in the erroneous deed: but perhaps it would be more regular, and certainly cannot be improper, to direct a release from Beatty to the heirs of Blessing of the land thus improperly conveyed.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion to affirm the decree of the circuit court with costs, after correcting it in the points above indicated.

STANARD, J., dissented. But ALLEN, J., and CABELL, P., concurring in opinion with Baldwin, J., the decree of the court of appeals was entered in the following terms:

The court is of opinion that there is no error in the said decree from which the same ought to be reversed; but that there is a clerical misprision therein, in decreeing jointly against the appellants Bowen and Jacob Blessing, as joint administrators with the will annexed of Jacob Blessing deceased, the value of the deficiency in the tract of land in the proceedings mentioned, sold and conveyed by their ancestor to the appellee, when the pleadings indicate that the said Bowen is the sole administrator with the will annexed of said testator, and therefore that the decree for that matter ought to have been against him alone as such administrator. And the court is also of opinion that the decree against the said administrator Bowen, jointly with the other defendants, for costs de bonis propriis, was evidently not intentional, but a mere oversight, which might have been corrected on motion in the court by which said decree was rendered, and is still amendable. It is therefore considered by the court that the said decree be, and the same

307 *is hereby, amended in said particulars. And the court is further of opinion, that though the declaration in said decree, of the true boundaries of said tract of land, would by necessary implication relieve the heirs of said Jacob Blessing deceased from any responsibility, upon their ancestor's warranty, for the land out of those limits, but comprised within the erroneous deed executed by him to the appellee, yet that it would have been more regular to direct a release from the appellee, to the appellants who are the heirs of said Jacob Blessing deceased, of the land thus improperly conveyed. It is therefore considered by the court that the appellee do execute, to those of the appellants who are the heirs of said Jacob Blessing deceased, a good and sufficient deed of release for the land last mentioned. Therefore it is adjudged, ordered and decreed that the said decree, thus amended in the particulars aforesaid, be affirmed, and that the appellant Bowen out of the estate of his testator, and the other appellants out of their own estates, pay to the appellee his costs.

§Patents—Impeachment at Law—Causes Not Apparent on Face.—In Blankenpickler v. Anderson, 16 Gratt. 62, it is said: "There has been much conflict of opinion, and no little contrariety of decision upon the question how far a patent may be impeached, in an action at law, for causes not apparent on its face. The better opinion seems to be that while its validity cannot be questioned in a suit at law, but is impeachable in equity only, for causes anterior to its being issued which render it voidable merely, it may be impeached at law, for any matter which upon petition to the general court, to be forfeited and revested in the crown, was, in 1797, granted anew by patent to the holder of a land office treasury warrant, as waste and unappropriated land. HELD by the court of appeals (following the decision in Whittington &c. v. Christian &c., 2 Rand. 353.) that the patent of 1797 was void.

Caveat—Waste Lands—Construction of Statute.—The statute of May 1779, ch. 13, giving the remedy by caveat for determining the right to waste and unappropriated lands, did not extend to lands which, having been once granted by patent, had afterwards lapsed and become forfeited to the state.

Patent—Repeal of—Statute.—Case in which a patent for land was repealed in chancery, under the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 119, so far as it interfered with the rights of the complainant.

In September 1812, Reuben Norvell brought a writ of right, in the superior court of law for Amherst county, against John Camm and Betsey his wife and John Warwick and Mary his wife, for a tract of 433 acres of land lying in Amherst. By the evidence at the trial it appeared, that the land in controversy was parcel of a tract of 3926 acres, which had been granted, in September 1755, to James Christian, John Christian and William Brown. That after the death of the grantees James and John Christian, (whereby the whole land survived to Brown) Charles and John 309 Christian, sons of the grantee *John, presented a petition to the governor for the whole tract, as lapsed and forfeited for nonpayment of quit-rents. That the general court, in April 1774, gave judgment for the petitioners that the lands were forfeited and revested in the crown, and ordered it to be certified to the governor. That in October 1777, the petitioners Charles and John Christian conveyed and delivered possession of 933 acres of the land to James Grissom. That Grissom conveyed 433 acres, parcel of the 933 acres, to Thomas Powell, by deed dated the 27th of August 1787, and delivered him the possession accordingly. That Powell died in 1788, intestate; and Mrs. Camm and Mrs. Warwick were his daughters and only heirs at law. That Camm and wife and Warwick and wife, and those under whom they claimed, had been in possession, ever since the year 1774, of the land in controversy, which was the same parcel of 433 acres conveyed as aforesaid by Grissom to Powell. And that Norvell, the demandant, now claimed it under a patent issued to him, bearing date the 23d of November 1797, and founded on a land office treasury warrant. Whereupon the court gave an instruction to the jury, that, as the land had been once granted by patent in 1755, though it had been adjudged forfeited and lapsed, by the general court in 1774, and though no new patent had makes it absolutely void; as where the state has no title to the thing granted, or where the officer had no authority to issue the grant. Polk's Lessee v. Wendal, 9 Cranch 87; S. C., 5 Wheat. 293; Patterson v. Winn, 11 Wheat. 380; Whittington v. Christian, 2 Rand. 353; Warwick v. Norvell, 1 Rob. 808."

been granted to the petitioners at whose suit it was so forfeited, yet it was not waste and unappropriated land, subject to be taken up by a treasury warrant, and therefore the patent granted to Norvell in November 1797 was void. The jury, under this instruction, found a verdict for the tenants, and the court gave them judgment. On appeal therefrom by Norvell, a special court of appeals, in December 1818, held that Norvell's patent, being on its face fair and regular, could not be thus impugned collaterally and by extrinsic evidence, but only by suit in equity to set it aside, or some other proceeding having that for its 310 direct object; and that *patent must prevail, except against an elder one: therefore the judgment was reversed, and a new trial directed. See the report of the case, 6 Munf. 233.

In May 1819, Warwick and wife and Mrs. Camm (whose husband was now dead) preferred their petition to the superior court of chancery of Lynchburg, setting forth the rights under which they claimed and held the land in controversy; charging that Norvell's patent of November 1797, embracing the same, was obtained fraudulently, surreptitiously, illegally, and to the prejudice of the right of the petitioners, being granted upon the false suggestion that the land was waste and unappropriated, and while the female petitioners, who were then infants, were in the actual possession thereof, claiming title thereto in their own right: and therefore praying a writ of certiorari to the register of the land office, commanding him to certify the said patent into the court of chancery, in order that the same might be inspected and repealed. The certiorari was awarded, and a copy of Norvell's patent duly certified by the register. It was for 669½ acres of land, embracing the 433 acres claimed by the writ of right.

In February 1824, the case of Whittington v. Christian (reported in 2 Rand. 353,) was decided by the regular court of appeals. It was ejectment brought by the heirs of John Christian against Whittington, for 1000 acres of the 3926 acres of land granted by the patent of September 1755 to James Christian, John Christian, and William Brown. The plaintiffs claimed under John Christian, the son of John the original patentee, and one of the petitioners at whose suit the general court, in 1774, had declared the patent of 1755 forfeited. Whittington claimed under Norvell, who claimed this tract of 1000 acres under three patents dated in 1797, and who, and those claiming under him, had held the land ever since. In this case the same questions arose, which were presented in the case of Norvell 311 v. Camm &c., 6 *Munf. 233, and which were then decided in favour of Norvell; namely, Whether the land in question, having been granted in 1755, and having been afterwards, in 1774, adjudged to be forfeited and revested in the crown, was waste and unappropriated land, subject to location on a treasury warrant? if not,

Whether, nevertheless, the commonwealth's legal title therein passed to Norvell by virtue of the patents granted to him in 1797? And the court, upon full consideration, decided both points in the negative: it held, moreover, that the petitioners, at whose suit, in 1774, the lands were adjudged forfeited by the original patentees of 1755, and the heirs or assignees of those petitioners, were even now entitled, by right of pre-emption, to claim grants for the lands so forfeited, and that such grants, when issued, would relate back to the date of the original patent of 1755.

In May 1824, Warwick and wife and mrs. Camm filed their bill against Norvell, in the superior court of chancery of Lynchburg. After setting forth, in minute detail, the history and particulars of the title which the complainants claimed in the 433 acres of land (and which had been briefly stated in the petition), the bill charged that Norvell, though he well knew of the various acts under which the female complainants derived their title, proceeded to procure his patent of the 23d November 1797, while those complainants were yet infants of tender years, and while they were in full possession of the said tract of 433 acres; that the said grant to Norvell was illegally, fraudulently and surreptitiously obtained, by a false suggestion that the land embraced thereby was waste and unappropriated, and a fraudulent concealment of the facts known to him as aforesaid; and that it was obtained to the prejudice of the rights of these complainants. The bill then set forth the proceedings had in the writ of right, the decision of the special court of appeals therein, 312 and the conflicting *decision of the regular court of appeals in the case of Whittington v. Christian: after which it proceeded in the following terms—"These complainants, in the trial of the aforesaid writ of right, are placed by the varying judgments of the courts in this awkward dilemma—While it is solemnly decided, as the law of the land, that the said Norvell's patents are void both at law and in equity, it has been adjudged, as the law of this particular case, that the validity of said patents cannot be enquired into in a court of law. There are other grounds upon which these complainants are advised that they may still hope to recover, even at law, in the defence of the said writ of right: but they are also advised that it is unsafe for them to go into the trial thereof, precluded as they may be from insisting that the said patents of the demandant are void." Wherefore the bill prayed that the patent of the 23d November 1797 might be examined and repealed by the chancellor; that meanwhile Norvell might be enjoined from farther proceedings on his writ of right, until the subject could be examined and determined in equity; and that the court might order a new trial of the mise joined in the writ of right, wherein Norvell should be inhibited from using that patent in support of his claim.

The injunction was awarded.

Norvell answered, denying that his patent had been obtained fraudulently, surreptitiously, illegally, and upon false suggestion. He relied upon the opinion and judgment of the special court of appeals in his favour, in bar of all the claims advanced by the bill of the plaintiffs for relief; and he controverted the opinion expressed by the court of appeals in Whittington v. Christian, that the lands originally patented in 1755, and subsequently revested in the commonwealth, were not liable to be taken up under treasury warrants. "But" (the answer proceeded) "whatever may be the 313 fate of the question upon a review of the decision of the court of *appeals, this respondent is advised that the law of this case, as between him and the plaintiffs, was by the judgment of the special court of appeals, definitely and irreversibly fixed, and by the law so fixed he has a clear and incontestable right to recover at law. This being the case, this respondent is further advised that no precedent deserving the respect of the court sanctions the intervention of the court of equity in the way in which it is sought in this case, as so far granted, by stopping the proceedings at law, so as to keep the suit at law pending and undetermined. Such an intervention, if made on the idea that a defence may be still made at law, is violative of the most obvious principles of a court of equity, and if on the concession that there is no defence at law, it is equally reprobated by those principles, because it keeps on foot two undetermined suits, and should the plaintiffs succeed in equity, this respondent will have been exposed to expenses of the suit that is kept pending at law, without any possible advantage to any one, and should they fail, they will have had for a long time unmerited protection from a court of equity, while that court has left them, when that protection shall have been withdrawn, free to use at law every technical and quibbling objection that may possibly exist against the forms of the proceedings at law. This respondent insists that this case ought not to be taken out of the general rule; and by that rule no injunction should be awarded, but on the condition that the plaintiffs submit to judgment at law, and release all errors in such judgment."

On the 12th of October 1825, the court of chancery made an order that the injunction which had been awarded to the plaintiffs should stand dissolved as an act of that day, unless the plaintiffs should, at the next term of the superior court of law, confess judgment in the writ of right, for the 433 acres of land in the bill mentioned as claimed by them, or so much thereof 314 as *might be comprised in the defendant's grant sought by the bill to be repealed. On appeal by Warwick and wife and mrs. Camm from this decree, the court of appeals affirmed the same; saying, that the general rule was, that when a party came into equity, to be relieved against proceedings at law, he must confess judgment at law, and rely solely on the court of equity for relief: that there was nothing in the peculiar circumstances of this case to take it out of the rule: that, indeed, it did not appear that there was any cause for an injunction, except to restrain the defendant in equity, after judgment obtained by him at law, from turning the tenants out of possession, before the validity of the patent on which his legal title depended, should be examined and decided on in the court of chancery. See the case reported in 1 Leigh 96, where will be found a history, in some respects more detailed than the preceding, of the controversy between these parties.

After the case got back to the court of chancery, the only additional papers filed were copies of some proceedings in the writ of right, which shewed that it was still pending and undetermined in September 1829. At May term 1830, the cause was continued at the instance of the defendant, though the plaintiffs pressed for a hearing and offered to take a decree vacating the defendant's patent upon condition the plaintiffs should confess judgment in the writ of right. And at the October term 1830, the plaintiffs again offered to take a decree upon the same condition. But the cause being finally heard at that term, the chancellor dismissed the bill, upon the ground that after the decision of the court of appeals affirming the decree which conditionally dissolved the injunction, it was necessary for the plaintiffs either to comply with the condition of confessing a judgment at law, or to abandon their suit in chancery, and that in failing to confess the judgment they had shewn their preference for relying upon their defence at law.

315 *From the decree of dismissal, Warwick and wife and mrs. Camm again appealed to this court.

Johnson, for appellants. The injunction was a mere appendage to the bill of the appellants, and this court, on the former appeal, held that it was even an unnecessary appendage. Yet the chancellor decided that as the injunction had been properly dissolved in consequence of the failure of the complainants to confess judgment in the action at law, the case ought not to be heard on the merits without such confession. This was obviously wrong, and this court will now decide the merits. The case arises under the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 119, p. 466, which declares and regulates the practice of suing out and prosecuting writs of scire facias to repeal letters patent. It may be said that the complainants should have waited until the writ of right was disposed of, and then brought their suit to repeal Norvell's patent. It may also be said that judgment in the writ of right may have rendered the decision of this case unnecessary. The first objection is sustained by no authority: and as to the last, this court can know nothing of any decision that may have taken place in the action at law. Besides, even if a judgment had been rendered in favour of the appellants, it would still be material for them to have Norvell's patent vacated.

Stanard, for appellee. It is unnecessary to go into any examination of the merits, because the appellants have not placed themselves in a condition to entitle them to ask judgment on the merits. They have refused so to do, and elected instead to rely on their legal rights. The bill was filed in opposition to the plain elementary principle, that a party shall not, at the same time, litigate the same matter at law and in equity. The plaintiffs, if they relied on the equitable circumstances, should have relied solely on them, and submitted themselves entirely to the 316 court of equity for relief. See *Rogers v. Vosburgh, 4 Johns. C. R. 84; Branch v. Burnley &c., 1 Call 153, and the argument for the appellee on the former appeal between these parties, 1 Leigh 106. But the principle as contended for by the appellants' counsel is only applicable where no real defence exists at law; that is, where its application would avail nothing. In his answer, the appellee objects to the course taken by the appellants, that injury might thereby be inflicted on him, for which there would be no compensation. The soundness of the objection is well illustrated by the fact (not appearing, it is true, in this record) that the appellants have obtained judgment in the action at law, from which no appeal was taken in time, and yet are subjecting the appellee to the expense of this suit in equity, brought for the ostensible purpose of enabling them to do that which the result shews they could have effected without coming into equity. [Allen, J. There may be a case in which a party having a defence at law, may not be willing to defer his resort to equity until after the judgment, lest he should be barred by the limitation.] In no case where a bill is filed for substantive relief in equity, and the matter is the subject of a suit at law, will the court of equity permit the party to be proceeding at the same time in both forums. The cases in which equity permits the simultaneous proceeding in both forums in respect to the same matter, are those in which its own jurisdiction is ancillary to the jurisdiction at law.

The statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 66, § 60, p. 208, directs that on the dissolution of an injunction, the bill of the complainant shall stand dismissed, unless sufficient cause be shewn against its dismissal. And where the complainant is proceeding at the same time in both forums, no such cause can be shewn.

Upon the merits, if it be necessary to go into the consideration of them, the plaintiffs are not entitled to relief. For, if 317 Whittington v. Christian is to govern this *case, there was no necessity for coming into equity. If on the other hand the decision of the special court is to prevail, it amounts to this, that the appellee must succeed at law by force of his patent; and then, on the authority of Noland v. Cromwell, 4 Munf. 155, the appellants cannot be admitted to sue in equity, unless they shew that they were prevented by fraud, surprise or accident, from resorting to the remedy by caveat. The doctrine on this subject was afterwards examined in M'Clung v. Hughes, 5 Rand. 453, and Jackson v. M'Gavock, 5 Rand. 509. If Noland v. Cromwell settles the law as of that time, it settles the law of this case. If the statute of 1819, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 86, § 38, p. 330, be relied on, Jackson v. M'Gavock settles that that statute is prospective. But even under M'Clung v. Hughes, the appellants here are entitled to no relief; for the appellee has been guilty of no actual fraud.

Under the proviso in the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 119, § 1, p. 467, the remedy given by that statute lies only for a party having an equitable title to lands. Whatever title the appellants have to the land in controversy, is decided by the cases of Whittington v. Christian to be purely legal.

Johnson in reply. The doctrine as to election, where two suits for the same thing are brought by the same plaintiff, is not controverted. But here the party is pursued in one forum, and the pursuer in the other. The decision in 1 Leigh 96, itself denies the applicability of that doctrine to this case: for it supposes that there is jurisdiction, and that relief in equity may be given. And after a cause has been brought before this court, and the court has directed certain proceedings therein, the jurisdiction is no longer to be questioned.

Suppose the bill here had not been filed until after judgment; would it have been any objection that the defence was not made at law? The whole objection of the appellee is merely that the bill was filed too soon—*that if the appellants had suffered the case at law to proceed to judgment, they might have succeeded in the court of law, in which event they would have had no occasion to come into equity.

The doctrine as to caveats has no application in this case. That doctrine is settled with reference to patents which have been acquired according to law; which the officers of the commonwealth were authorized to issue, and which do give the legal title. It has no reference to patents which the commonwealth's officers had no authority to issue, and which do not convey any legal title.

It is objected that the proceeding in equity was not authorized, if the title of the appellants was legal. Is not a good legal title a good equitable right under the statute giving the scire facias to repeal patents? If not, what means the doctrine that a patentee may caveat? But it is not ascertained, even by Whittington v. Christian, that the title of the appellants is not purely equitable.

Whittington v. Christian now authorizes us to say that Norvell's patent is void—that he had no legal title to the land in controversy. There was then a good defence to Norvell's action. But the special court of appeals mistook the law (as we are now authorized to say) and held that the defence was to be shewn in equity. In this state of things the appellants go into equity, and the court of chancery says it will not grant relief, not because Norvell's patent is valid, but because the appellants have elected to make their defence at law. The whole question is merely this: whether, where a party has a good defence at law, and he is prevented from making it, not by his own fault but by a mistake of the courts, he may make it in equity?

ALLEN, J. The effect of the interlocutory order, affirmed by this court when 319 this case was formerly before *it, was merely to dissolve the injunction which had been allowed the plaintiffs, unless they should confess judgment at law for the land in controversy. The chancellor has given to the order a much broader interpretation. Though the case was ready for hearing, and a decision on the merits asked for, he has proceeded, not to dissolve the injunction according to the terms of the former order, but to dismiss the bill. In this course it seems to me he erred. The injunction was a mere incident to the main controversy. In the opinion of this court there was no cause for it when allowed. But though the plaintiffs lost the benefit of the injunction, they were still entitled to a decision upon the merits, if the case was in other respects proper for a court of chancery.

The jurisdiction of the court is objected to, because the plaintiffs relied, in their defence to the writ of right, upon the same matters set up in the bill as grounds for equitable relief. It is said that by refusing to confess judgment they have elected to abide by their legal defence, and they should not be permitted to litigate the same matter, at the same time, both at law and in equity. The plaintiffs, it is true, did attempt to avail themselves of these same matters in defence of the action at law. The special court of appeals decided, that they constituted no legal defence; that however it might be in equity, at law the defendant could not go behind a patent, regular on its face, and avoid it by extrinsic evidence. The ground of the objection to the jurisdiction therefore fails. The plaintiffs are not relying upon the same matters, as a defence to the action at law, and for relief in equity. For at law, and as respects this particular case, the matters charged in the bill constitute no defence whatever. What was the defence which the appellants expected to make at law, does not appear; nor is it material. It is sufficient to sustain the jurisdiction of the court of equity, if it be shewn, 320 that, *by the course of decisions settling the law of this case, the matters relied on in the bill could avail the appellants in equity only.

No authority has been produced which establishes that a party having a defence at law to an action brought against him, and a distinct ground for equitable relief should his defence prove unavailing, must abandon his legal defence by confessing judgment, or await the decision of the action at law before he can be entertained in equity. Where there is a concurrent jurisdiction of the same matter, and the plaintiff may sue in either forum, there is good reason to compel him to elect between them. Redress can be obtained in either, and the plaintiff should not be permitted to harass his adversary by pursuing him in both tribunals. The defendant has no such election; he is brought into court against his consent: and I perceive no good reason why he should be prohibited from setting up his distinct ground for equitable relief, during the pendency of the action at law. The holder of the legal title has frequently obtained it under circumstances which would constitute him a trustee for the party having a superior equity. A question however may arise, whether the elder grant embraces the subject in controversy? This is proper to be determined by the legal tribunal. It is to the interest of the defendant at law, that it should be ascertained. Until it is determined, it does not appear that the plaintiff at law has a title which interferes with the right of the defendant. In such cases the defendant cannot safely confess a judgment at law. And if in the meantime he should be precluded from proceeding in chancery, his equitable right might be lost, from the lapse of time or the loss of testimony.

It is further objected that the caveat was the proper remedy, and that no sufficient excuse is offered for failing to resort to it. The remedy by caveat was provided to settle the numerous controversies likely 321 to arise between *competitors for land under the act of 1779. That law provided a mode for the disposition of waste and unappropriated lands, and for the settlement of all existing claims to unpatented lands. But lands which had been once patented, and had lapsed, were not embraced by its provisions. They were left, according to the decision in Whittington v. Christian, 2 Rand. 353, "as they were under the former laws." Those laws regulated the mode of proceeding in regard to lands in this condition. The first petitioner acquired a right to sue out a patent upon the performance of certain conditions. He could be deprived of this right but in one way,—by the judgment of the proper tribunal at the suit of a subsequent petitioner. Without such judgment, no grant could issue. And if a grant did improperly issue, the first petitioner could at any time sue out his patent, which related back to the first grant, and so overreached any intermediate patent. The petition and judgment thereupon would seem to have been the mode of determining controversies under the laws then in force. There was no need of the caveat. Until judgment of forfeiture, the right of the first petitioner was completed as against all others, and a subsequent grant would have been merely void. After judgment of forfeiture, his interest was at an end. I think, therefore, that there is nothing in this objection.

Upon the merits, the previous action of this court has left us but little to determine.

The case of Whittington v. Christian decided that these lands could not be appropriated by a land office treasury warrant, as waste and unappropriated; that having once been granted, no title could be acquired by entry and survey; that they were reserved to be granted in a specified mode, and a patent obtained in any other mode was void. The special court of appeals, in 6 Munf. 233, had decided in reference to the patent in this case, that as it was 322 regular on its face, extrinsic *evidence was not admissible to impeach it in a court of law. The law of the land, as determined in one case, renders all such patents void; the law of the case, as decided by the special court of appeals, excludes all evidence of facts, upon the trial at law, which go to impeach the validity of the grant. In this state of the law and the adjudications, the plaintiffs have resorted to the only remedy left, a scire facias to repeal the patent. The law regulating this proceeding authorizes it to be sued out to repeal a patent obtained from the commonwealth by false suggestions, or issued contrary to law, or to the prejudice of private right. In this case the patent was obtained by the false suggestion that the land was waste and unappropriated, and liable to entry and survey under a treasury warrant. It issued against law, as lands once granted and lapsed could only be granted in the mode specified, after judgment of forfeiture. And it issued to the prejudice of the better right of the plaintiffs; for, until forfeiture, they were entitled to a grant upon performing the conditions required. I think therefore that the court, instead of dismissing the bill, should have rendered a decree repealing so much of the patent to the defendants, dated the 23d day of November 1797, for 669½ acres of land, as interferes with and is included within the boundaries of the tract of 433 acres, conveyed by James Grissom to Thomas Powell the ancestor of the plaintiffs, by deed bearing date the 21st day of August 1787.

The other judges concurring, decree reversed with costs. "And this court proceeding to pronounce such decree as the said chancery court ought to have pronounced, it is further decreed and ordered, that so much of the patent to the appellee, dated the 23d day of November 1797, for 669½ acres of land, as interferes with and is included within the boundaries of the tract of 433 acres, conveyed by James Grissom 323 to Thomas Powell *the ancestor of the appellants, by deed bearing date the 21st day of August 1787, be and the same is hereby repealed, and that the appellee do pay unto the appellants their costs by them about their suit in the chancery court expended. And it is further ordered that this decree be certified to the register of the land office."

I. OBJECT AND NECESSITY.

Object of Caveat.—The object of caveat is that a person having a better right to land to which another has obtained a survey may prevent his obtaining a grant until the title can be determined. Harper v. Baugh, 9 Gratt. 508; Wilcox v. Calloway, 1 Wash. 38; Trotter v. Newton, 30 Gratt. 582.

Necessity of Caveat.—It was foreseen by the legislature, that there would be interfering entries and surveys upon public lands by parties claiming title thereto, and caveat was the remedy for settling all those disputes prior to the patent to avoid the inconvenience of that solemn instrument being involved in contests of that kind. Lewis v. Billips, 1 Leigh 353; Johnson v. Brown, 3 Call 267.

II. WHEN CAVEAT LIES.

(See post, this note, "Who May Maintain.")

Statute Giving Remedy Does Not Apply to Forfeited Lands.—The statute of May 1779, ch. 13, giving the remedy by caveat for determining the right to waste and unappropriated lands, did not extend to lands which, having been once granted by a patent, had afterwards lapsed and become forfeited to the state. Warwick v. Norvell, 1 Rob. 308.

To Inclusive Survey.—A caveat lies as to an inclusive survey although there is no certificate from the county court that it is reasonable. Harvey v. Preston, 3 Call 495.

Where Survey Is Not Made Twelve Months before Filing Caveat.—A caveator whose survey has not been made twelve months before he enters his caveat, will not have judgment rendered against him merely because the twelve months, allowed for returning the plat and certificate of survey into the land office, have elapsed pending the caveat. Wilson v. Daggs, 8 Leigh 681.

III. TITLE TO SUPPORT.

In caveat, as in ejectment, the caveator must show the better right to the land in controversy to be in him. He cannot recover on the ground of the weakness of his adversary's title. Harper v. Baugh, 9 Gratt. 508, and foot-note; Beckwith v. Thompson, 18 W. Va. 123; Walton v. Hale, 9 Gratt. 194, and foot-note; Trotter v. Newton, 30 Gratt. 582, and foot-note; Carter v. Ramey, 15 Gratt. 346, and foot-note; Field v. Culbreath, 2 Call 547.

In all cases of caveat the caveat rests upon the ground of the better right in the caveator for the land surveyed. Unless he can show such better right, the caveatee is entitled to the judgment, though it might appear that as against the party showing the right, his entry and survey were defective. Walton v. Hale, 9 Gratt. 194; Beckwith v. Thompson, 18 W. Va. 123.

Title to Warrant under Which Survey Is Made.—The party filing a caveat must show a title to the warrant under which his own entry and survey are made, and if he fails to do so his caveat will be dismissed. McNeel v. Herold, 11 Gratt. 309; Currie v. Martin, 3 Call 28.

IV. WHO MAY MAINTAIN.

Administrator.—An administrator with the will annexed, being in possession of lands therein directed to be sold, may maintain a caveat to prevent any other person from obtaining a patent for the same as waste and unappropriated. Archer v. Saddler, 2 H. & M. 370.

Party Claiming under Grant.—Under § 38 of the general land law (1 Rev. Code, ch. 86), a person holding a perfect legal title to lands by grant from the commonwealth may maintain a caveat to prevent the issue of a junior grant to another person. Hardman v. Boardman, 4 Leigh 377.

Party Holding Adverse Possession.—Uninterrupted and peaceable possession of the land in controversy for a great length of time may of itself be sufficient to give title to the land and enable the occupant to maintain a caveat against parties claiming under a junior patent. Thus in Archer v. Saddler, 2 H. & M. 370, the circumstance of upwards of sixty years of peaceable and uninterrupted possession in the caveator and those under whom he claimed, together with payment of quit rents before, and taxes since, the revolution, was considered sufficient ground from which the jury might presume that a patent or grant for the land had been formally issued.

Party without Any Right to Land Cannot Maintain.—In Carter v. Ramey, 15 Gratt. 346, the entry and survey of both the caveator and caveatee being upon land which had been previously granted by the commonwealth, and which had never been forfeited, and the commonwealth having no interest in the land which could be vested in the caveator, it was held that he could have no right to it and could not maintain a caveat even though the caveatee had no better right. See also, Walton v. Hale, 9 Gratt. 194; Beckwith v. Thompson, 18 W. Va. 123.

V. EFFECT OF FAILURE TO FILE.

Generally Bars Equitable Relief.—Where one has such an equity as would, upon a caveat prior to the grant, have entitled him to a preference, it is not ground for a bill to set aside the title, unless he was prevented by fraud or accident from prosecuting a caveat. Johnson v. Brown, 3 Call 269; Noland v. Cromwell, 4 Munf. 155.

In the application of this rule, it was held in one case that a person neglecting to prosecute a caveat to prevent the emanation of a patent for land, was not entitled to a relief in equity on the ground of a previous certificate of the board of commissioners, under the Act of May 1779, ch. 12, in his favor. Gooseman v. Martin, 4 Munf. 533.

One who intended to take advantage of the interval between the acts of assembly for continuing the time for returning surveys into the land office should have entered a caveat. And if he neglected it, and a patent was granted on the survey, he cannot come into equity for relief against it, although he may have made an entry in the interval between the two acts of assembly. Staples v. Webster, 5 Call 261.

Where Caveat Was Prevented by Fraud.—After a grant issued, one claiming a prior equity against the grantee, can, in no case, have relief in equity, unless upon the ground of actual fraud in the acquisition of the legal title, or unless the party was prevented from prosecuting a caveat by fraud, accident or mistake. By actual fraud is meant the proceedings to procure a patent after actual notice of a prior equity. McClung v. Hughes, 5 Rand. 458; Jackson v. McGavock, 5 Rand. 509; Lyne v. Jackson, 1 Rand. 114.

Where There Is Independent Ground for Equitable Relief.—Although a party may be let into a court of equity on grounds which he could not have used on the trial of a caveat, and which, in fact, make another case, or upon a case suggesting or proving that he was prevented by fraud or accident from prosecuting his caveat, he is not to be sustained in the court of equity on such grounds as were or might have been brought forward on the trial of the caveat. Noland v. Cromwell, 4 Munf. 155. But this principle does not apply to a case in which the rights of the parties cannot be adjusted in the court of the caveat, but the aid of the court of equity is necessary to give to each his proper share of the land for which one has improperly obtained a patent. Christian v. Christians, 6 Munf. 534.

Depends on Circumstances of Each Case.—Though a party has sufficient ground for filing a caveat he does not in all cases lose his remedy by failing to file it; for the mere omission to caveat will not be considered as having closed the door to relief where the circumstances of the case are such as to excuse the failure. Hamilton v. Maze, 4 Call 196; Depew v. Howard, 1 Munf. 293; Christian v. Christians, 6 Munf. 534.

Under Statute, § 38, Code 1819.—Since the passage of the act embodied in § 38, Code 1819, the omission of any person, claiming a better right to land, to avail himself of the remedy by caveat does not bar such person from asserting such better right in any court of law or equity, in the same manner as if no such remedy by caveat had been given. Beckwith v. Thompson, 18 W. Va. 123.

VI. PROCEDURE IN CAVEAT CASES.

1. IN GENERAL.

Time of Entering Caveat.—The time of the return of a survey into the office is the period from which the six months are to be calculated for entering a caveat. In such case the caveat must show the fact. Harvey v. Preston, 3 Call 495.

Damages Not to Be Given in Caveat Cases.—Damages are not to be given upon the affirmance of the judgment in cases of caveat. Harvey v. Preston, 3 Call 495.

Objects Called for in Entry Not of Public Notoriety—Necessity for Special Verdict.—In a caveat, where the objects called for in the entry are not of such public notoriety as that the courts will take notice of them, a special verdict must find that the objects called for have a real existence, and are such as is required to make it a valid entry. Where the finding is defective in this respect it will not be remedied by finding that the survey was made in conformity with the entry. McNeel v. Herold, 11 Gratt. 309.

2 WHAT CAVEAT MUST STATE.

Grounds of Caveator's Claim.—The caveator must state in his caveat the grounds on which he claims the better right to the land in controversy; and he will not be permitted on the trial to abandon the right he has set out in his caveat as that under which he claims and prove a different one. Harper v. Baugh, 9 Gratt. 508, and foot-note; Trotter v. Newton, 20 Gratt. 582, and foot-note; Clements v. Kyles, 13 Gratt. 468; Beckwith v. Thompson, 18 W. Va. 123.

Reason of Rule.—"The law required the caveat to express the nature of the right on which the plaintiff claims the land. The object of the caveat is, in part, to notify the caveatee of the grounds on which the caveator claims the better right, that he may come prepared to controvert it; and it would be a surprise on him to permit the caveator to abandon at the trial the right which he had set forth in his caveat, as that under which he claimed, and prove a different right. Such a course would lead to injustice, and is in conflict with the terms of the statute, which requires the nature of the better right to be expressed in the caveat." Harper v. Baugh, 9 Gratt. 508; Trotter v. Newton, 20 Gratt. 582.

Effect of Failure to State Grounds of Claim.—A caveator should state in his caveat the grounds on which he claims to have the better right to the land in controversy. And if this is not done the caveatee may either move the court to dismiss the caveat, or to require the caveator to file a specification of the alleged better right on which his claim is founded. But after the jury is sworn to ascertain the facts it is then too late to object to the form of the caveat. Clements v. Kyles, 13 Gratt. 468; Beckwith v. Thompson, 18 W. Va. 123.

3. EVIDENCE.

To Show Patent to Be Founded upon Survey.—In Clements v. Kyles, 13 Gratt. 468, the caveator claimed under the patent issued in 1756, which did not refer to any survey. In order to show that the patent was founded on a survey, he offered in evidence a copy from the books of the surveyor of the county of a certificate of a survey and plat dated in November 1749. The certificate itself did not contain the calls for courses and distances or other marks, but these were given on the plat, and they agreed with the grant in its general and locative calls. This was held competent evidence for the purpose for which it was offered.

What Court May Consider.—In a caveat case, upon a question involving the boundary line between two counties, the court, in construing the acts in relation to their boundaries, may look to the acts forming other counties both before and subsequent, for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the legislature as to the location of the boundary line. Hamilton v. McNeil, 13 Gratt. 389.

4. DISMISSAL OF CAVEAT.

Not Binding Unless on the Merits.—A dismissal of the caveat, unless it be on the merits, is not binding. Hunter v. Hall, 1 Call 206.

Dismissal without Prejudice.—In a caveat case, if it be found by the jury or agreed by the parties, that since the institution of the caveat, a grant from the commonwealth of the land in controversy has been obtained by the caveatee, judgment ought to be entered dismissing the caveat, but such judgment to be no prejudice to another suit in chancery which the caveator may bring to vacate the said grant, or any other grant that may issue to the caveatee in consequence of such judgment of dismissal; the judgment on the caveat being, in that event, not pronounced on a comparison of the respective rights of the parties. Guerrant v. Bagby, 6 Munf. 160.

5. APPEALS.

What Constitutes Record.—In a case of caveat all the facts agreed by the parties, or found by the jury, or, if a jury is dispensed with, ascertained by the court, necessarily become and should be made a part of the record in the cause. Hamilton v. McNeil, 13 Gratt. 389.

Where Evidence Is Certified.—Where the court certifies the evidence instead of the facts, and there is no conflict in the parol evidence, and taking the whole as true the appellate court may proceed safely to judgment upon the same, it is the duty of such court to proceed and give judgment according to the very right of the cause. Hamilton v. McNeill, 13 Gratt. 389.

Where Patent Issues to Caveatee after Appeal Taken.—In Wilson v. Daggs, 8 Leigh 681, after the dismissal of a caveat upon its merits, the caveatee filed in the land office a copy of the judgment, and obtained a patent. A supersedeas being awarded to the judgment, the patent was relied on as a bar. It was held that, notwithstanding the emanation of the patent, the court might examine into the correctness of the judgment; but if the judgment be reversed, then a dismissal of the caveat must ensue—the dismissal being without prejudice to any proceeding which might be instituted to vacate the patent.

When Bill of Exceptions Unnecessary.—Where the jury is dispensed with and the whole cause is submitted to the court, it is not necessary for the losing party to file a bill of exceptions to the judgment of the court, or to move for a new trial, and, if it is refused, to except to the opinion of the court refusing it: but it is sufficient that the circuit court shall make the facts agreed and ascertained, or the evidence, where the parol evidence is in no respect conflicting, a part of the record by its order to that effect upon rendering judgment. Hamilton v. McNeill, 13 Gratt. 389.

Armstrong v. Huntons.

November, 1842, Richmond.

(Absent STANARD,* J.)

Equity Jurisdiction—Discovery—Slaves.†—Bill in equity by claimant of legal title to a female slave, against an adverse claimant, charges that the slave, with her increase if any, is in possession of defendant, who refuses to surrender the same to plaintiff; and prays that defendant may be decreed to give up the slave, that he may set forth the names of her increase if any, and say if the same be not in his possession, and that he may account for the hires and profits thereof since the plaintiff's title accrued. HELD, equity has no jurisdiction of the case.

Alexander Hunton, who died in 1789, by his will bequeathed a female slave named Letty to his daughter Nancy and her heirs forever; and having bequeathed likewise †Equity Jurisdiction—Discovery—Slaves.—The principal case is cited in Hall v. Smith, 25 Gratt. 76; Childress v. Morris, 23 Gratt. 806; Hale v. Clarkson, 23 Gratt. 47; Jones v. Bradshaw, 16 Gratt. 360. See monographic note on "Bills of Discovery" appended to Lyons v. Miller, 6 Gratt. 427.

Same—Action of Detinue.—In Summers v. Bean, 18 Gratt. 419, the court said: "If the appellee could recover the slaves by an action of detinue, he would have an ample remedy at law and could not come into equity for relief. Armstrong v. Huntons, 1 Rob. R. 323, and cases therein cited." The principal case is cited in this connection in Childress v. Morris, 23 Gratt. 805.

to ten others of his sons and daughters one slave each, he added—"It is my will, that if any of my before mentioned children die without lawful heirs of their bodies, their estate left them shall be equally divided among the surviving children."

In July 1818, Robert, Susanna, John and George Hunton exhibited a bill against Thomas Armstrong, in the superior court of chancery of Fredericksburg, setting forth the will of Alexander Hunton; 324 alleging, that after *the testator's death, Cyrus Newby, who had intermarried with Nancy Hunton, took possession of the slave Letty, who afterwards had several children, one of whom named Patty, with her increase, if any, was now in possession of the defendant Armstrong; that Nancy Newby had died without ever having had issue, whereby the plaintiffs, the only children of the testator that survived the said Nancy, became entitled to the woman Patty and her increase, and had applied to Armstrong for them, but he refused to surrender them, pretending that as he had bought Patty from Cyrus Newby, he was the rightful owner. The bill therefore prayed, that Armstrong might be decreed to give up the woman Patty; that he might set forth the names of her increase, if any, and say if the same be not in his possession; and that he might account for the hires and profits thereof since the death of Nancy Newby.

Armstrong demurred to the bill, shewing as the ground of demurrer that the matter was properly cognizable at law. At the same time he put in an answer, stating, that he bought a negro girl named Patty at a sheriff's sale in 1811 under an execution sued out against Cyrus Newby, presuming that the title was in Newby, and knowing nothing of the stock from which she came; and that he held her till April 1818, when he sold her.

The court overruled the defendant's demurrer to the bill, and directed an account of the profits of the slave Patty from the death of Mrs. Newby until she was sold by the defendant, and of the period and price at which she was sold. The commissioner reported an account of profits, amounting to 8 dollars; but instead of the price for which Armstrong sold the slave, he reported her estimated value at the time of the sale (the 15th of April 1818), which was 500 dollars.

It appeared by testimony taken in the cause, that Patty was only about 14 or 15 years old when Armstrong sold her.

325 *The court approved the commissioner's report, and decreed that Armstrong pay to each of the complainants 127 dollars, with interest on 125 dollars, part thereof, from the 15th of April 1818 till paid; and that he also pay the costs of the suit. From which decree Armstrong appealed to this court.

In the argument here, by Leigh for the appellant and Stanard for the appellees, several questions of law and fact were earnestly debated. But as this court decided the question of jurisdiction alone, it is unnecessary to notice any of the others.

On that point, Leigh cited and examined the following authorities: Duvals v. Ross, 2 Munf. 290; Gregory's adm'r v. Marks's adm'r, 1 Rand. 355; Rankin v. Bradford and others, 1 Leigh 163; Hardin's ex'ors v. Hardin, 2 Leigh 572; Parks's adm'r and heirs v. Rucker, 5 Leigh 149. He said, the plaintiffs had not pretended in their bill that they were ignorant of any thing necessary to enable them to maintain an action at law. The case of Hardin's ex'ors v. Hardin was expressly in point, and conclusive against the jurisdiction.

Stanard contended that the case of Gregory's adm'r v. Marks's adm'r was an authority for, and not against, the jurisdiction in this case. As to the other cases cited by the counsel for the appellant, he endeavored to shew that they were distinguishable from the present case. In Hardin's ex'ors v. Hardin, the case mainly relied on for the appellant, the bill itself shewed that the plaintiffs needed no discovery of the increase of the slaves in controversy. Here the bill asks a discovery of the increase, and there is nothing to shew that the plaintiffs were aware of the fact that the slave had no increase: the circumstances of the case indeed prove that they were ignorant of that fact. In Fox v. Morton, decided by this court in 1828, but not reported, the circumstances were stronger against the jurisdiction 326 *than they are here: the ignorance of the plaintiffs, there alleged in the bill, was expressly denied by the answer: yet this court sustained the jurisdiction.

Leigh in reply. In Fox v. Morton, the bill contained an allegation that the defendant refused to give information as to the increase, so as to enable the plaintiffs to sue at law; and the circumstances of the case, like those in Gregory's adm'r v. Mark's adm'r and Rankin v. Bradford & c. shewed that the plaintiffs were in need of a discovery from the defendant. Besides, no express objection was made to the jurisdiction there. Here the bill does not assert that there was any increase; it merely asks a discovery of the increase if any. At the time of the suit brought, the girl Patty was only 14 or 15 years old, and it was highly improbable that she could have any increase: the call for discovery, therefore, was prima facie merely colourable.

BALDWIN, J. If this is not an action of detinue brought in a court of chancery, it must be because the plaintiffs have asserted their demand by a bill instead of a declaration. It is a suit to recover a single slave, by the owners of the legal title, if any, against an adverse claimant, without any impediment whatever to the prosecution of the plain and adequate remedy at law. If there is any thing in the case, besides the sex of the slave, to give any the slightest colour of jurisdiction to a court of equity, I have not been able to find it. She had no issue, and of course there was no necessity for a discovery; and the ignorance of the plaintiffs, without the slightest enquiry, of a fact (that of issue) which never existed, can furnish no reason for coming into equity; the more especially when such ignorance is not even suggested by them, but is to be surmised by the court from the interjection of a prayer for a discovery of the issue, "if any." It is perfectly clear as a general rule, that in a bill to substitute an equitable for a 327 *legal forum, a prayer for a discovery, without any averment shewing its materiality or necessity, is naught. If this court has tolerated a departure from this rule, in regard to slave property, (Gregory's adm'r v. Marks's adm'r, 1 Rand. 355,) it has been where the necessity for a discovery was supposed to be incidental, at least prima facie, to the nature of the demand; as where the suit is to recover a stock of slaves, after a considerable lapse of time, and there has been such an increase as would raise a fair presumption that the plaintiff is ignorant of their names, ages and residence. But even under such circumstances, if it may be inferred from the statements in the bill, or the evidence in the cause, that no such difficulty in point of fact exists, a court of equity will not take cognizance of the case, unless there be some other ground for the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction. Hardin's ex'ors v. Hardin, 2 Leigh 572. To entertain jurisdiction of the cause before us would be to obliterate the line of demarcation between the two tribunals, so far as slave property is concerned, and permit actions of detinue for the recovery of slaves to be prosecuted indifferently in a court of law or a court of chancery, at the election of the claimant.

I think the decree ought to be reversed, and the bill dismissed with costs, The other judges concurring, decree reversed and bill dismissed.

328 *Vanmeter and Another v. Giles Governor, for M'Neill.

November, 1842, Richmond.

(Absent STANARD,* J.)

Prison Bounds Bond—Sufficiency of Bond.—A prison bounds bond is taken payable to the sheriff, his certain attorney, his heirs or assigns, and the execution debtor having broken the bounds in the time of the same sheriff, the bond is by him assigned to the creditor: HELD, such bond and assignment are good and sufficient in law to render the obligors responsible to the creditor, and the sheriff is not liable for the escape.

Same—Same—Condition for Return of Debtor.—Prior to the 1st of January 1820, the law did not require that bonds given for the prison rules should be conditioned for the return of the debtor to close prison at the end of a year.

Same—Who May Assign.†—A prison bounds bond made payable to the sheriff and his successors in office, may be assigned to the creditor by the sheriff who took it, or by a succeeding sheriff, according as the debtor's escape may be in the time of the one sheriff or the other: per BALDWIN, J.

Same—Same—Quære.—Whether, if a prison bounds bond were made payable to the sheriff and his representatives, or to him alone, it would be assignable by him, or, in the event of his death, by his executor or administrator, after an escape of the debtor from a succeeding sheriff?

Escape—Declaration for Taking Defective Bounds Bond—Assignment of Breaches.—In debt on official bond of sheriff, breach assigned is, that the sheriff permitted relator's debtor in execution to escape, by wrongfully accepting from him a defective bond, erroneously purporting to be a prison bounds bond, and that the relator, from the erroneous and defective form of the said bond, was unable to recover his debt by virtue thereof, but was cast in an action brought by him founded upon the same: but declaration makes no profert of such bond, nor vouches the record of the action alleged to have been brought thereon, nor gives any further description of the bond or of the action. On general demurrer to the declaration, HELD, the assignment of the breach is insufficient.

Same—Plea That Debtor Was Duly Admitted to Bounds—Oyer.—In debt on official bond of the sheriff of H. assigning for breach that the sheriff permitted the escape of a debtor in execution 329 *under a ca. sa. from the superior court of H the defendants plead that the debtor gave bond according to law, with good security, to keep the prison rules for the county of H. and thereupon betook himself to the prison rules for said county, without this that he escaped in any other manner. The bond (of which profert is made in the plea) is with condition that the debtor shall keep within the prison bounds prescribed by the superior court of H. Plaintiff takes oyer of the bond and demurs to the plea. HELD, as the bond, made part of the plea by oyer, shews that the debtor was admitted to the proper bounds, the defect if any in the allegations of the plea is thereby cured.

Same—Verdict and Judgment—Special Finding under Statute.—In debt on official bond of sheriff, assigning for breach the escape of a debtor in his custody, no judgment can be entered on verdict against defendants, unless it be expressly found (as prescribed by the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 136, § 3), that the debtor escaped with the consent or through the negligence of the sheriff, or that he might have been retaken and the sheriff neglected to make immediate pursuit.

Debt, in the late superior court of law for Hardy county, in the name of William B. Giles governor of Virginia, successor in office of John Tyler, who was successor of James Pleasants, who was successor of Thomas Mann Randolph, who was successor of James P. Preston, (the said plaintiff suing at the relation of Strawder J. M'Neill) against Isaac Vanmeter, Edward Williams and Samuel M'Mechin, upon the official bond executed by the said Vanmeter as sheriff of Hardy county, and by the said Williams and M'Mechin as his sureties. The bond bore date the 10th of November 1819, and was in the penalty of 10,000 dollars, payable to James P. Preston governor and his successors in office, with a condition in the usual form. The declaration set forth the execution of the bond by the defendants, recited the condition, and then proceeded to assign breaches thereof substantially as follows:

1. It was alleged that in October 1819, Strawder J. M'Neill the relator recovered judgment in the superior court of Hardy against a certain George Neville for 1251 dollars 41 cents with interest thereon
330 from the 5th of *July 1819 till paid, and the costs of suit, subject to a credit for 700 dollars paid the 8th of September 1819, on which judgment he sued out a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum against Neville, directed to the sheriff of Hardy and returnable to January rules 1820, and before the return day thereof delivered the same to Vanmeter, then the sheriff of Hardy, to be executed, who, before the return day of the writ, by virtue thereof arrested Neville by his body, and kept and detained him in his custody from thence until he the said sheriff, afterwards, to wit, on the 15th of November 1819, without the leave or license and against the will of the said M'Neill, to whom the amount of principal money, interest and costs aforesaid was still wholly unpaid and unsatisfied, suffered and permitted the said Neville to escape and go at large, and he did then and there escape and go at large whithersoever he would out of the custody of the said Vanmeter sheriff as aforesaid.

2. After setting forth, in like manner as before, the judgment recovered by M'Neill against Neville, the writ of capias ad satisfaciendum sued out thereupon and delivered to Vanmeter the sheriff, and the arrest of Neville by virtue of that writ, it was alleged that the said sheriff detained Neville in his custody, in execution as aforesaid, from the time of his arrest until he the said sheriff, "afterwards, to wit, on the — day of —, by wrongfully taking and accepting of said George Neville a defective bond, erroneously purporting to be what is commonly termed a prison bounds bond according to the statute in such case made and provided, and erroneously purporting to bind the said George Neville to keep within the prison rules and bounds of the county court of Hardy for one year, without the leave or license and against the will of said Strawder J. M'Neill, permitted the said George Neville to escape and go at large whithersoever he would out of the custody of him the said Isaac Vanmeter, being the sheriff as aforesaid, the 331 *said sum of money being wholly unpaid to said Strawder J. M'Neill, relator; and that the said relator, from the erroneous and defective form of said bond called a prison bounds bond, and through the default of said Isaac Vanmeter in his office of sheriff in taking the said bond, dith v. Duval, 1 Munf. 76. See also, monographic note on "Official Bonds" appended to Sangster v. Com., 17 Gratt. 124, and monographic note on "Assignments" appended to Ragsdale v. Hagy, 9 Gratt. 409.

was unable to recover the said debt by virtue of said bond, but was cast in an action brought by him founded upon said pretended prison bounds bond, and was subjected to pay a large sum in costs of said suit, viz." &c.

To the breaches so assigned in the declaration, the defendants put in general demurrers, in which the plaintiff joined.

Two special pleas were also filed by the defendants.

1. The first plea admitted the rendition of the judgment, and the issuing of the capias ad satisfaciendum thereupon, as set forth in the declaration, and that the said writ having been placed in the hands of George S. Craigen deputy of the defendant Vanmeter sheriff of Hardy, he the said deputy, by virtue thereof, and before the return day, arrested the said Neville and held him in his custody: and then the plea averred, that after Neville was so arrested and in custody, "he the said Neville, according to the act of the general assembly in such case made and provided, tendered to the said George Craigen, deputy sheriff as aforesaid, bond for the prison rules and bounds laid out for said county, and then and there executed a bond with good and sufficient security to keep the bonds and prison rules for the county of Hardy in due form of law, and then and there, in virtue of said bounds bond so executed as aforesaid, the said George Neville betook himself to the prison rules and bounds for said county of Hardy according to the statute in such case made and provided, which said bond so executed as aforesaid is now here shewn to the court, and together with the assignment endorsed on the back thereof, 332 is in the words and figures *following, to wit:" (here the prison bounds bond, and the assignment of the same, were set out in the plea); "which is the same supposed escape in the plaintiff's declaration mentioned; without this, that said George Neville went beyond the custody and immediate control of the sheriff, after taking him as aforesaid, in any other manner. And this the defendants are ready to verify. Wherefore they pray judgment" &c.

The prison bounds bond, incorporated as aforesaid into the plea, was dated the 28th of December 1819, and signed and sealed by George Neville, Charles Lobb and George S. Craigen, who thereby acknowledged themselves to be held and firmly bound unto Isaac Vanmeter sheriff of Hardy county in the sum of 1201 dollars 80 cents, to be paid unto the said Isaac Vanmeter sheriff as aforesaid, or to his certain attorney, his heirs or assigns. The condition recited that the body of George Neville was now in the jail of Hardy county by virtue of an execution issued &c. (describing the writ of capias ad satisfaciendum aforesaid, the amount of which, including the sheriff's commission and his fees for making the arrest and taking the bond, was stated to be 600 dollars and 90 cents,) and that the said George Neville was desirous to take the prison bounds as laid off or allotted and prescribed by the superior court of law for said county of Hardy; and provided "that if the above bound George Neville shall well and truly keep within the prison bounds as prescribed by the said superior court of Hardy, as the law requires, and not depart therefrom until released by due course of law, then the above obligation to be void, or else to remain in full force and virtue of law."

The assignment of the said bond was in the following terms: "I Isaac Vanmeter, sheriff of Hardy county, hereby assign the within bond to Strawder J. M'Neill this 18th day of May 1820." (Signed) "Isaac Vanmeter."

333 *2. By the second plea, the defendants said that the plaintiff ought not to have and maintain his action on the breach in the declaration assigning an escape, because they averred that after the execution of the writ of capias ad satisfaciendum mentioned in said breach, the defendant Vanmeter did not permit the said George Neville to escape, nor did he escape, out of the custody and care of the said defendant as sheriff, as the plaintiff in said breach had alleged, and thereof they put themselves upon the country.

The plaintiff, after taking oyer of the prison bounds bond whereof the defendants made profert in their first plea, demurred generally to that plea, and the defendants joined in the demurrer. On the second plea an issue in fact was made up.

The defendant Williams died pending the suit, and his death was suggested on the record.

At the September term 1831 of the circuit superior court of law and chancery for Hardy county (to which the cause had been transferred according to law), the court, after argument of the matters of law arising upon the several demurrers aforesaid, overruled the demurrer of the defendants to the first breach assigned in the declaration, sustained their demurrer to the second breach, and also sustained the plaintiff's demurrer to the first plea of the defendants. The issue of fact made up on the second plea was thereupon tried, and the jury returned a verdict in these words: "We the jury find for the plaintiff the debt in the declaration mentioned, to be discharged by the payment of 563 dollars 92 cents with interest thereon at 6 per cent. per annum from the 8th of September 1819 till paid, and the further sum of 5 dollars 72 cents with interest thereon from the 12th day of November 1820 till paid, damages." Judgment was accordingly rendered by the court, for the debt in the declaration mentioned and the costs of suit, to be discharged by the payment of the 334 damages assessed as *aforesaid for the relator, and the costs aforesaid, and such other damages as might be thereafter assessed upon a writ or writs of scire facias being sued out, and new breaches assigned of the condition of the writing obligatory in the declaration mentioned.

On the petition of the defendants Vanmeter and M'Mechin, this court awarded a supersedeas to the judgment.

The cause was argued by Stanard and the attorney general for the plaintiffs in error, and C. and G. N. Johnson for the defendant in error.

The attorney general said, the only question upon the demurrer to the first plea was as to the sufficiency of the prison bounds bond; and in deciding that question against the defendants below, the circuit court erred. The bond must have been considered insufficient either because not taken to the sheriff and his successors in office, or because it does not provide for the return of the debtor to close prison at or before the expiration of one year from the date. It is true that in Meredith's adm'x v. Duval, 1 Munf. 76, where the subject of the proper form of the bond is adverted to, judge Roane expressed the opinion that it ought to be taken payable to the sheriff and his successors in office: but that opinion is said, in 1 Rob. Pract. 68, to have been questioned in the case of Mayo v. Pleasants, decided by this court in November 1829. Without enquiring which opinion is correct, an error of judgment in the sheriff as to a matter not expressly determined by the statute, and on which even the judges of this court have differed, is surely not such an act of negligence as ought to subject him to liability. But the question itself is immaterial in this case; for here the bond was assigned by the sheriff to whom it was taken, he being still in office at the time of the assignment: and Meredith's adm'x v. Duval decides that such an assignment of a bond taken payable to the sheriff, 335 *his certain attorney, his executors, administrators or assigns, would enable the creditor assignee to maintain an action against the obligors in the bond. The objection that the bond does not provide for the return of the debtor to close prison is equally invalid. Being executed on the 28th of December 1819, the bond is not affected by the statute in 1 Rev. Code of 1819, ch. 134, § 30, p. 535, prescribing that the condition of the prison bounds bond shall contain that provision; for that statute only went into operation on the 1st of January 1820. And by the preexisting laws, though the sheriff was required to recommit the debtor to close prison at the expiration of the year, and was subjected to a fine in case of his failure to do so, the prescribed condition of the bond was merely that the debtor should not depart or go out of the rules or bounds of the prison to which he was committed. Statute of 1793, 1 Rev. Code of 1814, ch. 151, § 37, p. 428 [303]; Acts of 1806-7, ch. 27, § 2, p. 16; Acts of 1812-13, ch. 26, § 10, p. 38; Acts of 1817-18, ch. 28, p. 30; 1 Rev. Code of 1819, ch. 135, p. 547.

The verdict, he said, was defective in not finding expressly that the debtor escaped with the consent or through the negligence of the sheriff, or that he might have been retaken, and that the sheriff neglected to make immediate pursuit. 1 Rev. Code of 1819, ch. 136, § 3, p. 550; Hooe v. Tebbs, 1 Munf. 501; Johnson v. Macon, 1 Wash. 6.

The counsel for the defendant in error admitted that the validity of the bond in this case was to be determined by the law as it stood before the 1st of January 1820, and that no condition providing for the debtor's return to close custody was thereby prescribed; but they contended that the bond was defective because not taken to the sheriff and his successors in office, but to him, his heirs and assigns. Opinions of Tucker and Roane, *J., in Meredith's adm'x v. Duval, 1 Munf. 79, 83, 84; Syme v. Griffin, 4 Hen. & Munf. 277; Sullivan v. Alexander, 19 Johns. Rep. 233. The decision in Meredith's adm'x v. Duval was, that the obligors in the bond were liable to the creditor, the assignee of the sheriff, in an action upon the assigned bond. No question arose, or could arise, whether the sheriff had discharged himself from responsibility to the creditor, by taking a sufficient statutory bond. The bond here is not a good statutory bond, and the sheriff ought consequently to be held liable. And this is the more reasonable, because the sheriff himself may maintain an action on the bond, and recover indemnity from the obligors.

The object of the first plea in this case was to shew that there was no escape, unless the debtor's betaking himself to the prison bounds constituted an escape; and for that purpose it is necessary to shew that the debtor was lawfully admitted to the proper bounds. But the plea alleges that he was admitted to the bounds for the county of Hardy. If that allegation be taken (as it should be) to mean that he was admitted to the bounds laid off by the county court of Hardy, the plea is fatally defective, as it shews that the execution issued from the superior court of the county, which must be presumed to have laid off its own prison rules, since it had the power by law to do so. Statute of 1792, 1 Rev. Code of 1814, ch. 66, § 18, p. 107 [76]; Acts of 1807-8, ch. 3, § 2, 20, p. 7, 10. And although the prison rules of the superior court may be the same with those of the county court, yet they are not necessarily the same. At all events the plea does not expressly shew that the bounds to which the debtor was admitted were those prescribed by the superior court; and this defect or uncertainty in the allegations of the plea is not aided by the bond. The plea is insufficient in another respect. It ought to have shewn that the period for which the debtor was 337 allowed the privilege of the *rules was the period limited by law, namely, one year from the date of the bond; but it does not shew this, nor what was done after the year. Under the declaration, the plaintiff might have proved an escape at any time before action brought; and here every thing averred in the plea may be true, and still an escape have been permitted.

As to the supposed insufficiency of the verdict, the case of Johnson v. Macon proves nothing, for the verdict there was in favour of the defendant. In Hooe v. Tebbs, the court were divided upon the question whether the verdict was sufficient or not: judges Roane and Fleming held that it was not: but judge Tucker was of opinion that as the declaration expressly alleged that the sheriff voluntarily permitted the escape, the general verdict for the plaintiff amounted to an express finding of the truth of that allegation. And the principle of that opinion is conformable to right reason and the intendment of the law. The object of the legislature was to exempt the sheriff where the escape was not voluntary, and to make him liable where it was; not to regulate the form of the verdict. If such regulation had been designed, the method adopted would have been to set forth what should be the finding of the jury, as is done in the case of complaints for forcible or unlawful entries or unlawful detainers, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 115, § 14, p. 458. Besides, the requisition of a special finding by the jury is contained in a statute which relates to actions brought directly for the escape, and the construction ought to be that such requisition is imperative only where an action of that kind is resorted to. The action here is for a breach of the official bond, a remedy given by a different statute, and in which the sheriff may even be rendered liable, though the escape was not with his consent or through his negligence. But he is only liable for such damages as the creditor *has actually sustained (Perkins and others v. Giles governor, 9 Leigh 397); whereas in the action provided by the statute concerning escapes, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 136, § 3, p. 550, he is subjected to liability for the whole amount due upon the plaintiff's execution, without regard to the quantum of the actual damage resulting from the escape. There is good reason then for requiring that the consent or negligence of the sheriff shall be expressly found, where the consequence of the verdict is to be a recovery arbitrary in amount and penal in its character; but no reason at all for such a requisition, where the actual damage sustained is to be the measure of the recovery.

The decision sustaining the demurrer to the second breach assigned in the declaration was erroneous. Opinion of Roane, J., in Hooe v. Tebbs, 1 Munf. 507.

STANARD in reply. The first plea alleges that the debtor, being in custody under an execution issued from the superior court of Hardy, gave bond in due form of law, with good security, to keep the prison bounds for the county of Hardy, and thereupon betook himself to the bounds for said county. This is in substance an averment that the party gave bond to keep within the rules of the superior court. But the bond is set out in the plea, and is made a part thereof by the plaintiff himself upon oyer; and it thereby appears that the bounds to which the debtor was admitted were the bounds prescribed by the superior court of law for the said county. Whatever imperfection or uncertainty might have existed in the allegation of the plea, taken by itself, is thus completely removed by reference to the bond. In Meredith's adm'x v. Duval, 1 Munf. 79, 82, a defect of the declaration was held to be cured by oyer of the bond declared upon. And less certainty is required in a plea than in a declaration. Co. Litt. 303a.

339 *A further objection is made that this plea contains no justification. The plea is treated as merely stating that the debtor executed a prison bounds bond and was thereupon admitted to the rules, and then it is said, that may be true, and yet, under the declaration charging an escape in general terms, an escape at any time before action brought may be proved. This is neither more nor less than to reject a part of a plea, and then to argue that the rest without that is bad. The absque hoc is not matter of protestation, it is matter of denial—of special traverse. Stephen on Pleading, 1st ed. p. 212. It denies the very fact and the whole fact charged, unless the matters averred in the plea shall be held sufficiently to establish the fact. Suppose issue had been taken on the plea, and it had appeared in evidence that at any time, within the year or after, the debtor broke the bounds or escaped, would not that have falsified the plea? But if it were necessary, it might be maintained, on the authority of Lyle v. Stephenson, 6 Call 54, that in an action against a sheriff for the voluntary escape of a debtor charged in execution, it is a good plea in bar simply to aver that the debtor was lawfully admitted to the prison rules under a lawful prison bounds bond, because the sheriff is thereupon by law discharged of the custody of the debtor. Nor is the law as settled in Lyle v. Stephenson at all affected by the subsequent act of 1806-7, ch. 27. Under that act, as under the preexisting law, the condition of the bond is general; and though the sheriff is required to recommit a prison bounds debtor to close jail at the expiration of a year from the date of the bond, and is responsible if he fail to do so, (1 Rev. Code of 1819, ch. 135, p. 547,) he is not responsible for the escape of the debtor; for, so long as the debtor remains within the bounds, there can be no escape; and if he breaks the bounds, the bond, which is general, protects the creditor.

340 *The idea that the sheriff, if held liable to the creditor for taking this bond, may sue the obligors in his own name and for his own benefit, cannot be supported. The bond is on its face a public bond, not a private one enuring to the individual benefit of the sheriff; Roane, J., in Meredith's adm'x v. Duval, 1 Munf. 84. If he is held liable, it must be for taking the bond without authority of law and contrary to the duty of his office, and therefore he can never be allowed to maintain a suit upon it for his own use. Syme v. Griffin, 4 Hen. & Munf. 277.

As to the verdict, under the express language of the act of assembly, and the decisions on the subject, the finding is clearly insufficient. In Hooe v. Tebbs, the same reasoning was offered in support of the verdict, that is employed to sustain the verdict here; and the issue there being not guilty, the response to that issue was a more direct finding of what the act requires, than results from the issue and verdict in the present case. There is no foundation for the distinction attempted between the action here and that in Hooe v. Tebbs. This, not less clearly than that, is an action for the escape of an execution debtor. And it is for the court to determine whether one rule shall be applied to an action against the sheriff for an escape, and another to an action against the sheriff and his sureties for the same cause. This court decided, in Perkins and others v. Giles governor, that the measure of damages in the action on the sheriff's official bond is the same as in the action on the case; which was the form of action in Hooe v. Tebbs, where the special finding was held indispensable. It would be strange indeed if not only the sheriff, but his sureties, whose obligation is strictissimi juris (M'Dowell v. Burwell's adm'r, 4 Rand. 317), should be held chargeable in the action on the official bond, upon less evidence or a finding less explicit than would be necessary to 341 subject the sheriff *alone, in the action on the case, to precisely the same recovery. No distinction between the action of debt under the statute of escapes, and the action on the official bond, is at all to the purpose: to evade the authority of Hooe v. Tebbs, some substantial distinction must be found between the common law action on the case and the action on the official bond; and whether that authority is, at this distance of time, and after giving the rule of practice in all cases subsequently occurring, to be directly impeached and overruled, is a question submitted unhesitatingly, and without further remark, to the court.

The second breach assigned in the declaration was properly held insufficient. The allegation is merely that the sheriff, by taking a defective bond from the debtor, permitted him to escape, and that the relator, from the erroneous and defective form of the bond, was unable to recover his debt by virtue thereof, but was cast in an action brought by him founded thereon. There is no averment that the bond was void, or that it was decided by any court of competent jurisdiction to be so, nor is profert made of it, so that the court can judge whether it is so: it is not stated in what court the action thereon was instituted, who were the parties to that action, or when the judgment therein was rendered; no record is vouched, no sort of notice given by which the defendants may be enabled to answer the charge. Judge Roane's opinion in Hooe v. Tebbs, 1 Munf. 507, is no authority in support of such an assignment as this. The bond taken by the sheriff in that case had been adjudged by the district court of Dumfries to be illegal and void, and the declaration expressly alleged that fact: and though judge Roane thought the decision of the district court wrong, and the bond not void, he held that the judgment, being in full force and unreversed, was conclusive to establish the liability of the sheriff. There is no resemblance between that case *and the case here alleged. The assignment is in truth every way and utterly defective. 1 Chitty's Pl. 354, 5; 2 Id. 181.

BALDWIN, J. The controversy in this case turned upon the validity of the bond for the prison rules taken by the sheriff. The question was directly and distinctly made by the first plea, which sets forth the bond and the prisoner's consequent admission to the prison bounds, with a special traverse of any other escape. The plaintiff's demurrer to the plea admitted that there was no other escape, and of course the only question presented was as to the validity of the bond.

The bond is objected to on the ground that it ought to have been made payable to the sheriff and his successors in office, instead of to the sheriff and his heirs and assigns; and the reason urged is, that in the event of an escape from a succeeding sheriff, the letter could not have assigned the bond to the creditor, as it is supposed the law contemplated. If we were to be governed by the letter of the statute, the bond could only be assigned by the sheriff who took it, the language of the law seeming to have been framed without adverting to the fact that the escape would not always be in the time of that sheriff; but the true meaning doubtless is that the assignment shall be made by the sheriff to whom the bond is made payable. Of course, if the bond were payable to the sheriff and his successors, and the escape occurred in the time of a successor, it would be competent for the latter to assign it to the creditor. So if the escape occurs in the time of the sheriff who took the bond, it is assignable by him, whether made payable to him and his successors, or to him and his representatives, or to him alone. Whether, if made payable to him and his representatives, or to him alone, it would be assignable by him, or, in the event of his death, by his executor or administrator, after an escape from 343 his *successor, I deem it unnecessary to enquire. No such question arises in this case. The law does not prescribe to whom the bond shall be made payable; and it matters not to whom, if it performs its legal function of making the obligors responsible for the escape of the prisoner. In this case, the escape, if any, occurred in the time of the sheriff who took the bond; for it was assigned by him while sheriff to the creditor, as appears from the assignment on the bond incorporated into the plea; and it would be strange indeed if the mere possibility of an inconvenience, which in point of fact never occurred, were to have the effect of invalidating the bond, or subjecting the sheriff for an escape. Such a bond and assignment were expressly held to be good, and the surety for the bounds subjected thereupon, in the case of Meredith's adm'x v. Duval, 1 Munf. 76.

I think it extremely probable, as suggested by the counsel for the plaintiffs in error, that the objection to the bond taken in the circuit court was, that the condition does not provide for the prisoner's return to custody at the expiration of one year from the date of the bond; and that it was sustained by the court without adverting to the circumstance that there was no law requiring such a condition prior to the act of the 25th of February 1819, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 30, p. 534, which took effect on the 1st of January 1820. The bond in question bears date on the 28th of December 1819, and of course was not taken under the provisions of that act. Preexisting laws, by which this case must be governed, though they required the sheriff to recommit the prisoner to jail at the expiration of the year, and subjected him to a fine for his failure to do so, did not prescribe any other condition of the bond than that the prisoner should not depart or go out of the rules or bounds of the prison.

Besides the objections to the bond presented by the demurrer to the first 344 plea, that plea has been supposed *by the counsel for the defendant in error to be moreover defective, inasmuch as the prison rules for which bond was given, and to which the prisoner was admitted, are described in the plea as the prison rules and bounds for the county of Hardy, whereas the declaration and the plea itself shew that the execution against the prisoner issued upon a judgment of the superior court of that county. Whether this description in the plea, if we had nothing more to guide us, would be taken to mean the prison rules for the superior court, or for the county court of Hardy, we need not consider; for the bond itself being incorporated into the plea, and shewing upon its face that it was given for keeping the prison rules of the superior court of Hardy, the general description is thereby controlled and rendered specific, upon the authority of Meredith's adm'x v. Duval, above cited, in which a flagrant and otherwise fatal error in the declaration was cured by reference to the bond sued upon, which had been made part of the record by oyer thereof.

The question of the validity of the bond above considered, would also have been distinctly presented in another shape, by the demurrer of the defendants to the second breach in the plaintiff's declaration, if the bond had been set forth in that breach, or made a part thereof by profert and oyer. That not being so, we can only look to the breach itself, for the purpose of ascertaining whether that part of the declaration be good upon a general demurrer. The voluntary escape therein charged is referred altogether to the taking of a bounds bond, therein alleged to be defective and erroneous, but of which no profert is made or particular description given, though it is alleged that in consequence of the erroneous and defective form of the bond, the relator could not recover his debt, but was cast in an action brought by him founded upon the bond. Now it will be observed that there is no averment that the bond was void in law, or that it was held to be so by 345 any court of *competent jurisdiction.

The substance of the allegation is that the relator was defeated in an action upon the bond; but against whom the action was brought, in what court, or by what decision, if any, the relator was cast, is not averred. The relator's failure in his action could not subject the sheriff to an escape, unless it was by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, between proper parties, and upon the ground of the invalidity of the bond. None such is averred. It may be, for aught that appears, and as the pleadings in this cause would seem to indicate, that there was no escape from the bounds at all, and the relator may have been defeated on that very ground.

The foregoing views, if correct, serve to shew that the demurrer of the defendants to the second breach of the plaintiff's declaration was properly, and the plaintiff's demurrer to the first plea of the defendants improperly, sustained by the court. There ought, of course, to have been no judgment for the plaintiff.

The judgment rendered for the plaintiff was moreover wrong, because the verdict did not expressly find that the prisoner escaped with the consent or through the negligence of the sheriff. Our statute concerning escapes is clear and explicit, that no judgment shall be entered against any sheriff in any suit brought upon the escape of any debtor in his custody, unless the jury who shall try the issue shall expressly find that the prisoner did escape with the consent or through the negligence of the sheriff, or that he might have been retaken, and that the sheriff neglected to make immediate pursuit. This peremptory mandate applies to all actions against the sheriff, and of course his sureties, of whatever nature or form, founded upon an escape; and if not strictly complied with, the defect cannot be supplied by any intendment or conclusion, in favour of a general verdict, from the pleadings or issue; as was held by this court in Hooe v. Tebbs, 1 Munf. 501.

346 *My opinion upon the whole case is, that the judgment of the circuit court ought to be reversed, the verdict set aside, the plaintiff's demurrer to the first plea overruled, and judgment rendered for the defendants.

The other judges concurred. Judgment reversed.

Malone's Adm'r and Others v. Hobbs and Others.

November, 1842, Richmond.

Wills—Bill Contesting Validity of—Allegations.*—

Where a will has been admitted to probat, and a person interested appears within seven years afterwards and files a bill in chancery under the act 1 Rev. Code of 1819, ch. 104, § 18, it is sufficient in such bill to aver in general terms that the writing of which probat has been received is not the will of the decedent.

Same—Same—Misjoinder of Plaintiffs—Objection in Appellate Court.—

An answer to a bill contesting the validity of a will states, that some of the plaintiffs had accepted legacies and devises under the will; and the fact appears to be so by exhibits filed with the answer. After verdict and decree against the will, the objection is taken in an appellate court, that those parties had precluded themselves from disputing the validity of the will, and that as they are improperly joined with the other plaintiffs, the suit cannot be sustained. HELD, the objection will not avail.

Same—Same—Devisavit Vel Non†—Evidence—Declaration of Legatee—Competency.—

On the trial of an issue whether a writing, admitted to probat as a will, be the will of the decedent or not, the evidence against the will consists of statements by witnesses, of what a legatee told them had passed on one occasion when he and the decedent were together. That legatee is one of many defendants, and it does not appear that he refused to testify. The admissibility of such evidence questioned before the appellate court by counsel, but not decided.

Same—Same—Same—Revocation—Destruction of Codicil.—

On the trial of an issue whether a writing,

Wills—Bill Contesting Validity of—Allegations.—

The principal case is cited in Dower v. Church, 21 W. Va. 45, to the point that the bill need not set out as fully the facts on which the plaintiff claims that the paper which has been probated as the will, is not the will of the decedent, as it would have to do under the general rules governing equity pleadings; but that it will suffice in such a bill to aver in general terms, that the writing of which probate has been received is not the will of the decedent.

†Devisavit Vel Non—Object of Issue.—The principal case is cited in Penn v. Ingles, 82 Va. 65, to the point that, in ordering an issue devisavit vel non, the chancellor does not exercise any of the ordinary powers of a chancery court, but acts in obedience to the express mandate of the statute: the object of the issue being to ascertain, by means of a jury trial, whether or not the will admitted to probate is, in whole or in part, the will of the decedent. When that question is decided the function of the suit is exhausted, and the verdict is binding upon the court, unless for good cause shown it is set aside, either at the trial or afterwards, on a bill of review.

The principal case is cited in this connection in Connolly v. Connolly, 32 Gratt. 663; Kirby v. Kirby, 84 Va. 629, 5 S. E. Rep. 539; Lamberts v. Cooper, 29 Gratt. 66; Dower v. Church, 21 W. Va. 44; French v. French, 14 W. Va. 486. See Coalter v. Bryan, 1 Gratt. 18. See foot-notes to Lamberts v. Cooper, 29 Gratt. 61; Coalter v. Bryan, 1 Gratt. 18.

admitted to probat as a will, was the will of the decedent or not, it appeared that the decedent had made a codicil to his will, and that the codicil was afterwards destroyed by his direction.

347 The evidence tended to *shew that the will was written on one sheet of paper, and the codicil on another; that the will was left with one person, and the codicil with another; and that the will and codicil were with those persons respectively, at the time the codicil was destroyed. The circuit court instructed the jury, that if they believed from the evidence, that the decedent intended, at the time of destroying the codicil, thereby to destroy or revoke the will, in that case the destruction of the codicil was a revocation of both the will and codicil. HELD, this instruction was erroneous.

Same—Revocation—Direction to Destroy.‡—Although a testator has directed his will to be destroyed, and believes that it has been destroyed as requested, yet if it be not in fact destroyed, such direction and belief will not operate as a revocation of the will, even in relation to the personal estate.

David M. Malone of Greensville county made his will on the 29th of April 1833, whereby, after desiring that all his just debts might be paid, he devised a tract of land on which he lived to be equally divided between his aunt Elizabeth Wyche's children and his aunt Sally Davis's, that is, one moiety to his aunt Wyche's children, and the other half to his aunt Davis's children. He bequeathed his negro man Peter to William H. Hobbs senior, and his two negroes Charlotte and Mason, with their future increase, to Franky Wilkins; and he also made devises and bequests to Edmunds Mason, Frances Mason his wife, John Y. Mason, George Mason, Eliza the wife of James B. Mallory, Lawrence G. Heath, James E. Mason and James M. Wall. At the time of making this will, the testator was unmarried; but afterwards, to wit, in November 1834, he married Ann Wilson. There was no child born of the marriage; and in January 1837 the testator died. On the sixth of March 1837, the will was proved in the court of Greensville county by M. H. Hobbs and William F. Hobbs the two attesting witnesses, and admitted to record; and John Y. Mason the ‡Wills—Revocation.—The opinion of JUDGE BALDWIN in the principal case, discussing the subject of the revocation of wills, is quoted in Dower v. Seeds, 28 W. Va. 135, 136, 137, 138.

Same—Same—Belief as to Destruction.—In a note in 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (1st Ed.) p. 273, it is said: "The fact that the testator was deceived into believing that the will was destroyed, as required by the statute to work a revocation, will not revoke it if such was not the case. Clingan v. Mitcheltree, 31 Pa. St. 25; Boyd v. Cook, 3 Leigh 32; Malone v. Hobbs, 1 Rob. 366; Hise v. Fincher, 10 Ired. (N. Car.) 139."

Thus, it was held in Boyd v. Cook, 3 Leigh 32, that where a blind testator orders a will made by him to be destroyed, and believes it is destroyed accordingly, but it is not destroyed, and no act towards destruction done, this is not a revocation by destruction or cancellation, within the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 3. At least, a court of probate cannot consider this as amounting to a revocation.

executor named in the will having declined the executorship, administration with the will annexed was granted to Edmunds Mason. The testator's widow died soon after, and in May 1837 administration on her estate was granted to Baxter R. Wilson.

348 *Thornton P. Wyche and others, as children of Elizabeth Wyche, filed a bill in the court of Greenesville county against Elizabeth Malone and others, as children of Sally Davis, setting forth the devise to the children of Elizabeth Wyche and of Sally Davis, and asking a decree for a division of the tract of land devised, or for a sale of the same and a division of the proceeds. The bill was duly answered, and the cause being heard, a decree was pronounced in October 1837, under which a sale was made and the proceeds divided; and the report of the sale and division was confirmed in November 1837.

The negroes Charlotte and Mason were, under an order from Frances Wilkins of the 5th of October 1837, delivered to William Wilkins the 1st of January 1838.

In July 1839, a bill was filed in the circuit court of Greenesville, under the act in 1 Rev. Code of 1819, p. 378, § 13, contesting the validity of the will. The decedent having left no descendants, no father, mother, brother or sister, no descendant of his mother or of any brother or sister, and no grandfather or grandmother, the suit was brought by uncles and aunts and their descendants, to wit, by William H. Hobbs and Martha his wife, and others. Among the plaintiffs were Franky Wilkins and the children of the decedent's aunts Elizabeth Wyche and Sally Davis. The only allegations in the bill impeaching the validity of the will, were in these terms: "Your complainants deem it unnecessary to refer your honour to the various bequests contained in said paper, or to allude to the remarkable fact that a sensible man should die with such a will, his wife living, and not the least preparation of any kind made for her comfort and support. Your complainants think it only necessary to state their thorough conviction, and they therefore charge, that said paper was not the will of David M. Malone." The prayer of the bill was for an issue devisavit vel non, and that the court would set aside the will. Edmunds Mason as administrator with the will annexed and in his own right, 349 Frances Mason *his wife, John Y. Mason, George Mason, James B. Malory and Eliza his wife, Lawrence G. Heath, James E. Mason, James M. Wall, and Baxter R. Wilson administrator of the widow, were made defendants.

Edmunds Mason answered, saying, he was unable to comprehend from the bill on what ground the validity of the will was contested; stating the acts before mentioned of Mrs. Wyche's children, Mrs. Davis's children, and Franky Wilkins, (which were proved by exhibits filed with the answer,) and relying upon those acts as a recognition of the validity of the will. He then proceeded to set forth such circumstances as he knew in relation to the testamentary dispositions of the testator. John Y. Mason also, in his answer, detailed such circumstances as were in his knowledge. But these answers not being evidence in favour of the defendants,* it is not deemed necessary or proper to narrate the circumstances set forth by them.

None of the other defendants answered except Baxter Wilson the brother and administrator of the widow, who stated that Edmunds Mason, the principal legatee in the will of Malone, did, soon after the death of Malone, by deed of gift (which respondent filed with his answer) generously convey to the brothers and sisters of Mrs. Malone all the slaves which Malone acquired by his marriage.

The cause (after a previous trial elsewhere, on which the jury disagreed) was removed to the circuit court of Petersburg, and an issue was directed to be tried on the common law side of that court, to ascertain whether the writing purporting to be the will of Malone was in fact his valid will. The trial took place on the seventeenth and eighteenth of November 1841.

At the trial, the bill, answers and exhibits were read to the jury, and on motion of the plaintiffs the court instructed 350 *the jury that the answers were not evidence for the defendants, except so far as they were responsive to the bill. The defendants, in support of the issue on their part, adduced the following evidence: 1. The will and the probat thereof. 2. They proved by the subscribing witnesses to the will, that at or about the date thereof, and when the testator was unmarried, he came to their store, one morning before breakfast, from the direction in which he lived, produced the writing, and requested them to witness it; which, upon due acknowledgment thereof by him, they did, by subscribing their names thereto in his presence. One of the said witnesses further stated that D. M. Malone lost his parents when quite young; that he went to live with Edmunds Mason who was his guardian, and remained there till of age; and that he always expressed great affection and respect for Mr. Mason.

The plaintiffs then introduced the following witnesses:

1. Jarrett Weaver; who deposed, that he was sent for to see the testator in his illness, and after some conversation about his situation, between the testator and witness, and between testator and Dr. Parham, witness asked him, "Have you made that disposition of your property which you wish if you should die?" He said, he had not. Witness then asked him if the law would dispose of his property as he wished? He replied, it would not. Witness then urged him to make his will without losing any time. He said he would do so the next morning. But he died before it was done. The next morning, witness went over to the testator's, and found E. Mason there. Witness said to him, "I suppose judge" (meaning the testator,) "has died without making any provisions for his wife, as he has left no will." E. Mason replied, "Yes, he has; there is a will in John Y. Mason's hands:" and then went on to remark, that after the making of 351 the will, the testator *purchased two negro boys of David Watkins; that, being taken ill at William Hobb's, testator sent for him (E. Mason) to see him; that he went down, and the next day testator was carried back to his (E. Mason's) house; that, at his house, testator requested him to write a will giving him (E. Mason) those two boys; that he (Mason) told him, he did not know that it would be worth while to write a will, saying, "You have a will, and a codicil will answer;" to which testator assented, whereupon he (E. Mason) wrote a codicil giving to himself those two boys, and testator had the codicil witnessed: that the first time Malone came, after his marriage (which he did shortly thereafter), to his (E. Mason's) house, he (E. Mason) took the paper or papers (witness did not remember whether he said paper, or papers) in his hand, and coming into the room where the testator was, said in a jocular way, "Well, judge, you are married now, I suppose we may as well destroy those papers." Testator replied, "Yes, destroy them; they are of no force now;" and he (E. Mason) threw the codicil into the fire. Witness is certain that the expression which E. Mason told him he used to the testator was, "I suppose we may as well burn those papers," and that the reply he said the testator made was, "Destroy them; they are of no force now." The witness mentioned that dr. Parham and himself were called on by John Y. Mason at the time the will was proved, to go before the court, and testify to what they had heard the testator say. He also mentioned an expression of the testator, disapproving the conduct of a man who had not made, as he thought, proper provision for his wife.

2. Thomas Jones; who deposed to similar expressions by the testator about that same person, and a declaration by him that he would rather his wife should have what he had, than any other person. He never heard testator speak of having a will.

352 *3. B. R. Wilson, one of the defendants; who deposed to a conversation with testator shortly before his death, in which he said, "that he had made no preparation for this world or the next; that he wished witness to take charge of his affairs;" and further deposed as follows: "The day after Malone's death, very early in the morning, mr. E. Mason came to Malone's. In the course of that day or the next, he shewed me the will of mr. Malone; that is, I took it to be his will, not having my attention drawn to the fact. Mr. Mason spoke of it as a will. I heard, I think, from him or some other person, that he (mr. Mason) had sent for it to John Y. Mason's. I saw mr. Mason's old servant ride up, before I saw the will. I did not see any communication between him and mr. Mason. I never heard Malone speak of having a will."

4. Dr. Thomas Parham, the attending physician of the testator in his last illness, who had been living in testator's family for several years before his death. He heard testator say, about four or six weeks before his last illness, that he intended to leave all his property to his wife. The night before his death, after some conversation about his situation, he remarked that he would not die without a will, or making a will, (witness does not recollect which,) for some large sum of money which he named. Witness then offered to bring pen, ink and paper, that one might be written. He said he would put it off till the next morning, when he would do it the first thing. But he died just before light the next morning. After mentioning the terms on which he and the testator were, and the happy manner in which the testator and his wife lived together, the witness deposed, that in a conversation which took place between himself and E. Mason at David M. Malone's residence, the day after his death, Mason asked the witness if David M. Malone had done any act which would revoke a will?

stating that there was a will in the possession of J. Y. *Mason. Witness told him he did not know what was sufficient to revoke a will; but went on to tell him what had passed the night before D. M. Malone's death, as above mentioned. In that conversation mr. Mason told witness, that David M. Malone had made a codicil to his will, which disposed of negroes acquired after making his will, and that the first time he came to his (E. Mason's) house a few weeks after his marriage, he (Mason) said to testator, in substance, (witness cannot depose to the words), "I suppose the paper or papers are of no use now," and that testator replied, "Yes, destroy or burn them," (witness does not recollect which,) "I have got somebody else to leave my property to now." Witness never heard Malone speak of having a will. He also stated a remark made by Malone, some ten or twelve months before his death, indicating that he thought it possible his wife was pregnant.

5. John Ezell; who deposed to a conversation with testator after his marriage, at a time when (using the language of the witness) he was "a little drinky," in which conversation testator asked witness if he had made a will, and witness saying no, testator replied, "Nor I either, but I intend to make one; for every man ought to have a will."

6. John Powell; who deposed that in the spring before testator's death, he heard testator say that he intended to give all his property to his wife in case of his death. He also mentioned a remark by the testator on some occasion, disparaging to E. Mason.

7. William Lucas; who mentioned a conversation with the testator after his marriage, in which he intimated that he thought the Mason family did not like his marrying, and declared that if he were to die, he would give his wife every thing he had.

8. H. L. S. Batte; who mentioned a conversation between him and the testator, in which, the witness having informed him that he had a will by which he left 354 *all his property to his wife in case she had no children, testator said, he did not have a will, but intended to make one to the same effect, as he thought it a good will.

9. Baxter R. Wilson, Thomas F. Jones, M. H. Hobbs and William H. Hobbs; who stated that they had heard the testimony of Jarrett Weaver, and that he made statements to them to the same effect, soon after Malone's death.

The defendants on their part, to rebut the evidence of the plaintiffs, then introduced the following:

1. The deposition of Nathaniel Young, who, since giving it, has died. This witness deposed, that in the last week of November 1835, he was at the house of John Y. Mason in the county of Southampton, and David Malone came to said Mason's, where he spent the day and staid all night. He slept in the same bed with deponent. While in bed, Malone asked deponent what could be the reason that his wife would not have a child? to which deponent said, "The reason is that you are deficient and cannot perform your part." Malone replied it was not his fault, but there was a defect or disease about his wife that would certainly prevent her from breeding, and he had made up his mind never to alter his will unless his wife had a child. Deponent then asked him if he kept a will by him, to which Malone answered, "Cousin John Y. wrote my will before I was married, and had it to take care of for me, and I am determined never to take it out of his possession or alter it, unless my wife shall have a child; for there is a blamed set of folks gaping around me for what they think I will give them, but they shall be disappointed." Deponent then, in a joking manner, asked Malone if he had remembered him (deponent) in making his will? He replied no, he had given his property to those who had been his best friends; and stated that he had given his cousin John Y. some negroes, to doctor

355 *George Mason a boy and his old horse Baptist, to Eliza Mallory wife of colonel J. B. Mallory, a negro man, to James M. Mason of Tennessee some negroes and a debt due him, to Lal Heath he had given his bounds and rifle and some other property; that he had given his lands to two of his aunts, and he had given mr. W. Hobbs a legacy, and all the rest of his estate of every kind he had given, as he had always intended, to his uncle Edmunds Mason, who had been a father to him.

(After the reading of this deposition, the plaintiffs proved that Young, in a former trial, had stated in his evidence, that after he and Malone had gone to bed, testator mentioned the circumstance of his wife's health, and said he thought she would never have a child, and did not think she would live long. The plaintiffs examined several witnesses to prove that mrs. Malone was in good health until a few months before her death. And the defendants admitted that Young was about 60 or 70 years old, and the brother of mrs. Edmunds Mason.)

2. Josiah Holleman; who deposed to mr. Young's being a man of unexceptionable character, and of uncommonly tenacious memory as to dates, places, names and circumstances. Mr. Young was the clerk of Isle of Wight county until his death.

3. Robert M. Boykin; who was at John Y. Mason's on the occasion referred to by mr. Young. His statement is as follows: "I retired about 11 o'clock. On ascending the stairs, I heard mr. Malone and mr. Young in conversation. I did not understand on what subject they were conversing. I well recollect waking several times during the night, and at each time they were in conversation. I recollect distinctly asking mr. Young what he and mr. Malone could find to talk about on the occasion alluded to; and added, that they could not have slept any that night. Mr Young replied that they did not sleep much; for David was telling 356 him, nearly *the whole night, of his will, and of an affection of his wife.

I do not recollect the precise time that these questions were propounded to mr. Young, but believe it was the next day." Boykin stated that he was a son in law both of mr. Young and of Edmunds Mason.

4. Nathaniel P. Young; who was also at John Y. Mason's on the occasion referred to by his father. He stated that about 9 o'clock at night, Malone asked his father to walk out with him. They left the room. His father soon returned, said that David wished to sleep with him, and went off to bed. Shortly afterwards, doctor George Mason and the witness retired to a room adjoining the one in which his father and Malone were. The statement of the witness is then as follows: "They were in conversation when we retired, and continued it so long as I was awake. When my father and myself arrived at home, I enquired what could have engaged him and David so much in conversation when they slept together at judge Mason's. His answer was, that David (or the judge, as he called him) was talking of his will. This was in my father's chamber. He said nothing of the provisions of Malone's will, or the disease of his wife, as there were ladies present.

5. William H. E. Merritt; who travelled to Mississippi with Malone in the winter of 1832-3. Malone, he said, frequently spoke in terms of great affection and respect of Edmunds Mason and his family; and the witness, from what he saw (being with him at the houses of two of his relations) thought that he had unkind feelings towards some of his relations there.

6. Benjamin Myrick; who deposed, that he heard Malone say before his marriage, that there was a set gasping after his property; that Malone spoke of giving a negro girl to a little daughter of witness, and witness said, "You had better give me Jim for a gardener." Malone replied, "I can't do that; aunt Mason would blow me up." He said he had promised him to his aunt Mason (meaning the wife of Edmunds Mason).

357 *7. Norphlet L. Pond; whose respectability and character for veracity were deposed to by Dr. Orris A. Brown and Benjamin Myrick. Pond deposed, that while at work at E. Mason's on a cotton gin, before D. M. Malone was married, witness was sent for and requested by testator to witness a paper. He and Mr. Mason's overseer (Davis) witnessed it. It was on a small piece of paper, and witness saw nothing but the name "Cynthia." He did not know what it was. In March before testator's death, witness went to his house to have a settlement with him, and witness and testator went hunting. Testator advised witness to get married, saying he had been much happier since he was a married man, and would be more so but for his wife's situation. In the course of the evening, testator said he had a will, and did not intend to be without one, (he did not say where his will was;) that there were a set of fools gasping after his property, who should never have it. He did not say who they were. He said, he never expected his wife to have a child. After testator told witness he had a will, witness asked him what the paper was he had witnessed? He said, it was a codicil to his will, but it was then of no account, as it had been burnt or destroyed.

After which the plaintiffs read a deposition previously given by Pond, in which, in answer to the question whether he was ever called on by David M. Malone to attest any testamentary paper or writing, he said, "I witnessed a piece of paper, about the size of the caption of this deposition, which he afterwards told me was a codicil to his will, and which devised certain negroes after he had made his will. This paper was executed before the marriage of the said David M. Malone, and bequeathed those negroes to the defendant E. Mason." And now upon cross examination, being asked by the plaintiffs' counsel, how it was that in his deposition he stated that the paper he witnessed be-358 queathed certain *negroes to E. Mason, and that he now states he does not know what was in it (the paper), he said in answer, that he had no explanation; his deposition and evidence would speak for themselves.

In the same deposition, being asked whether he ever had any conversation with Malone about his will after his marriage, he said, "I did. About 10 or 12 months before his death, he was advising this deponent to get married, said he had been happier since his marriage, that there were some people gasping after his property who should never have it, that he had made his will and never intended to be without one. He did not designate who they were, or call any names. The said Malone's wife was in bad health, and he told this deponent that he never expected any child. Mrs. Malone was very ill when David M. Malone died, and survived him but a few weeks. David M. Malone was much attached to E. Mason and L. G. Heath, which attachment was never interrupted." And now upon cross examination, being asked by the plaintiffs' counsel, whether Mrs. Malone was in bad health when he and the testator went hunting? and having answered that he did not know whether she was or not, the witness was then asked to account for the fact that he had stated in his deposition that she was in bad health at that time. He answered, that he did not know any thing about it, except that David M. Malone told him.

In the same deposition, being asked whether he ever heard from Malone where his will was, or any thing about his will, he said, "I never did. I heard him say he had one." And being further asked how often did he ever hear David M. Malone speak of his will, he said, "Never but once, and that as stated above." And now upon his cross examination, being asked by the plaintiffs' counsel, if he did not say, on the first trial of this cause, that he had had several conversations with Malone on the subject of his 359 will, he replied that he might *have said so. If he did, he meant that they were all the same evening. He does not recollect whether he said they were all on the same evening or not, at the first trial, because he does not recollect that the question was asked.

In the same deposition, being asked whether D. M. Malone ever told him what became of the codicil, he answered, "He never did. He told me after his marriage that that paper was then of no account." And being further asked whether he gave any reason why the codicil to his will was then of no account, he answered, "He did not." And now upon his cross examination, being reminded of his stating that Malone told him that the codicil was burnt or destroyed, and being asked how he accounted for having sworn in his deposition positively that he did not tell what had become of it, he answered, that after giving his deposition, in reflecting, he recollects that Malone did tell him the codicil was burnt or destroyed.

The defendants moved the court to give the two following instructions to the jury: 1. If the jury believe that the will was written on a sheet of paper, and the codicil on another sheet or piece, then the mere destruction of the codicil did not revoke the will. 2. If the jury believe that the testator intended, at the time of destroying the codicil, to destroy or revoke the will, but reserved the destruction or revocation thereof as matter to be afterwards carried into effect, and did no further act to revoke or destroy it, in that case the destruction of the codicil, though done with the intention thereafter to revoke or destroy the will, did not amount to a revocation or destruction of the will. And the plaintiffs opposed the same. But the court gave both instructions.

The court, however, on the motion of the plaintiffs, added the following:—But if the jury believe from the evidence, that Malone directed the will to be destroyed, and thought that it was destroyed as requested, the 360 *court then instructs the jury that the said will, so far as it related to the personal estate, was revoked in law, although it might not in fact have been destroyed. Moreover, if they shall believe from the evidence, that Malone intended, at the time of destroying the codicil, thereby to destroy or revoke the will, in that case the destruction of the codicil was a revocation of both the will and codicil. To the instruction so added by the court, the defendants excepted.

On the 19th of November 1841, a verdict was found against the validity of the will. When the jury rendered their verdict, they requested permission to state in open court, and did state, that they did not design or intend by their said verdict to cast the least censure on the conduct or character of Edmunds Mason or John Y. Mason, but that their verdict resulted from the opinion, unanimously held by them, that David M. Malone, in the act of destroying the codicil to his will, intended thereby to revoke or destroy the will also. And the court, uniting with the jury in exempting Edmunds Mason and John Y. Mason from all censure, did, with the consent of parties, make a memorandum to this effect part of the record.

The defendants, after the rendition of the verdict, moved the court to certify that the verdict was against evidence; but the court overruled the motion, and the defendants excepted to the opinion. The evidence was spread upon the record; and the same was, by consent, taken as a statement of the facts proved on each side.

On the 4th of December 1841, the defendants moved the court for a new trial of the issue; but the court overruled the motion. Whereupon the cause coming on to be heard, the court decreed that the paper admitted to record in Greenville county court, at March term 1837, as the last will and testament of David M. Malone, be set aside and declared null and void.

From this decree an appeal was allowed.

361 *Robinson for appellants. The general rule is, that a will once executed remains in force unless revoked by some act done by the testator animo revocandi; such as burning, cancelling, making a new will or the like. 1 Williams on Executors 92. By what act has the will of the decedent in this case been revoked? Not by making a codicil to it; for even if that had made a disposition of any part of the estate different from the will, it would only be a revocation pro tanto. Not by the marriage; for that without the birth of a child is no revocation. And not by any verbal declarations of the testator; for even if the will were of personalty merely, it would be protected by the provision in the statute declaring that "no will in writing or any devise therein of chattels shall be revoked by a subsequent will, codicil or declaration, unless the same be in writing." 1 R. C. 1819, p. 377, § 9. In the language of judge Roane, in Cogbill v. Cogbill & c, 2 Hen. & Munf. 512, the will submitted is to prevail unless a posterior will was not only contemplated but actually executed. "In the case," says he, "of a will of personalty, such a will remains in force under our statute, until legally revoked by another will in writing, conforming in other respects to the law as established on the subject. The question is therefore not whether the will submitted for probat is the last will the testator intended to execute, but whether, being once sanctioned as a will, it has been nullified by any subsequent act or testament."

In Jackson v. Kniffen, 2 Johns. Rep. 31, the will was one of lands, but the principle adjudged is equally applicable to a will of personalty; for, as Spencer, J., said, (p. 36,) "a will, whether of real or personal estate, cannot be revoked since the statute of 29 Charles II. by words alone." The declarations by the testator, of which evidence was offered in that case, were of the most solemn character, but the evidence was 362 rejected *as inadmissible, because such declarations could have no effect against the will.

Where, after a will is made, the circumstances occur of marriage and the birth of a child, the revocation of the will takes place in consequence of a rule or principle of law, independently altogether of any question of intention of the party himself, and consequently no evidence is admissible to shew an intention that it should not be revoked. Such is the unanimous opinion of the judges of England, pronounced after the profoundest argument and the maturest deliberation, in the late case of Marston v. Roe, 8 Adolph. & Ell. 14; 35 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 303. Where the only circumstance occurring after the will is that of marriage, and no revocation takes place in consequence of any rule or principle of law, parol evidence must be equally inadmissible to shew an intention to revoke. In the language of sir William Follett in the case just referred to, (p. 315,) "since the statute of frauds, the most direct expression of an intent to revoke avails nothing unless intimated by the means there pointed out." "Suppose," says Alderson, B. (p. 313), "the testator, after marriage, has clearly declared his intention that the will shall be revoked, and he afterwards changes his mind and declares his intention that it shall take effect, is the will ambulatory in the mean time? and where are such changes to stop?" "If," says Tindal, C. J., (p. 325,) "against the intention to revoke, which is presumed by law, parol evidence of a contrary intention could be admitted, such as evidence of conduct of the testator leading to the inference that he meant the will to stand, or of declarations to that effect, then it would be but reasonable to allow such evidence to be met and encountered by evidence of conduct of the testator leading to a different inference and of declarations contradictory to the former. And again, the admission of such evidence leads to this further difficulty, 363 *that if the testator changes his first intention and adopts a contrary one, which of the two intentions is to prevail? Is it to be the first, which is clearly proved, or is the latest formed intention, like the last will, to be allowed to predominate? It was precisely to preserve us from the perplexity and uncertainty of such conflicting evidence, both in the making and revoking of wills, that some of the provisions of the statute of frauds where expressly framed."

It is true that in the case of Marston v. Roe, the question related to the revocation or non-revocation of a will devising real property; and it may be said that in a case of personalty, where the question is as to what shall or shall not be a testamentary paper, or what shall or shall not amount to a revocation of a will, the evidence bearing on those points is frequently composed, in part, of the declarations of the party. The reason is, that under the law of England, and under the law of Virginia as it formerly stood, a will of chattels might be made or revoked by a writing not signed by the party or subscribed by any witness. Glasscock v. Smither &c., 1 Call 479. And declarations and other evidence were necessarily let in to shew that at the time of the writing there was the animus testandi or the animus revocandi. The writing offered as a will could not be valid where there was not the animus testandi, and the writing offered as a revocation could not be valid as a revocation where there was not the animus revocandi. So too where the will is alleged to be revoked by the testator's destroying, cancelling or obliterating the same, or causing it to be done in his presence, whether the will be of realty or personalty, two things must concur: there must first be shewn an act of destroying, cancelling or obliterating, and then it is secondly to be ascertained whether this act was done animo revocandi. And in all such cases the declarations of the testator, accompanying the act, are evidence to shew

364 the quo animo. This view *of the ground on which such declarations are admitted is adverted to by Woodworth, J., in Dan &c. v. Brown &c., 4 Cow. 490. "The execution of the will," he observes, "being established, the next question is, whether there was any evidence that it was cancelled. On this point, I lay no stress upon the declarations of the testator. They were made long after the execution of the will, and shortly before his death. They are not evidence unless they relate to the res gesta, or to an act done, as where by mistake the will is torn or thrown into the fire. The declaration of the testator are in such cases evidence, where they shew the quo animo. The act of cancelling is in itself equivocal, and will be governed by the intent." Moreover, if there was formerly any difference between the admissibility of parol evidence to shew a revocation of a will of realty, and the admissibility of such evidence to shew a revocation of a will of personalty, that difference must now be considered at an end, since the act of the 4th of March 1835. Sess. Acts. 1834-5, p. 43, ch. 60; Sess. Acts 1839-40, p. 50, ch. 57, § 2. Opinion of Stanard, J., in Barksdale v. Barksdale, decided in March 1842.

There being in this case no writing of any kind offered as a revocation of the will, one of the grounds above alluded to for admitting parol evidence, viz. to shew the intent at the time of the writing, is of course inapplicable to this case. And before the evidence can be received to shew the animus with which an act of destroying, cancelling or obliterating was done, such an act must be first established. The intent to destroy, cancel or obliterate will not suffice, unless the intent be carried into execution. Perkes v. Perkes &c., 3 Barn. & Ald. 489; 5 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 353; Winsor &c. v. Pratt &c., 2 Brod. & Bingh. 650; 6 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 299; Read v. Harris, 6 Adolph. & Ell. 209; 33 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 57; Jackson v. Betts, 9 Cow. 208; Means &c. v. Moore &c., Harper 314; 3 M'Cord 282. In a note at

365 *the end of the case of Reed v. Harris, it is stated that in a subsequent case between the same parties, upon nearly the same evidence, it was decided that the will was revoked as to copyhold lands. That subsequent case is in 8 Adolph. & Ell. 1; 35 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 299; and the reason of it is that the statute of 29 Car. 2, ch. 3, has been held not to apply to copyhold lands. See Attorney General v. Barnes & wife, 2 Vern. 597; Tuffnell v. Page, 2 Atk. 37; Doe v. Danvers, 7 East 299. But the reason for this decision as to copyhold lands does not apply in Virginia to any kind of estate known here, our statute declaring, as before mentioned, that no will in writing, even of chattels, shall be revoked by any subsequent declaration unless in writing. Accordingly, in Boyd &c. v. Cook, 3 Leigh 32, where the testator was a blind man, and the parties contesting the probat offered to prove an admission by a daughter of the testator, who had written his will, that she had been directed by her father to destroy the will, and that he believed it was done, the court of appeals held this not to be proof of revocation, and admitted the will to full probat as well in respect of personal as of real estate. Carr, J., said, "Mere parol directions given to a person to destroy the will can never satisfy the requisitions of the statute; and to suffer them, would be to incur the very danger the statute meant to avoid."

This decision of the court of appeals, and the other authorities before cited, have been disregarded by the circuit court. For the circuit court instructed the jury that if they believed from the evidence, that Malone directed the will to be destroyed, and thought that it was destroyed as requested, then the will, so far as it related to the personal estate, was revoked in law, although it might not in fact have been destroyed. And in this instruction the appellants insist there is manifest error.

The other instruction is a very curious one, in reference to the evidence, which 366 tended to shew that the *will was written on one sheet of paper, and the codicil on another, that the will was left with John Y. Mason and the codicil with Edmunds Mason, and that the will and codicil were in these places respectively at the time the codicil was destroyed. The instruction is, that if the jury believe from the evidence, that Malone intended, at the time of destroying the codicil, thereby to destroy or revoke the will, in that case the destruction of the codicil was a revocation of both the will and codicil. Now, if the two papers, instead of being a will and codicil, had been duplicates of the same will, and the court had instructed the jury that if they believed that the decedent, at the time of destroying one copy, intended thereby to revoke the will, the destruction of one copy was in such case a revocation of the will, such an instruction would be intelligible enough. But when the two papers, in different places, are of wholly different tenor, when one is a will and the other a codicil, and the paper destroyed is not the will but the codicil, it is difficult to comprehend how the destruction of the codicil can be a revocation of the will. If the will were destroyed, then the codicil being prima facie dependent on the will, the cancellation of the will is an implied revocation of the codicil. 1 Williams on Executors 76. But there is no foundation for the converse of this proposition. A will is not dependent on the codicil, and the cancellation of the codicil, so far from being a revocation of the will, is evidence rather that the will was intended to remain as it was before that codicil was made. If the intention to destroy a will be not sufficient to revoke it without an act destroying it, and if the destruction of a codicil in one place does not of itself destroy the will in a different place, it follows that the destroying the codicil, no matter with what intention, is not a revocation of the will. Yet the circuit court instructed the jury otherwise. And it was this instruction which caused the verdict that was found. *For the jury have declared that their verdict resulted from the opinion that the decedent, in the act of destroying the codicil to his will, intended thereby to revoke or destroy the will also.

With the verdict that was found, the court of chancery ought not to have been satisfied. It was without evidence to support it. The declarations of the testator, deposed to by the witnesses of the plaintiffs tended merely to shew that after his marriage he considered his will as not in force, and intended to make a will providing for his wife. They do not shew that there was any new will made, or any valid act of revocation. And the only other evidence adduced against the will consists of statements by Weaver and dr. Parham, of what Edmunds Mason told them had passed on one occasion when he and the decedent were together. The admissibility of such evidence as this is very questionable. Osgood v. The Manhattan Company, 3 Cow. 623; The Hartford Bank v. Hart, 3 Day 493, especially as it does not appear that Edmunds Mason was called on and refused to testify. See opinion of Bayley, J., in The King v. The Inhabitants of Hardwick, 11 East 590. But whether admissible or not, the statements are too vague and uncertain to have much weight against Edmunds Mason, and they are entitled to still less against the other legatees. They certainly ought not to be concluded by a verdict found upon the statements of one out of many legatees under the will, detailed second-hand, when even according to those statements there was no act destroying, cancelling or obliterating the will. But the case is not merely one in which there is an absence of evidence on the part of the plaintiffs to establish a revocation of the will. The testimony of several corroborating witnesses, adduced by the defendants, and relating to different times and conversations, shews the sense of the testator, long after the act of destroying the codicil, that the will was a subsisting will. Bates v. Holman, 3 Hen. & Munf. 502. Now we do not admit that the will is invalidated by an intent to burn it, even if such intent were established, (the will itself remaining in existence). But suppose the testator did intend it should be burnt, yet if he afterwards knew that it was in existence, and intended that it should stand for his will, evidence of this removes the effect of the other evidence shewing a previous intent to destroy the will. Burns v. Burns, 4 Serg. & Rawle 297.

In every aspect of the case, the decree should be reversed and the verdict set aside. And then the question will be whether a new trial shall be directed, or the bill dismissed.

The bill ought to state such facts as, admitting them to be true, are sufficient in law to make the will invalid; and this bill stating no such facts, we insist that it is for that reason defective, and ought therefore to be dismissed. Moreover, the plaintiff Franky Wilkins, and the children of mrs. Wyche and mrs. Davis, having by such cogent acts recognized the validity of the will, and the bill stating nothing to avoid the effect of those acts of recognition, those plaintiffs cannot be entertained in a court of equity. And then the objection arises, that the other plaintiffs having joined with themselves, as coplaintiffs, parties who are not entitled to sue, the suit cannot be sustained. Cuff v. Platell, 4 Russ. 242; 3 Cond. Eng. Ch. Rep. 651; Makepeace v. Haythorne, 4 Russ. 244; 3 Cond. Eng. Ch. Rep. 652; The King of Spain and others v. Machado and others, 4 Russ. 225; 3 Cond. Eng. Ch. Rep. 643.

Seddon for appellees. The instructions of the circuit court to the jury declare, that there being a will and codicil, the mere destruction of the latter does not prima facie involve the destruction or revocation of the former, nor will a destruction of the codicil, with intent at some future time to destroy the will, revoke the will;

*but that a destruction of the codicil, with a design by such act of destruction to vacate and cancel the whole instrument, will as well as codicil, will revoke and cancel both will and codicil. This principle applies as well to wills of realty as of personality. Under the third section of our statute of wills, 1 Rev. Code, p. 376, which follows as to this matter the sixth section of the english statute of frauds, we admit that no mere declaration of intention to revoke is sufficient; that the strongest declaration by words in præsentis will not answer; and that the intention to revoke, though prevented from being carried into execution by fraud, will be wholly unavailing. We admit, in short, that there must be either a written revocation, or an act destroying, cancelling or obliterating the will. But an act may be an effectual revocation, though the will be neither totally destroyed nor wholly obliterated; there may be a slight act, only cancelling a part or obliterating a clause, which will yet operate to revoke the will, because done with that intent: while, on the other hand, the most positive act destroying or obliterating the whole instrument will be insufficient, if the intent to revoke be wanting. Instances of total cancellation are furnished in the cases of Scruby v. Fordham and others, 1 Add. 74; 2 Eng. Eccl. Rep. 34, and Moore &c. v. Moore &c., 1 Phill. 375; 1 Eng. Eccl. Rep. 109, of partial cancellation, in the cases of Sutton v. Sutton, Cowp. 812; Swinb. Pt. 7, § 16; Larkins and others v. Larkins and others, 3 Bos. & Pul. 16; Short v. Smith, 4 East 419. In all the cases, cancelling is regarded as an ambiguous act. Burtenshaw v. Gilbert, Cowp. 52; Smith &c. v. Cunningham, 1 Add. 448, 455; 2 Eng. Eccl. Rep. 175; Swinb. Pt. 7, § 16. It may consequently be explained by parol evidence. Opinion of Roane, J., in Bates v. Holman, 3 Hen. & Munf. 526. And the slightest act will revoke, where it appears to be done animo revocandi.

Bibb v. Thomas, 2 W. Bl. 1043; Boyd &c. v. Cook, 3 *Leigh 32. The conclusion from all the cases is, that there must be some act of cancellation; that whether such act be a revocation or not, depends on the intent; and that it shall either be a total or a partial revocation, as the testator intended. Now a codicil is part and parcel of the will, a substantive part of it, united to it, whether it be on the same or on a separate piece of paper. Swinb. 15; Bates v. Holman, 3 Hen. & Munf. 525; Acherley v. Vernon, Comyn 381; Hill v. Chapman, 1 Ves. jun. 407; Westcott and others v. Cady and others, 5 Johns. Ch. Rep. 334. The codicil republishes the will, and gives by implication new life and vitality to it. The effect of the codicil is to make the will speak as of the date of the codicil. Beckford v. Parnecott, Cro. Eliz. 493; 1 Wms. Saund. 277, e.; Crosbie v. MacDougal, 4 Ves. 616. And the will and codicil are so united that the cancellation or revocation of the will revokes prima facie the codicil. 1 Williams on Ex'ors 76. But this presumption may be repelled, as in Medlycott v. Assheton, 2 Add. 229; 2 Eng. Eccl. Rep. 280. The destruction, then, of the codicil must be placed on the same ground as the destruction of a substantive and independent clause of a will. And as the destruction of part of the will, though a revocation prima facie of only that part, may, by shewing the intent, operate as a revocation of the whole, so, though the destruction of the codicil is prima facie a revocation of the codicil only, yet upon shewing the intent, it may operate as a revocation of the will, as well as of the codicil. This intent sometimes appears from the nature of the provisions. If, for example, there be a particular provision in the will, and the codicil contain the same provision, a destruction of the codicil will be a destruction of that provision in the will. Utterson v. Utterson, 3 Ves. & Beam. 122. Here the codicil in respect to the slaves has the same effect as the residuary clause, and the testator at least intended a revocation pro tanto. The intent *may also be to revoke the whole, and may be shewn by circumstances. If in any case the destruction of a codicil with intent to revoke the will, can, upon shewing such intent, have the effect of revoking the will, it must have that effect here; for the jury have found such intent.

II. The circuit court has declared that the solemn direction by a testator that his will should be destroyed, and his belief that it was destroyed accordingly, are in law a revocation of a will of personalty. Before the statute of frauds, words were sufficient to revoke a will either of realty or personalty. 1 Wms. Saund. 278, h.; Simpson v. Kirton, Cro. Jac. 115. The provisions of the english statute are in 1 Williams on Ex'ors 59, 60. The virginian statute is more brief, but to the same effect; 1 R. C. p. 377, § 9. Under these statutes, something more is necessary than mere words; but less will do than would be required to revoke a will of realty. Words accompanied by conduct shewing an intent to revoke, are still sufficient to revoke a will of personalty. The whole effect of the statute is to prevent a revocation of such a will by words importing a present intent to revoke; but the direction to destroy the will, and the belief that it is destroyed accordingly, will still revoke it. Here the direction was to burn the papers (will as well as codicil), and the codicil was actually burnt. Such a direction applicable to both papers, and believed to have been complied with, would operate as a revocation of a will of personalty in England, and must have the same effect here. Doe v. Harris, 8 Adolph. & Ell. 1; 35 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 302. This, it is true, was a case of copyhold lands, which do not strictly come within the statute of frauds relating to realty; but what will revoke a will of copyholds will revoke a will of personalty. The decisions in the ecclesiastical courts shew clearly, that though words will not revoke, yet intention manifested by conduct will. Walcott v. Ochterlony, *1 Curteis 580; 6 Eng. Eccl. Rep. 398. And on this subject the ecclesiastical law is our law. Redford's adm'r v. Peggy and others, 6 Rand. 316; Worsham's adm'r v. Worsham's ex'or, 5 Leigh 589. In the case of Boyd &c. v. Cook, 3 Leigh 32, relied upon on the other side, the attention of judge Carr was confined to the clause of the statute relating to wills of realty, and the case does not overrule the doctrine of the ecclesiastical courts, that conduct, with present intention to revoke, will amount to revocation.

It is not proper to consider the act of 1835, (Sess. Acts 1834-5, p. 43, ch. 60,) as changing the mode of revocation. At common law, every instrument not under seal was capable of being orally dispensed with. After a will was required to be in writing, it might have been revoked by words until the statute of frauds. 1 Roberts on Wills, ch. 2, p. 193. And it must still be capable of being revoked in any manner which the statute allows. The requisition of greater formalities in the execution cannot of itself impose greater formalities in the revocation.

III. Parol evidence is clearly admissible to shew the intent with which an act was done; and for this purpose declarations accompanying the act, or made subsequently, may be received. Then as to the declarations of Edmunds Mason, though it is true that a party to a suit cannot be compelled to give evidence, yet declarations of any party contrary to his interest may be received. The King v. Inhabitants of Harwick, 11 East 578; Burton &c. v. Scott &c., 3 Rand. 399. Such evidence is received on the principle that the statements are against the interest of the party, and that he cannot be compelled to testify.

IV. This being a case of conflicting evidence, was peculiarly proper for a jury. The verdict should not be set aside merely because the judges would, if on the jury, have found differently.

373 *V. There was no necessity to set forth in the bill the grounds of the proceeding. All that is necessary is to set forth what entitles the plaintiffs to the relief required. Besides, there was no demurrer on this ground, but an answer. Had there been both demurrer and answer, the answer would have overruled the demurrer. Jones v. Earl of Strafford, 3 P. Wms. 81; Clark v. Phelps and others, 6 Johns. Ch. Rep. 214.

VI. It is no objection to a suit that the title of one of the plaintiffs is destroyed, provided there remains on the record a plaintiff whose title to relief is consistent with the claim of the other, and is not affected by its failure. The authorities cited on the other side are not applicable, because there the plaintiffs claimed a joint demand arising out of contract, and either the claim had no existence, or it was joint. Such cases are analogous to those at common law, where plaintiffs suing on a contract alleged to be made with them jointly, must sustain the demand as alleged. But here there are separate and distinct interests, and the utmost that would be proper would be to dismiss the bill as to the party having no interest. But in fact there is an interest existing in all the plaintiffs, either as devisees and legatees, or as heirs and distributees. The ground is merely that there is an equitable bar, not that any of the plaintiffs ought not to be parties. And the objection moreover is not made by plea, but only by the answer. It is like the case of an answer setting up that one of the plaintiffs is paid. Story's Eq. Pl. § 203; Wilkinson v. Parry, 4 Russ. 272; 3 Cond. Eng. Ch. Rep. 662. The case of Dickinson v. Davis and others, 2 Leigh 401, is also an authority against the objection.

Robinson adverted to the two cases relied upon as establishing that words accompanied by conduct shewing an intention to revoke are sufficient. He remarked, that from the opinion in Doe v. Harris, 35 374 Eng. C. L. R. *302, it appeared, that the statute of frauds was held not to apply, and the conduct in that case was considered as equivalent to words, and as revoking because words would have been sufficient to revoke. The other case, (Walcott v. Ochterlony, 6 Eng. Eccl. Rep. 398,) he said must have been decided upon the ground that there was such a writing as satisfied the requisitions of the statute; the ecclesiastical courts going farther in holding particular writings sufficient, than the courts of Virginia would go. But here there is no writing, and it is conceded that mere words will not do.

Gholson for the appellees. Though the 3d section of our statute points out the only modes which a will of realty may be revoked, it is not true that every way in which a will of personalty may be revoked is prescribed by the 9th section. This section only declares that a subsequent will, codicil or declaration, in order to revoke, must be in writing; which is, in substance, that a will of personalty shall not be revoked by words only. The destruction of a will of realty must be in the presence of the testator. Will it be contended that the burning a will of personalty by direction of the testator, though not in his presence, is not a valid revocation? Surely not. The mere declaration "I revoke my will," the mere attempt to make a nuncupative will, will not revoke a will of personalty. These are mere words. But a positive direction to destroy is the act of the testator, and if carried into effect, is, so far as relates to personal estate, a valid revocation. And a testator having the right to revoke in this way, if a fraud be practised upon him, the will nevertheless will stand revoked as to chattels. It is certain that Malone burnt, or caused to be burnt in his presence, the codicil to his will. This was no declaration; it was a solemn act. Was this act done in obedience to his orders to destroy 375 his will? If so, upon what principle can it be contended *that this would be a revocation by words only? or in what respect would this revocation violate either the letter or spirit of the 9th section? It was no will, no codicil, no declaration, but an act of the most unequivocal character. The remark quoted from the opinion of judge Carr in Boyd &c. v. Cook, 3 Leigh 32. is made upon the 3d section, and the attention of the court in that case was not directed to the 9th section. The question, moreover, judge Carr said would be considered still open. Walcott v. Ochterlony, 6 Eng. Eccl. Rep. 398, should therefore have the weight to which it is entitled, unimpaired by the opinion in Boyd &c. v. Cook. And the point of that case is, that there was a present intention absolutely to revoke, manifested by something more than mere words.

Then as to the other instruction. No witness (except Young, whose testimony was disregarded by the jury) proves that the will had ever been in John Y. Mason's possession at all, and he does not prove that it was there at the destruction of the codicil. But wherever the will might in fact be, it is certain that Malone thought the will, as well as the codicil, was in the possession of Edmunds Mason, when he ordered him to destroy "those papers." Malone thought so on the very night of his death, when he called upon his brother in law to take charge of his affairs. He thought so on the occasions when he told his friends and companions he had no will. Is the instruction wrong? A codicil being part of the will, and the destroying a part of the will animo revocandi being a sufficient revocation of the whole, it follows that the destroying the codicil, with intent to revoke the will as well as codicil, is a revocation of both. Where there are duplicates of a will, and one is in the possession of the testator and the other in possession of a friend, the fact that the one is missing from the testator's possession works a revocation of the other. 4 Kent's Comm.

531; Colvin v. Fraser &c., 2 Haggard 376 266; *4 Eng. Eccl. Rep. 113; Boughey v. Moreton, 2 Lee 532; 6 Eng. Eccl. Rep. 231; Onions v. Tyrer, 2 Vern. 742; S. C.; 1 P. Wms. 346. Much stronger is the case where a codicil is destroyed with the belief and for the purpose of revoking and destroying the will.

Upon the other points, Gholson enforced the views presented by Seddon. If the instructions of the court were right, the verdict of the jury, he insisted, was not without evidence to sustain it. The bill was clearly sufficient; for upon it the court was obliged to direct the issue, and the decision of the question could not be withdrawn from the jury, by demurrer to evidence or in any other way. And there was no such improper joinder of plaintiffs as had been objected. Suppose, he said, all the legatees of an estate sue an executor, and he files with his answer receipts in full from several of the plaintiffs, this surely would not cause the bill to be dismissed as to the others. The principle contended for only applies where a plaintiff joins with him others who, according to their own shewing, are not entitled to sue.

Macfarland, in reply, argued, that this case strikingly vindicated the wisdom of the law which protected last wills and testaments from the frail memories and the machinations of witnesses. There was in truth nothing to authorize a grave suspicion that the testator intended to destroy his will, or directed it to be destroyed. The only foundation for such an opinion was the report by one of the witnesses, of a conversation held by him with a legatee; and even that was to be sought for, not in the general accuracy of the report, but in its minute and exact precision as to the terms employed by the legatee. It would be better to annul the law, than admit of exceptions broad enough to sanction such an experiment. The admissions of the legatee were not evidence. But admitting them, and granting the instructions, 377 *the evidence was not only too loose and imperfect to justify a verdict against the will, but should have induced an opposite finding.

2. Parol evidence, he said, was admissible to ascertain the intent of an equivocal cancellation or partial destruction, so as to determine whether the act was done for the purpose of revoking the will altogether or only in part, or was accidental, and so was not designed to have either operation. But an apparent partial destruction was necessary, to lay a foundation for the admission of such evidence; which had never been received to dispense with the factum of destruction, or to make it out when the instrument exhibited no traces of it. To allow evidence to impeach a will as destroyed, whilst the appearance of the instrument refuted the pretension, would leave it wholly at the mercy of witnesses. The necessity of an apparent act, tending to destruction, was shewn by all the cases. It was sufficient to refer to Read v. Harris, 33 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 57, when they are collected.

The general rule was admitted; but it was still contended that the destruction of the codicil, to which the testator assented, furnished the act or factum required to let in the evidence; upon the ground that the codicil was part of the will, and that the rule, properly understood, required nothing more than some significant act with which to connect the evidence. The answer was, that the factum which alone authorized a recourse to evidence, was something which had impressed itself on the will, and naturally suggested an enquiry as to the intent wherewith it was done; not something which the evidence brought to light, and which, without it, would be unknown. Any other hypothesis involved the absurdity of admitting evidence to prove the factum, at the same time that the ascertained existence of the factum was a prerequisite to the admission of evidence. The argument ran in a circle. It was plain that there 378 *was no practical, sensible restriction on the introduction of evidence, unless it be confined to marks or indications of destruction apparent on the will. So the rule had hitherto been expounded; and every consideration of policy was opposed to any relaxation of it. The argument founded on Doe v. Harris and Walcott v. Ochterlony had been already answered; and he enforced the views taken by Robinson of those cases. The idea of a factum, of which there was no trace on the instrument, serving to let in parol proofs, implied the efficiency of typical cancellation and destruction. It had no foundation in authority or principle.

It was not denied that a codicil was part of a will. Still the will was independent of the codicil, and would remain effectual notwithstanding its cancellation. Such was the general rule. In the present instance the will and codicil were on different papers, committed to separate custodies, and when the codicil was burned, it was not in the power of the testator to destroy the will if he had so wished. The will bore no marks of the testator's dissatisfaction with any of its provisions, and was to all appearance exactly such as might have been expected if the testator remained contented with it. Upon its face it was a complete and perfect instrument. The simple act of destroying the codicil raised no presumption against the efficacy of the will. And then the question was, whether it was admissible to prove the intent or impression of the testator as to the will, so as to extend the act of destruction to that? in other words, whether the evidence of witnesses, unaided by any inherent indications, was competent to prove that the will had been renounced? The question could admit of none but a negative answer. The case of Uttersen v. Uttersen, relied upon by the opposite counsel, was in perfect harmony with the rule. It proceeded on the ground that the cancellation of the codicil evinced a change in the testator's purposes towards his disinherited son; and that the intent to provide for him, implied thereby, ought to prevail over the correlative clause of the will. The cancellation of the codicil connected itself by internal evidence with the will; and the case, therefore, was not an authority for the appellees.

3. He insisted that the bill was imperfect in respect to all the requisites of a bill in equity, and ought to have been dismissed.

BALDWIN, J. The spirit of our statute law in regard to the making and revocation of wills, is, to restrain parol testimony on the subject within the narrowest practicable limits. Hence the solemnities of writing, signature, attestation. Revocations by cancelling or destroying the instrument arise naturally from the custody, control and dominion of the testator. Prescribed formalities in regard to them would be of little value, and would involve the necessity, in the event of nonobservance, of resorting to parol testimony for the purpose of setting up and establishing the ruined instrument; one of the very evils intended to be guarded against. Still, however, the statutes are not without their efficacy in relation to these as well as the other modes of revocation, by excluding the evidence of witnesses as to the conduct and declarations of the testator, except so far as they bear upon the permitted acts of revocation. This is obvious from the consideration, that, as nothing can supply the want of the acts of revocation, so nothing can extend them beyond the legal import and effect of the acts themselves. The act, however, of cancellation or destruction necessarily presents enquiries calling for or permitting the examination of parol proofs to a very considerable extent. The mere act most usually establishes itself; for if a will which had been executed by the testator, and retained in his custody, be found cancelled at his death, or after diligent enquiry cannot be found at all, the legal presumption is that it was cancelled or destroyed by himself. But then this presumption is liable to be repelled by proof that the act of cancellation or destruction was done by some one else, without his knowledge and consent. So too, as the mind of the testator must accompany his physical act, every such case is open to proof of a mistake in point of fact: as if he were to throw ink upon his paper instead of sand, or, having two wills by him of different dates, should direct one of them to be cancelled or burnt, and the person so directed should through misapprehension or inadvertence cancel or burn the other. Still further, if the act in question be not a substantive, independent act, but dependent upon another, the whole forming together one transaction, we must look to the entire design and purpose, in order to ascertain whether a revocation has been accomplished. Thus, where a testator knowingly cancels or destroys his will, but with the belief that he has substituted or is about to substitute another in its place, which consequential or preliminary object is defeated by some accident or mistake, preventing the execution, or the complete and perfect execution, or the valid effect of the new will; in such cases, the work of revocation is incomplete and ineffectual. The purpose must concur with the act. And in this sense it is that there must be the animus revocandi; the purpose to revoke by the adopted mode of revocation. But the purpose alone is unavailing, without performance of the act itself. A general intent of the testator to alter his will, or change the disposition of his estate; a particular design to cancel or destroy it; an abortive attempt to do the very act in question, even though prevented by accident, fraud or violence, do not affect the legal validity of the instrument. The will must be cancelled or destroyed. How far the work of destruction must proceed, is not yet settled. It would seem that where the testator has done all that he designed to do for the purpose of actual destruction, and believes that he has accomplished it, a literal compliance with the statute is not indispensable, Moore &c. v. Moore &c., 1 Phill. 375. A slight tearing and burning were held sufficient in Bibb v. Thomas, 2 W. Black. 1043. A mere scorching of the envelope, not extending to the will it embraced, was held insufficient in Reed v. Harris, 33 Eng. Com. L. R. 57. However this may be, I think it clear that a cancellation or destruction, to effect a revocation of the whole instrument, must be directed against the whole, or an essential part of it; otherwise it can amount only to that partial cancellation or obliteration so well established as being a revocation pro tanto only. Swinb. Pt. 7, § 16; 1 Williams on Ex'ors 73; Scruby v. Fordham &c., 1 Add. 78. If a will, whether written on one sheet of paper or several sheets, be torn up by the testator, or thrown into the fire, then it is manifest that the act of destruction is directed against the whole instrument, though only a part be destroyed, and that part a codicil only; but if the testator cancels or obliterates a particular clause, or destroys one of the sheets, retaining and preserving the rest, then his purpose to destroy a part only is equally clear, and the sole question is as to the validity and effect of what remains uneradicated; a question which may occur as to the whole residue of the instrument, or (as in Sutton v. Sutton, Cowp. 812; Larkins &c. v. Larkins &c., 3 Bos. & Pull. 16; Short v. Smith, 4 East 419,) as to the residue of a particular clause.

In the case before us, it was physically impossible that the act of destruction in question, the burning of the codicil, could have been directed against the will, inasmuch as the will was not present but in a different custody. And yet the court instructed the jury, that if the testator intended, at the time of destroying the codicil, thereby to revoke the will, in that case the destruction of the codicil was a revocation of both the will and the codicil. If this 382 be correct, it must be either *because a codicil is so essential a part of a will that its revocation necessarily involves the revocation of the will, (a ground too palpably wrong to require discussion, and not assumed by the appellees' counsel, nor by the circuit court); or because the destruction of a codicil, without any the slightest destruction of the will, or any attempt to destroy it, or even an intent to destroy it, must have the effect of revoking the will, if so intended by the testator. This last proposition, it seems to me, requires but little consideration after what has been already said. To place it in the strongest light for the appellees, let us suppose that the testator, at the time of burning the codicil, expressly declared that he did it with intent thereby to revoke the will. Could it have that effect? The will itself was in no wise cancelled or destroyed, but remained perfect and entire, indestructible and intangible by the act in question. Then is it not obvious, that if revoked, it must have been by the sole efficacy of the testator's parol declaration, directly in the teeth of the statute?

The argument of the appellees' counsel is, that the question of revocation is in some degree a question of intention, and the act of cancellation or destruction an equivocal act, which must be done with an intention to revoke; and therefore, that though a partial cancellation or destruction is prima facie a partial revocation, yet by the intent of the party it may be extended to a total revocation. The premises are true, but do not warrant the conclusion. The intent to revoke must concur with the act of revocation, but cannot go beyond it, being limited by law to the act itself. We must not confound the intent to do the physical act of cancellation or destruction, with the intent to produce thereby the legal effect of revocation. When the intent to do the physical act concurs with the act itself, it then becomes an act of revocation; and when the intent to revoke concurs with the act of revocation, if then becomes 383 *a legal revocation. When the concurring physical act and intent to do it are partial only, we have merely a partial act of revocation, and, as regards that act, the testator designs to do no more; and thus the question is presented, whether a partial act of revocation can accomplish a total revocation? a question which is answered by merely stating it.

In this view of the subject, it avails the learned counsel nothing to prove, from reason or authority, that a codicil is to be taken as a part of the will; for still it is a case of partial revocation. The argument is, however, stronger against total revocation, where the act of cancellation or destruction is applied to the codicil, than where it is applied to a part only of the will; for the part of the will cancelled or obliterated may be essential to the validity of the rest, which can never be as regards the codicil relatively to the will. The codicil is a part of the will for construction and testamentary disposition, but not for execution, nor for revocation, when that is applied to the codicil. It is a branch not essential to the existence of the tree, but which can have itself no distinct vitality.

In my opinion, therefore, the instruction in question violates both the letter and the spirit of the statute, and is fraught with all the evils of parol revocations. There can be no stronger illustration of the mischievous effects of such a doctrine than is furnished by this very case, which was made to turn upon the hearsay testimony of two witnesses to prove admissions, by one of the devisees, of expressions used by the testator, which derive their whole force from the very looseness of the terms employed.

The attempt to sustain this doctrine by authority has completely failed. No case has been produced in which it has been held that a revocation of a codicil, with whatever intent or in whatever mode, has operated as a revocation of the will. The 384 case cited of Utterson v. Utterson*, 3 Ves. & Beam. 122, it seems to me is not in point. There a father, after having made his will, being displeased with his son, by an interlineation of his will excluded him from all share in his property but one shilling, and also by a codicil, made for that purpose, declared his determination to the same effect; but afterwards being reconciled to his son, the testator cancelled the codicil by drawing his pen across it, but the interlineation was left standing in the will: and it was held that the cancellation of the codicil had the effect of cancelling the interlineation. The obvious principle of this decision, I think, is, that the interlineation and the codicil were parts of the same transaction, and to be regarded as an entire act for the same identical purpose; and that the revocation of the codicil was as much a revocation of the interlineation, as the revocation of a will is of its counterpart.

Another instruction given by the court on the trial of the issue was, that if the jury believed from the evidence, that the testator directed the will to be destroyed, and thought that it was destroyed as requested, then the will, so far as it related to the personal estate, was revoked in law, although it might not in point of fact have been destroyed. As this instruction, if erroneous, ought not to be repeated on another trial of the issue, I think it proper to express my opinion upon it. The proposition which in its broad terms it announces, is, that if the testator directed the will to be destroyed, whether in præsenti or in futuro, and whether the will was present or absent at the time, and believed, whether then or at a subsequent period, that it was destroyed, then the will, as relates to the personal estate, was revoked, though not in point of fact destroyed. I need not consider the proposition thus stated, as I do not believe the court intended to be so understood, and as the counsel for the appellees have chosen to construe the instruction in reference to the instructions 385 which had already been *given on the motion of the defendants, and to the evidence on the trial. Passing by any objection founded on an apparent clashing of the instructions, or an ambiguous hypothesis of the facts, let us suppose that the court had in its contemplation the undisputed facts disclosed by the evidence; to wit, that the will was not present at the time of the destruction of the codicil, but in a different custody; that the destruction directed by the testator was in præsenti; and that if the direction extended to the will, it was under a misapprehension on his part, not occasioned by any fraud or mistake of the person directed, that the will was actually present. Let us further suppose that there was evidence tending to prove that the direction, under such misapprehension, extended to the will as well as the codicil. Then the case presented is that of a destruction of a codicil in the testator's presence and by his direction, and a further direction at the same time to destroy the will together with the codicil, under a mistaken belief of the testator that the will was then actually present. The instruction concedes that the will was not revoked as to the realty, and the question is whether it was revoked as to the personalty. I waived the enquiry whether the act of 1835, placing wills of personal property on the same footing as wills of real estate in regard to authentication, is to be consequently construed as placing them on the same footing in regard to revocation. Let the negative be conceded: Still we have a statute of long standing, taken from the english statute of frauds, prohibiting parol revocations of wills of personalty. Of what avail then was the parol direction to destroy the will, when in fact it was not destroyed, and moreover could not at that time have been destroyed? There is nothing more certain than that a direction to cancel or destroy a will, if it be not complied with, is not a cancellation or destruction. Revocation by cancellation or destruction, equally 386 applicable to wills of personalty *and realty, is recognized by the english statute of frauds, and our statute of wills, in regard to revocations of devises of real estate. And in the language of Coleridge, J., in Reed v. Harris, 33 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 61, "the kind of construction which has been insisted upon would lead to a repeal of the statute on this subject, step by step. The statute, for wise purposes, does not leave the fact of cancellation to depend on mere intent, but requires definite acts. In the making of a will, if the proper signatures were not affixed, no explanation of the want of signatures could be received; and so where a will has been made, to revoke it there must be some act coupled with the intention, to bring the case within the sixth section." The learned judge of course refers to the acts of cancellation or destruction mentioned in the 6th section of the english statute. The counsel for the appellees, however, contend that the statute prohibiting verbal revocations, that is to say, requiring revocations by words to be in writing, does not apply to acts evidencing an intention to revoke, though falling short of cancellation or destruction. There is no argument for this, founded in reason or policy; and no authority that I am apprized of. The cases cited do not warrant the proposition. That of Walcott v. Ochterlony, 6 Eng. Ecc. Rep. 398, was one of written directions to destroy a will, which were treated as an actual revocation in writing. Reed v. Harris, 35 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 301, was a case of copyhold, which was held not to be within the statute of frauds, and therefore the will liable to revocation, as at common law, by words of present revocation, or acts equivalent thereto.

And here again this case strongly illustrates the danger of parol revocations of wills. This part of the case was made to turn upon the testator's unfounded belief, supposed to be proved by the hearsay evidence of loose expressions above al- 387 luded to, that the will was *actually present at the time, so as to connect that belief, and the inferred direction in relation to the will, with the burning of the codicil. If we were to lose sight of the legal barriers, that is to say, the solemn forms and decisive acts prescribed by law, what security could we have against the corruptions, and blunders, and inaccuracies of witnesses in relation to the testamentary dispositions of estates?

Without considering the objection made by the appellants' counsel to the evidence, given without opposition on the trial, of the admissions made by mr. Mason, one of the devisees, in regard to statements of the testator in conversation with him, I am of opinion that the judge of the circuit court, sitting as chancellor, ought not to have been satisfied with the verdict of the jury, because of the misdirections above stated; and therefore that the decree ought to be reversed, and the cause remanded.

It remains to enquire what further proceedings ought to be had in the cause. The appellants' counsel contend that the bill should be dismissed, on two distinct grounds. One is that the bill does not state such facts as, admitting them to be true, are sufficient in law to make the will invalid; it merely, by a sweeping allegation, charging that the paper propounded is not the last will and testament of the alleged testator. My present impression is that this objection could only be properly taken by a demurrer to the bill; but I will briefly consider it upon its merits.

The question of devisavit vel non is a common law question, and in Virginia most usually a mere question of probat. After a will has been admitted to record, it cannot, with us, be controverted incidentally; as it frequently is in the English common law courts, and sometimes (through the intervention of a jury) in their court of chancery, in consequence of the want of a court of probat in relation to wills of real estate. The 388 *sentence of our courts of probat cannot be drawn in question, unless in an appellate forum, except in the mode prescribed by our statute of wills, 1 R. C. p. 378, § 13, which provides, "that when any will shall be exhibited to be proved, the court having jurisdiction may proceed immediately to receive the probat thereof, and grant a certificate of such probat. If, however, any person interested shall within seven years afterwards appear, and by his or her bill in chancery contest the validity of the will, an issue shall be made up whether the writing produced be the will of the testator or testatrix or not, which shall be tried by a jury, whose verdict shall be final between the parties; saving to the court a power of granting a new trial for good cause, as in other trials: but no such party appearing within that time, the probat shall be forever binding;" with a saving in favour of persons labouring under disabilities. The 14th section also provides, that "in all such trials by jury, the certificates of the oath of the witnesses at the time of the first probat shall be admitted as evidence, to have such weight as the jury shall think it deserves." Thus the statute provides a supplemental tribunal to revise the decision of the court of probat, if in favour of the will; and that tribunal is a jury, to be impanelled for trial of the issue of devisavit vel non, to be directed by a court of chancery. The jurisdiction, such as it is, so conferred on the chancery courts is no part of the original jurisdiction of the courts of equity, which will not, (in the language of the books) in an adversary way, take jurisdiction to determine the validity of a will. It is a probat jurisdiction, to be exercised not by the chancellor, but by the jury; and his only province is to convene the proper parties, and cause the prescribed issue to be made up and tried, with the incidental power to grant a new trial, and to remove impediments and furnish facilities to a full and fair trial of the merits before the jury. The issue is *directed by the mandate of the law, in order to the final probat of the will propounded; and not to inform the conscience of the chancellor, whose conscience is not at all concerned in the matter, except to prevent injustice from being done by the verdict of the jury. The issue is not that made up by the bill, answer and other pleadings in the chancery proceeding, but is a new and separate issue, which, when drawn into technical form, is the result of feigned pleadings in a supposed action at law. The issue covers the whole ground (at least so far as required by the parties) whether the paper propounded is the last will and testament of the testator or not. When the jury are impanelled upon the issue, the parties are then in a legal forum, which looks only to the question that the jury have been sworn to try, without regard to the chancery pleadings. Those pleadings cannot enlarge or contract the issue before the jury, nor the evidence adduced at the trial. Of what avail then would it be, to require the chancery pleadings to be ramified into details of the facts that are to be the subject of evidence on trial before the jury? No such unprofitable controversy is required at the first probat, and why should it be at the last? It could not have been contemplated by the statute, the object of which was to allow an opportunity "to contest" the validity of the will, to all who had not enjoyed it in the court of probat, where the propounding was usually ex parte; and to allow it, not in a more formal, but a more substantial manner, the probat court not having the power to convene the necessary parties, and trying the case itself without the aid of a jury, supposed by our law to be a more competent tribunal for the decision of such matters. The legislative mind has since been more fully developed by the act of 1838, which, by a happy expedient, authorizes the whole controversy, at the election of the propounder of the will, to be finally adjudicated in an original 390 court of probat; *which is clothed with the same powers of convening the parties, directing the issue, granting new trials &c. as are vested in the chancery court by the original statute of wills; and without any formality of pleading, unless it be the fictitious or supposed common law pleading, employed, or conjectured, to raise the broad issue of devisavit vel non. No inconvenience is felt in this mode of proceeding, from the want of schedules of controverted facts, in the form of bills and answers, which serve rather to perplex than elucidate the cause, by multiplying subordinate and irrelevant issues. Upon the whole, I cannot perceive the propriety of requiring the plaintiff to do more in his bill, (besides shewing his interest in the subject and making the necessary parties) than to "contest the validity of the will," by averring in general terms that it is not the last will and testament of the alleged testator, or, at his election, by a brief statement of his grounds of objection hereto, the briefer the better upon a mixed question of law and fact, which it is not the province of the court to separate, and which must be submitted in general terms to the decision of the jury.

It only remains for me to notice the other objection to the bill, that some of the plaintiffs, by accepting their legacies and devises under the will, have precluded themselves from disputing its validity, and that the other plaintiffs, having joined with them those so precluded, are not entitled to sue. This objection comes too late (Dickenson v. Davis &c., 2 Leigh 407), not having been made by plea, nor even relied upon as a bar by way of answer. But it could have availed nothing in any form; the correct rule, as I conceive, being that of the ecclesiastical courts, that the acquiescence of the next of kin in the grant of a probat in common form (which corresponds with our ex parte probat), even though they receive legacies as due them under the will, does not preclude them from 391 calling for proof in solemn form* (which is analogous to our final probat under the issue of devisavit vel non), unless under peculiar circumstances, and laches by long acquiescence. 1 Williams on Ex'ors 193. With us, no laches can be imputed to those who come within the period prescribed by law.

My opinion therefore is, that if the cause be remanded, it should be with directions to set aside the verdict of the jury, and award a new trial of the issue, on which new trial the instructions given at the former trial on the motion of the plaintiffs are not to be repeated.

The other judges concurring, the opinion of the court of appeals was declared to be, that the instructions given by the circuit court to the jury, upon the motion of the appellees, on the trial of the issue of devisavit vel non, were erroneous; and therefore that the judge of that court, sitting as chancellor, ought not to have been satisfied with the verdict of the jury. The decree was reversed with costs, and the cause remanded to the circuit court, with directions to award a new trial of the issue, on which new trial the instructions aforesaid were not to be repeated.

Pleading—Admission of Plea—Exception to—Waiver.

—A plea being received by the court though objected to by the plaintiff, he excepts to the decision, and then takes issue in fact on the plea:

HOLD, his exception is not waived by taking issue.

Set-Off—Equitable Defences at Law—Statute.*—The 62d section of the act passed the 16th of April 1831,

Rule as to Acts Done under Repealed Statute—*In Crawford v. Halsted, 20 Gratt. 232, JUDGE STAPLES, after quoting from a Massachusetts case in which the rule as to acts done under a statute repealed is establishing the circuit superior courts, allowed the equitable defences therein provided for, in all actions at law pending in such courts at the time of pleading the same, whether such actions were originally brought in such courts, or had been transferred thereto from the former superior courts of law.

Debt on a penal bill for 666 dollars 66 cents, conditioned for payment of 333 dollars 33 cents, brought by Eliza F. Campbell as administratrix with the will annexed of John Campbell deceased, against Montgomery, in the former superior court of law for the county of Westmoreland. The suit was brought in December 1828. In 1830 issue was joined on the plea of payment. On the 15th June 1831, the cause was transferred to the circuit superior court of law and chancery for the said county, under the 96th section of the circuit court act, passed 16th April 1831, (Supp. R. C. p. 169). In October 1831 the defendant had leave within sixty days to file additional special pleas in bar, in the nature of pleas of set-off.

At April term 1832 the defendant tendered a special plea in bar, setting forth substantially that on the 14th September 1826, three bonds (to wit, the bond in question and two others for the same amount, dated 14th September 1826, and payable on the 14th September 1827, 1828 and 1829, respectively), were executed by him to the testator of the plaintiff on a settlement of accounts then had between himself and said testator; that in that settlement he was unable (in consequence of having lost or mis-393 laid a receipt of the said testator, dated 15th July 1823, for 600 dollars*) to obtain the credits to which he was entitled, and that not being able to find said receipt, and being threatened with a chancery suit, he was induced to execute the said bonds, upon the express promise on the part of said testator that the said receipt (if it should ever be found), should be allowed as a credit against them; that shortly afterwards, viz. on the 20th November 1826, the said receipt was found, and immediate notice thereof was given to the said testator in his lifetime &c. And he therefore claims this receipt as a credit against the bond on which this suit is founded. The plea was duly verified by the affidavit of the defendant.

To the filing of this plea the plaintiff objected, solely upon the ground "that this suit was depending in the late superior court of law for Westmoreland county antecedent to the passage of the act of April 1831, and the plea was therefore inadmissible;"† but the court overruled the objeclaid down, said: "In Campbell v. Montgomery, 1 Rob. 392, a similar principle was announced in applying the statute of 1831 which authorized equitable defences to be made at law, to a suit pending when the statute took effect, because it merely affected the remedy and not the right."

†"In all actions at law founded on contract, whether such contract be by deed or by parol, brought either in the said circuit superior courts of tion and admitted the plea, and the plaintiff excepted to the opinion of the court, and took issue on the plea.

The jury found for the plaintiff on the plea of payment, and for the defendant on the special plea, and the court gave judgment for the defendant.

On the petition of Campbell's administratrix a supersedeas was awarded to the judgment.

G. N. Johnson for plaintiff in error. The question is the single and narrow one presented by the reception of the special plea. That plea was received under the act of

April 16, 1831, § 62, Suppl. to Rev. Code p. 157. *The plaintiff in error contends that this act does not authorize such a plea in any action instituted before the passage thereof. The terms of the 62d section are general, and apparently applicable to all cases, or rather (according to their literal import) to actions already brought, and to those only. But this cannot be the construction. All legislation is to be deemed prospective, and nowise ex post facto in its operation, unless that be plainly the intent of the legislator. This is a general principle of construction, founded upon the equity of the case,—the apparent danger of working injustice by allowing a retroactive effect to the law. The earliest case on the subject to be found decided in this court is that of Craig v. Craig, 1 Call 483, in which the assignee of a bond with collateral condition was not allowed to maintain an action in his own name, by virtue of the statute giving such action, the statute being passed subsequent to the assignment, and to the institution of the suit. So in Elliott's ex'or v. Lyell, 3 Call 268, it was held that the representatives of a deceased obligor in a joint bond were not liable to an action at law by virtue of the statute giving such action, that statute being passed after execution of the bond. These two cases, it may be objected, are decisions upon statutes which affected rights in contradistinction to remedies: but the principles discussed in them may be usefully referred to as a guide in the present case. The Commonwealth v. Hewitt, 2 Hen. & Munf. 181, was the case of a motion for a venditioni exponas to the present sheriff, to sell property seized by a former sheriff, since dead, under a statute passed subsequent to the seizure; and the judgment of the general court overruling the motion was affirmed by this court. This was a question upon a law affecting the remedy—the process of execution upon judgments; and according to the principles laid down by judge Roane, even laws which affect merely remedies are to be deemed only prospective, unless the contrary law and chancery, as courts, of common law, or in the county and corporation courts, the defendant may file a special plea in bar, in the nature of a plea of set-off."—Suppl. to R. C. ch. 100, § 62, p. 157.—Note in Original Edition.

The application of the statute here to pending actions would enable the defendant to defeat an action originally well brought and indefeasible,—would deprive the plaintiff of his right to recover in the action, and give the recovery to the defendant,—contrary to the express language of the proviso contained in the 101st section (Suppl. R. C. p. 171), as well as to the general spirit of legislation, as understood and expounded by this court in the several cases above cited. It may be said that the accrued right of action in the plaintiff was only equivalent to the equitable right of set-off in the defendant, which he might enforce in chancery; and that the effect of the statute, if applied even to pending suits, would only be to enable the defendant to avail himself of this equivalent right, in the court of law instead of the court of equity. But the rights are not equivalent—there is a difference in the plaintiff's favour at least to the extent of his costs at law; and besides, it may well be deemed that he sustains injury by transferring the adjustment of the defendant's equitable claim from the appropriate forum to that of law, whose modes of proceedings are so much less adapted to the office of making such adjustment.

Standard for defendant in error. It is admitted by the plaintiff's counsel that the terms of the statute are broad enough to embrace all suits brought in the circuit courts, whether by the act of the plaintiff, or the act of the law in transferring to those courts actions brought in the former superior courts; but still insisted that the statute applies only to the suits brought in the circuit courts by the act of the parties. Suppose a suit brought after the 16th of April (the day of passing the act) and before the 15th of June, (when the transfer of actions to the new courts was to take effect, § 96, Suppl. p. 169); it would be instituted in the old superior court. Will it be contended that the statute is inapplicable to such action?—to an action which must in 396 regular course be *determined in the new court, and which the plaintiff, when he instituted it, knew must be so determined? Craig v. Craig would be an authority for the plaintiff, if the decision had been that the statute allowing assignments of the bonds with collateral condition did not apply to bonds executed previously: but that was not the decision; and in Meredith's adm'x v. Duval, 1 Munf. 76, (in which Craig v. Craig is referred to and recognized) it is held that the statute does apply as well to bonds executed before as after its passage. Elliott's ex'or v. Lyell was a case upon a statute which, if retroactive, would have affected rights, not remedies, and the decision was made expressly on that ground. In The Commonwealth v. Hewitt, the words of the enacting clause expressly applied to future cases only, and the decision was merely that the words of the preamble could not make the enacting clause applicable to any other cases. The statute here cannot be considered as affecting or impairing any right of plaintiffs at law; and the proviso referred to by Mr. Johnson expresses no more than would have been implied without it. If the right to recover at law be considered as a right vested under the contract, and distinguishable from the remedy, then the argument would go the length of denying to the legislature the power to authorize an equitable defence to be made at law, in any action upon a contract entered into before the statute was passed. But in Ansell v. Ansell, 3 Carr. & Payne 563, 14 Eng. C. L. R. 451, it was held that the English statute requiring a written acknowledgment to take a simple contract debt out of the statute of limitations, applied to a debt contracted before the law was passed, and to an action previously pending.

To ascertain the meaning of the legislature in the particular section under consideration, the whole of the statute containing it must be looked to. In the language of lord Coke, as cited in Dwarris on Statutes 706, [p. 50 *of edition in Law Library, vol. 9,] "the best expositors of all acts of parliament in all cases are the acts of parliament themselves, by construction and conferring all the parts of them together. Optima statuti interpretatrix est (omnibus particulis ejusdem inspectis) ipsum statutum." See also Co. Litt. 381 a.; Dwarris on Stat. 698, [45.] The same principle is laid down by chief justice Best, in 3 Bingham 196; 11 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 94, 5, and by the court of king's bench in Doe d. v. Bywater v. Brandling, 7 Barn. & Cress. 643; 14 Eng. C. L. R. 108. Again, it is a maxim that ubi lex est specialis et ratio ejus generalis, generaliter accipienda est. Dwarris on Stat. 697, [45]; Co. Litt. 381 b. Applying these principles of construction to determine the meaning of the expression actions brought in the circuit superior courts, and looking at the whole statute, particularly the 68th and 69th sections, there can be little doubt that the actions intended by the legislature were as well those which might be transferred to the new courts from the former superior courts of law, as those which might be originally instituted in the new courts: for it can scarcely be denied that the interrogatories allowed by the 68th section, and the production of papers authorized to be enforced by the 69th section, might be availed of in an action previously instituted; and the remedies given by these two sections are directly applicable, and no doubt were chiefly designed, to render available the equitable defences given by the 62d section. Statutes of a remedial nature, it has been seen, are to be so construed as to suppress the mischief and advance the remedy. What was the mischief here, and what the proposed remedy? The mischief was, that a defendant not bound in justice to pay one dollar of the plaintiff's claim might be subjected to a recovery at law, and have no remedy except by the tedious and expensive interposition of chancery, even though the matter of his defence were such that a jury might be perfectly competent *to pass upon it, and to do exact justice between the parties: the remedy proposed was to abolish the impediment, and enable the defendant to make his equitable defence in the court of law,—to determine the whole controversy in a single suit. It is manifest that the mischief and the reason for a remedy applied as strongly to actions then pending as to those subsequently instituted.

Patton on same side. In the statute of 1831, the words brought—pending—instituted—are all used, and it will be found that they are applied indiscriminately to suits already instituted, and suits thereafter to be instituted. See § 38. The true rule is this—that a statute is not readily to be construed retrospectively, where such construction would affect or repair existing rights, or the obligation of existing contracts: and in England, where such laws are within the constitutional power of parliament to enact, the courts always struggle against the conclusion that the retrospective effect was intended. But laws, the retrospective operation of which affects merely remedies, are not construed with the same anxious desire to avoid such retrospection. This is strongly exemplified in the case of Ansell v. Ansell, already referred to. The distinction between the two classes of statutes is clearly laid down in 1 Kent's Comm. (3d ed.) p. 455, and remedial laws, it is there shewn, not only may be applied to cases not included by the letter, but will be so applied, if the terms of the enactment do not exclude such application. Roane's adm'r v. Drummond's adm'rs, 6 Rand. 182, is a case of this sort. Such has been the construction, too, of the statute allowing a new action within a year after arrest or reversal of judgment, where the verdict has passed for the plaintiff, or judgment been given for him. The case of Garland v. Marx, reported in a note 4 Leigh 321, is another example of applying a remedial statute to a case not within the literal terms. The case of Elliott's *ex'or v. Lyell is not applicable, being decided on the ground that rights would have been affected and changed by giving a retrospective operation to the statute there under construction. No right is impaired or changed by giving to the statute here the application which the defendant contends for. The defendant had in equity precisely the same right which the statute enabled him to enforce in the court of law: he was clearly entitled to a perpetual injunction in equity to the whole recovery at law—principal, interest and costs. If the statute be held not to apply to suits already pending, it will give rise to the very diversity of decision, in consequence merely of a difference in the time of determination, which, in the case of a law clearly remedial, is so strongly disapproved by judge Roane in Elliott's ex'or v. Lyell. But even if the plaintiff's costs at law could be considered a subject of vested right, liable to be affected and lost by the application of the statute, the error as to that matter is not a ground of itself sufficient to justify the reversal of the present judgment, admitting that as to the debt recovered by the plaintiff at law, the defendant was entitled to a perpetual injunction in equity.

There are other english cases supporting the principle of Ansell v. Ansell; namely, Towler v. Chatterton, 6 Bing. 258; 19 Eng. C. L. R. 75; Hilliard v. Lenard, 1 Mood. & Malk. 297, 22 Eng. C. L. R. 313.

But further: the court having received the special plea, and the plaintiff having joined issue, and taken her chance of success before the jury, the fact of her having objected to the admission of the plea ought not now to be available as a ground to reverse the judgment. If the plea ought not to have been received, it was on account of a defect which appeared on its face and was ground of general demurrer. The plaintiff might have demurred, and ought to have done so. She ought not to be allowed, by means of an objection to receiving the 400 plea, to get the advantage of demurring *and replying both. In Chew v. Moffett, 6 Munf. 120, where the plea presented a defence purely equitable, after verdict for the defendant it was held that the equitable nature of the defence was immaterial, and no ground to reverse the judgment.

Leigh in reply. If the legislature had meant, in providing the equitable defence to actions "brought in the circuit superior courts," to include suits previously pending and afterwards transferred to those courts, these latter words would in all probability have been employed also. The 68th and 69th sections cannot prove the contrary. They simply authorize a discovery in the court of law, instead of the court of chancery, in support of a defence of a legal nature: they do not give any new defence, of an equitable nature. Instead of looking to these sections to ascertain the meaning of the 62d section, it is more proper to consider for that purpose the 65th and 66th sections, which, like the 62d, expressly authorize new and equitable defences: and it is manifest that the 65th and 66th sections are confined to the case of suits thereafter to be instituted in the circuit superior courts. To allow the equitable defence here, is not merely to allow in a court of law a defence before competent in equity only; the effect is to change the rights of the parties: for the defendant's allegations in a bill in equity filed by him, if contradicted by the answer, must have been proved by two witnesses, or one witness and pregnant circumstances; whereas the plea under this statute cannot be contradicted by the oath of the plaintiff at law, and may be proved by a single witness. The intent of the statute was to restrict the blending of common law and chancery jurisdiction (as in pleas under the 62d section) to actions originally instituted in the new courts, and to allow in all cases the discovery in a court of law, in aid of a legal defence, which could previously have been had in chancery only. Ansell v. Ansell is founded on the terms of a statute which expressly refers to the period 401 *of trial, thereafter to be had, (no matter when the suit might have been instituted) as the period when the plaintiff must, to sustain his action, be provided with written evidence of the new promise; it was therefore necessarily retrospective. The Commonwealth v. Hewitt shews that although a remedial law may be applied to past cases (which no one ever thought of questioning) yet it will not be so applied, where those cases, however clearly within the same mischief, are not included by the terms of the enactment. Day v. Pickett, 4 Munf. 104, was decided on the same principle.

The question of practice in relation to the objection to the plea, is settled (if any thing can be considered as settled) by the decisions of this court. The plaintiff did not waive her objection by taking issue.

BALDWIN, J., delivered the resolution of the court as follows: "The court is of opinion that though the plaintiff did not, by her replication to the defendant's plea of equitable set-off, waive her exception to the decision of the circuit superior court allowing said plea to be filed, nor consequently her right to have the propriety of that decision examined in this court, yet the said plea was properly received by the said circuit superior court, notwithstanding the plaintiff's objection thereto; this court being of opinion that the 62d section of the act of the 16th of April 1831, establishing the circuit superior courts, allowed the equitable defences therein provided for, in all actions at law pending in such circuit superior courts at the time of pleading the same, whether such actions were originally brought in such circuit superior courts, or had been transferred thereto, under the provisions of said act, from the former superior courts of law:" therefore,

Judgment affirmed, with costs in the court of appeals, to be levied &c.

402 *Literary Fund v. Dawson's Ex'or and Heirs.

December, 1842, Richmond.

(Absent STANARD,* J.)

Literary Fund—Devise for†—Case at Bar.—After the decision in the case of the Literary Fund v. Dawson and others, 10 Leigh 147, an act of assembly was passed the 10th of March 1841, empowering the president and directors of the literary fund to receive the estate of Martin Dawson, devised by the

*He had been counsel for some of the parties interested.

†Charitable Devises—Beneficiary—Corporation to Be Created by Statute.—The principal case is cited in Kinnaird v. Miller, 25 Gratt. 121, for the proposition that, wherever a devise or bequest is made to a corporation, to be afterwards, within a period not too remote, created by law for the purpose of carrying 17th clause of his will, into the literary fund, and making provision for managing and administering the estate when so received. Whereupon the said president and directors filed a bill against the executor and heirs to recover the estate devised by the said 17th clause. And by the answer of the executor and the demurrer of the heirs, the objection was taken that the act of assembly was passed not on the application of the executor, but against his consent, and in other respects, as well as in this, was not such an act as the testator contemplated. The circuit court dismissed the bill. But on an appeal from the decree, the court of appeals reversed the same, and remanded the cause to the circuit court, with directions to overrule the demurrer and give the relief sought by the bill.

After the decision by this court of the case of the Literary Fund v. Dawson & others, reported in 10 Leigh 147, the general assembly, on the 10th of March 1841, passed an act entitled "an act concerning the estate of Martin Dawson deceased and for other purposes," which is contained in the session acts of 1840-41, p. 52. Under this act the president and directors of the literary fund filed a bill in the circuit court of Albemarle county at September rules 1841, against William W. Dawson the acting executor of Martin Dawson deceased, and against the heirs of the said Martin Dawson, praying that the executor might be required to settle up his executorial accounts, and decreed to pay over to the plaintiffs the balance in his hands embraced by the seventeenth clause of the will, and that the real estate devised *by that clause, with the rents, issues and profits thereof, might also be decreed to the said plaintiffs.

The answer of the executor stated, that the act of the 10th of March 1841 was obtained by the plaintiffs without the acquiescence, consent or interposition of the said executor, against his wishes, and in disregard of his petition. The answer contained the following views as to the position of the executor—"He is advised that by the terms of the 17th clause of the will, the trust is reposed in him, as the acting executor of his testator, and not in the president and directors of the literary fund, nor in the legislature, to 'use' the portion of the estate therein included, in the manner designated; and that it is too plain for construction, that the respondent, as acting executor, is the only person in the universe authorized or capable to take the steps necessary to carry the testator's designs into effect, that is, to obtain the act of assembly requisite for the purpose. If this can be into effect a charitable intention of the testator, expressed in his will, the same may be good and valid as an executory devise or bequest, and will become absolute and executed, if, and when, such a corporation shall be created accordingly.

See, in accord, Literary Fund v. Dawson, 10 Leigh 147. The principal case is cited with approval in Kinnaird v. Miller, 25 Gratt. 122, 123 et seq.

See monographic note on "Charities" appended to Kelly v. Love, 20 Gratt. 124.

made clearer than the testator's language has made it, the respondent conceives it to be done by the court of appeals in the decree pronounced by it, and especially in the opinions delivered by judges Brooke and Tucker. (See 10 Leigh 151-2.) The plaintiffs owe it to this power, control and trust vested in the respondent, that the devises and bequests of the 17th section of the will were not declared void. Their whole interest therein depends on the recognition of the respondent's power over the subject, and by both the learned judges above named it is expressly affirmed that the act of assembly, which is to infuse vitality and give effect to the testator's munificence, must be obtained by the respondent. And judge Tucker refutes the idea that the contingency that the act would be obtained was too 'remote, by declaring that it must occur, if at all, within the lifetime of the executors; confirming thus indirectly what indeed he had already stated in clear and precise terms, that it was a personal trust *devolved by the testator upon his executors, and to be exercised by them according to their discretion, not by the president and directors of the literary fund, and at their pleasure.

"The respondent has said thus much of his powers, to vindicate the position which he has felt it his duty to take in the premises, viz. that no one besides himself can procure the act of assembly which is demanded by the clause in question of his testator's will; and that it is neither competent to the president and directors of the literary fund to ask for, nor to the legislature to enact, a law unsanctioned, or even unsolicited, by the respondent.

"To the law of March 10th 1841, referred to in the bill, the respondent has never given his sanction. On the contrary, he dissented then, and ever since, and has always regarded the act as founded on an unwarrantable usurpation, on the part of the plaintiffs, of his powers and functions, and in itself as merely inoperative and void. That the legislature itself had at least a suspicion that such might be the case, is apparent from the phraseology employed in the last clause of the preamble to the act.

"The respondent has been fortified in these general views of his powers and duties, by reference to the provisions of the act obtained by the plaintiffs, particularly those of the second section thereof. By that section it is declared, that 'all the costs of suit, fees and expenses heretofore and hereafter incurred by the president and directors of the literary fund, in sustaining the said devise, and in receiving, managing and administering the said fund, shall be charged to the said fund.' The respondent is informed, believes and charges, that the fees and expenses thus charged upon the fund by the act in question would be from ten to twelve per cent. of the whole amount. If no other reason operated, as many others do, to induce the re-

405 spondent to repudiate *the act, he would deem himself faithless indeed if he should consent to so material an abatement of the fund created by his testator's benevolence."

Such of the heirs as were infants answered by guardian ad litem. The adult heirs demurred to the bill, and assigned the following causes of demurrer:

"1st. That the plaintiffs have no interest in the estate of Martin Dawson deceased, neither as officers representing the commonwealth of Virginia as imparted to them by the laws of the state creating the literary fund, nor as trustees, under and by virtue of the act of the general assembly passed the 10th March 1841, for the counties of Albemarle and Nelson; and so they say that the plaintiffs cannot maintain any action at law or in equity relating to the said estate, and this court therefore cannot rightfully take jurisdiction thereof.

"2d. Because of a misjoinder of the distinct causes of suit and action, in this, that even if the plaintiffs are capacitated by the said act of the 10th March 1841 to take, sue for and recover any portion of the said estate, still, as to the real estate which is impleaded by the bill, there was and is a plain remedy by an action at law; and so they say there is a misjoinder and want of jurisdiction on that head also.

"3d. Because the act of assembly aforesaid, under which the plaintiffs seek to ground their suit, is merely void both at law and in equity, for the reasons that it attempts to take away private property for public services without making reasonable compensation to the owners thereof, and moreover was passed by the legislature not only without any application or assent of the executors of Martin Dawson deceased, and of his heirs at law and next of kin, for such purpose, but against the will of said executors, and against the wishes of these defendants, and is therefore violative of their rights of property of all the defendants.

406 "4th. Because the said act of assembly, in many of its provisions, violates the will of Martin Dawson deceased, and actually asserts the rights of dominion and control over, and interest in the whole estate, viz. First, in the second section of the bill, it is enacted that the estate shall be lessened before it reaches the literary fund, by all costs of suit therefore and thereafter to be expended, the amount unlimited; a power of diminution not contemplated by the testator, and inconsistent with the will, and with the idea that others had or have any interest in the fund, which the commonwealth seeks to take to and dispose of herself. Secondly, it is provided by the 3d section of the bill, that the interest of the fund, to be called the 'Dawson fund,' in certain portions shall be paid over to the school commissioners of Albemarle and Nelson, to be used by them for the same purposes and under the same regulations as the school quotas of the said counties were used at the date of the said act. At the time of Martin Dawson's death (as of which date his will in law must be construed to speak) the quotas of these counties from the literary fund, as regulated by law, were expended wholly in primary education; but after his death and before the passage of this law, a law was passed by the legislature, authorizing the school commissioners of any county wherein there were unexpended balances of the school fund, to devote the same to the academy or academies of such county; so that Martin Dawson's estate, designed clearly by his will for primary education, if this law prevails, is liable to be appropriated to the aid of the rich, and not of the poor and needy. Thirdly, by the 5th section of the act it is provided as follows: 'And if the general assembly should hereafter abolish the literary fund, it will transfer the said Dawson fund to such body or bodies as it may provide, to the use and benefit of the said counties, and for the same or like purpose for which the funds given to the 407 *school commissioners are given.' Now the legislature may, and most probably will, soon abolish the literary fund, and if they do, equity will declare the trust ended, and a resulting trust would instantly arise in favour of the next of kin; and so if the fund is appropriated contrary to the will of the testator. And in either case, where is the remedy to the next of kin to be found in the act? There is none; no right is reserved to them to sue the literary fund to reclaim the estate; on the contrary, the law provides that they, the law-makers, will make another will for the decedent. True, the first section gives the literary fund power to defend and maintain any suit or suits, that may be necessary to enable them fully to recover the estate; but none to be sued, or defend suits, having for the object the recovery of the estate back from them, or to provide payment if received."

The cause coming on to be heard in the circuit court the 21st of May 1842, before judge Thompson, he delivered the following opinion:

"If I rightly comprehend the opinion and reasoning of the court of appeals, they have decided that the 17th clause contained a valid devise, because, conceding as they did that the literary fund could not take by devise, and that had it been a devise in presenti to that fund it would have been void, it was a gift directly to the executors (of the legal title, I suppose, though they do not say so), upon an executory trust to be performed in futuro--in other words, an executory devise or limitation in favour of some devisee or legatee to be called into existence and made capable of taking by the joint instrumentality of the executors and the legislature.

"To bring it within the legal limitation as to the time of vesting, and to prove that it must vest within the time allowed by law, judge Tucker says, the act constituting the estate a part of the literary fund must be *obtained by the executors; and he says in another part of his opinion, 'As this act is to be obtained by the executors, the contingency of its passage is within a life or lives in being, and therefore not too remote.' The judge has not told us in express terms whether this executory trust in the executors is personal or official, though he has said it could be performed by them only.

"It seems to me very clear, that in order to sustain the most important position of the opinion, the one on which the validity of the devise mainly turns, to wit, that the limitation was not too remote, it must be conceded that the trust is personal, and therefore only limited by a life or lives in being; for if official, there is no limitation of the time of its execution. It could be executed by an administrator de bonis non with the will annexed, a century hence, as well as now.

"It seems to me equally clear that the opinion of the court concedes another proposition; and that is, that neither the legislature nor the literary fund, nor any one else except the executors, could execute the trust, that is, could constitute the estate a part of the literary fund. If the legislature, upon its own mere motion, or upon the application of the president and directors of the literary fund, without and against the consent of the executors, could execute this trust and vest this devise, it is surely not an executory trust in the executors, to be exercised during their lives or the life of the survivor, but a limitation depending upon the power, will and pleasure of the legislature, which they might as lawfully exercise 500 years hence as in 1841.

"The president and directors of the literary fund cannot make themselves, nor can the legislature make them, the devisees of this estate. The legislature can capacitate them to take, if it be the will and pleasure of the executors to bestow. Until the trust be 409 executed by the executors in their favour, they have no more interest *in this estate than any other citizen of the commonwealth, and until then there is no pretence for saying that they can compel the executors to execute the trust. Nor can the legislature compel the execution of the trust in their behalf. That would be to exercise a judicial and not a legislative function. If the act of the legislature in this case be allowed the force and effect ascribed to it, it is an act divesting the vested rights of Dawson's heirs and Dawson's executors, and vesting them in the president and directors of the literary fund. Such an act is beyond the constitutional competency of the legislature; and it is due to that body to say, that it is most apparent, from the preamble and body of the act, that they never meant to claim or exercise any such power. They disclaimed any such intention, right or power. All they did was to make the literary fund capable of taking the devise, and to provide how it should take and hold, and then to provide, that if their act, passed without the application of the executors, could vest the legacy or devise in the literary fund, it should be vested: otherwise the first five sections of the law became a mere nullity, a dead letter.

"It appears from the act itself, that it was passed without the application or consent of the executor; and from his answer, that it passed not only without but against his consent, and that he has not, nor does he intend to ratify or consent to said act. To say, therefore, that such an act could confer any rights on the plaintiffs, would be to say that the legislature (if they could not make a will for Martin Dawson) might by their act constitute themselves, or somebody else, his trustees to execute his will, in the lieu of those to whom he has seen cause to confide the trust.

"Upon the demurrer of the heirs at law, and the answer of the executor, the bill must be dismissed with costs."

410 *The decree of the circuit court was in conformity with this opinion. It declared, that for the causes of defence relied on in the demurrer of the heirs at law, and in the answer of the defendant William W. Dawson, the bill was dismissed, and the plaintiffs were to pay to the defendants their costs.

From this decree an appeal was allowed on the petition of the president and directors of the literary fund.

The attorney general for the appellants. The difficulty apprehended by the testator was, that, under the organization of the literary fund, what he devised and bequeathed might go into the general fund for its general purposes, and not be confined to the particular counties and purposes which he had specially in view. He wished his executors to bring the subject to the notice of the legislature, so that his object might be effected. The executors were looked to as the means of effecting the object; but their agency was not regarded as a part of the contingency itself. The passage of the act of assembly was the contingency contemplated by him. If there should be difficulty in procuring the legislation, he contemplated that aid would be given by the executors as well as others. But to suppose the concurrence of the executors indispensable, would be to suppose that he had put it in the power of his executors to defeat his will; that he had put it in their power to have the use of this fund for their lives. For the president and directors of the literary fund could not interfere, they having no interest; and the heirs could not interfere, since the executors would have during their lifetime to apply for the act, and the heirs would have no right until the time for such application had passed by. If the agency of the executors be indispensable, the devise must be considered a devise to the executors. But it cannot be so considered. The testator shews his intention to be, that the property was to go at all events 411 to the literary fund. That no personal benefit was intended to enure to the executors in respect to this property, is apparent when we look at the 15th and 21st clauses of the will, as well as the 16th and 17th. They are trustees, a breach of trust by whom was never contemplated by the testator. The gift is to an existing corporation, and the view of the court may be very different from what it would be, were the gift to a corporation to be called into existence. The existing corporation had a right to apply for such an amendment of its charter as would enable it to take for particular specified objects, and the legislature had a right to make such an amendment. And even if the testator contemplated that this change would be made through the agency of the executors, still what had been done was proper, to prevent injury by a breach of the trust of those executors.

C. Johnson for appellees. On the former argument, the court was referred to the cases of Gallego's ex'ors v. The Attorney General, 3 Leigh 450, and especially to the passage at p. 466; Janey's ex'or v. Latane and others, 4 Leigh 327; Baptist Association v. Hart's ex'ors, 4 Wheat. 1; Charles and others v. Hunnicutt, 5 Call 311; Overseers of poor v. Tayloe's adm'r, Gilm. 336; William & Mary College v. Hodgson and others, 6 Munf. 163; Inglis v. Sailor's Snug Harbour, 3 Peters 99. We contended that the contingency must be such as 412 must happen *within the time limited by law. Fearne p. 468, 470, § 5, 6, 8, and p. 488, § 14. And we argued that if the executors were charged with the duty of applying for the act of assembly, it was an official trust, and might be performed by an administrator with the will annexed or other representative, and so the contingency would not be within the time limited. But we conceded that if the trust was personal to the executors, if it did not go to their successors, the contingency would be in time. What did the decree decide? The decision was that the devise is to the executors, who took the estate charged with the performance of the trust contained in the 17th clause. And the court must have taken the view, that application was to be made by the executors to the legislature to carry into effect that clause, and whether made by all or one, it would be within lives in being. Thus, and thus only, was the objection met, that the devise depended on an act of assembly not to be passed in a limited time.

But now it is contended the will and decree

*The 15th clause is as follows: "15th. I give to my relation and friend William W. Dawson my wearing apparel, books, watch, horse and saddle, also the goods I may have in the hands of William W. Dawson & Co. unsold at my death, also my part of the profits in the mercantile concern of William W. Dawson & Co., he paying for my stock and the sums allowed him for his services with interest, in which concern I became a partner for no other object but to promote the said William's interest, and therefore I relinquish my right to the profits." The 16th, 17th and 21st clauses may be seen in 10 Leigh 148, 9.—Note in Original Edition.

meant that the devise was to take effect on a single contingency, the passage of an act in a reasonable time. Is this the true interpretation? The decree is brief, and we must refer to the opinions. They shew that judges Tucker and Brooke both contemplated that the application for the law was to be made by the executors; that both judges supposed no law could be passed after the death of the executors; and that judge Brooke supposed the executors did not necessarily have their whole lives,—that the application must be in a reasonable time.

Ought not this to have been the judgment? It was intended by the testator to impose this trust on the executors, and to make them necessary agents in carrying it into effect. The will furnishes conclusive evidence that the subject was not given to the discretion of the legislature, or to the president and directors of the literary 413 *fund without the agency of the executors, who were the selected agents.

It shews that the executors were intended to have a discretion in the matter. The testator intended them to see that the fund was dedicated to the poor, and if they could not get such an act as in their opinion would conform to his intent, to let the fund go to his heirs. If the testator could have anticipated the language of the school commissioners of Albemarle, in the report wherein they say the fund is large enough, would he still have wished them to have more? There was not even a necessity for placing the fund in the charge of the president and directors of the literary fund; for the executors might have asked for an act incorporating the school commissioners. If, under the will and decree, and application by the executors is necessary, the trust is personal, and all the executors must apply; whereas here none have applied, and without their consent an act has been passed. This act must be void. It is said that to hold so would be giving the executors power to disappoint the will; and it may perhaps be said further, that in the meantime, before the application is made, or the time for it passed, the property might be wasted. If the supposition that the testator intended the executors to have a discretion be correct, the argument is answered. But if the estate should be wasted, the executors would be liable to the heirs or devisees. And when the condition should be broken, the heirs might enter. Porter's case, 1 Rep. 22; Baptist Association v. Hart's ex'ors, 4 Wheat. 33-35.

II. The act passed is not such an act as the testator intended, but such a one as would authorize the heirs to enter for breach of the condition. 1 R. C. 1819, ch. 33, p. 82; Supp. to R. C. p. 33, ch. 18; Id. p. 35, ch. 19; Id. p. 36, ch. 20; Id. p. 40, ch. 28; Sess. Acts of 1836-7, p. 13, ch. 12. We admit that the legislature, when properly applied to, may put the fund under 414 such government as it sees fit, not inconsistent with the objects *of the testator; and therefore we do not complain of the first section. But with respect to the second section, so far as it charges on the fund expenses which have been incurred or shall be incurred in sustaining the devise, the will is violated. The fund is to be held not only "for the uses to which the school fund of the counties of Albemarle and Nelson is applied," but also "for the like uses in the said counties," as is provided in subsequent sections. At the date of the will, only the quota of 45000 dollars was paid over to the school commissioners, and that was for the education of the poor. At the date of the act concerning the estate of Martin Dawson, there was in force the act of the 22d of March 1836, Sess. Acts of 1835-6, ch. 4, p. 7-8. And hence the estate of Dawson may be applied, not to primary schools for the poor, but to colleges and academies for the rich. Whereas so much of the fund as is not necessary to educate the poor—whatever, in short, is not applied according to the trusts, belongs to the heirs, precisely as a dedication of an estate to pay debts charges so much as is necessary, and when they are satisfied, the rest belongs to the heirs. Did the testator mean, if there were no poor to be educated, to authorize the fund to be applied to like purposes; to educate the rich, or any particular sect; or for general purposes of education or charitable objects? If our decisions have gotten us rid of any thing, they have gotten us rid of the latitudinous decisions under the statute of Elizabeth. The well considered decisions in Gallego's ex'ors v. The Attorney General and Janey's ex'or v. Latane and others are all foolishness, if there be such wide discretion in our chancery courts. It may be said, the expression "for like objects" is used in the 17th clause of the will. But can any one believe the testator meant any thing except the education of the poor? The like object, as understood by him, was the education of the poor not exactly in the same manner, but perhaps by applying the principal.

*Whereas the natural effect of the act which has been passed is to withdraw the fund from the education of the poor, and apply it to such kindred objects as the legislature may think proper.

The attorney general in reply. The literary fund is a corporation, but an act was necessary for authorizing it to take and hold this property. Suppose a man by his will gives an estate to A. if £100. be paid by B., and A. himself pays the £100.; would not that be a sufficient performance of the condition? Marks v. Marks, 1 Str. 129. So here, as the literary fund may take and hold when the act is passed, it may itself procure the passage of the act.

The executors were to carry into effect the 16th clause of the will. But if they could not, if they failed to carry that into effect, then the estate was to be used as directed in the 17th clause. The language is mandatory, followed by an earnest injunction to the executors. And it is not discretionary with them to execute the clause or not. The testator looked to the perpetual use of the fund, and the power which was to regulate and control the fund was to be in the legislature, not in the executors. The legislature is, from time to time, to act in regard to it. The testator, having devised his own scheme, and given the legislature power to execute it, never intended to clothe the executors with the power of interfering on the ground of deviation from his intent, or with the power of otherwise controlling the legislative action. When, in the 21st section, he has declared the powers of the executors, it cannot be inferred that he intended to clothe them with higher powers. He never contemplated that the power should exist in them to decide whether or no the estate should go to the literary fund.

The objection to the act on the ground of provision for costs and charges, 416 comes with a bad grace from *those whose conduct leads to those charges. The testator never intended the charges to come out of the general treasury: he must have meant them to be met out of this fund. What is meant by the testator in the expression "is used?" He is giving the fund for a perpetual object of charity: is it his intention that no change shall be made in the mode of using it? The meaning is, that it is to be used in the same manner that the ordinary fund of the school commissioners is used, at the time of using the same. Moreover, the act of February 24, 1821 appropriated the surplus income of the literary fund to the endowment of such colleges, academies and intermediate schools as the general assembly might thereafter designate. Sess. Acts of 1820-21, p. 16, ch. 11, § 5. And an instance of such designation is furnished by the act of February 27, 1833. Sess. Acts of 1832-3, p. 13, ch. 11. These acts shew that there was an intention to modify the fund; that an improvement was going on in its application. And there is nothing in the will which shews an intention to provide for the poor, except that part of the 16th clause relating to the overplus, which contains the expression "such as is not able." In providing for seminaries of learning, as the testator has done by that clause, he has shewn his intention rather to be to make provision for the middle classes.

BALDWIN, J. In the case of The Literary Fund v. Dawsons, 10 Leigh 147, it was held by this court, that the devise contained in the 17th clause of the testator's will was a valid executory devise, to take effect on the happening of the contingency therein contemplated; and the question now presented in the present suit is whether that contingency has happened? The counsel for the appellees have supposed that some light on this subject may be obtained by recurring to the difficulties which the court thought, when it decided the former *cause, were removed by the construction it gave to the devise in question. Let us therefore briefly advert to the nature of those difficulties.

The testator was desirous of promoting the cause of education, by establishing three seminaries of learning in the counties of Albemarle and Nelson; and to this object he devoted the greater part of his estate, real and personal, by the 16th clause of his will. But it appears he was apprehensive that this scheme of benevolence might fail, from the want of corporate powers for the preservation and administration of the fund thus created. In the event of such failure, he contemplated effectuating his general charitable design, the education of youth, by another plan, which would give him the agency of a then existing corporation, the president and directors of the literary fund. That plan was to constitute the estate devised a part of the literary fund, in such manner as to be used by the school commissioners for the counties of Albemarle and Nelson, in aid of the school fund allotted under the general law to those counties. But it seems he was aware that the laws constituting and regulating the literary fund, only contemplated its general resources, and would not be adequate to the administration of the specific charity he had in view. This obstacle, however, he believed could be removed by the power of the legislature, and he invoked its exercise in the following brief and comprehensive terms: "An act of assembly for said object supposed can be obtained."

The testator's apprehensions in regard to his primary scheme were realized. It did fail at the moment of his death, from the want of corporate powers to carry it into effect. The seminaries of learning which he sought to endow by the provisions of the 16th clause were not in existence, and could only be created by an act of incorporation. A devise to or for them was therefore inoperative and void,

418 upon the principles decided *by the supreme court of the United States in the case of The Baptist Association v. Hart's ex'ors, 4 Wheat. 1, and by this court in the case of Gallego's ex'ors v. The Attorney General, 3 Leigh 450. And the expedient had not occurred to the testator of providing that an act of incorporation should be obtained, and that when obtained the seminaries so incorporated, or other persons in trust for them, should be the devisees of his estate. That such a devise, at least in the latter form, by way of trust, would be good according to the law of executory devises, there is no reason to doubt. It would be a devise to or for a person (whether natural or artificial is immaterial) not in esse at the time of the testator's death, but to come into existence in a reasonable time, so as not to violate the rules of policy inhibiting perpetuities. A limitation of that kind, engrafted by way of condition on a common law conveyance, was held to be valid in Porter's case, 1 Rep. 24, and in the case of Inglis v. The Trustees of the Sailor's Snug Harbour, 3 Pet. 99, the supreme court of the United States sustained a devise to certain official persons in the state of New York (whom by their official titles the testator appointed his executors) and their successors, upon trust to erect, manage and govern an asylum or marine hospital to be called The Sailor's Snug Harbour, for the support of age, decrepit and worn out sailors, and that if it could not be legally done according to his intention by them without an act of the legislature, they should apply as soon as possible for an act to incorporate them for that purpose: and the contingency of procuring an act of incorporation was held not to be too remote, inasmuch as by the intent of the testator it was to happen within a reasonable time.

When the former cause between the present parties was before this court, it would seem that the counsel for the then plaintiffs, the testator's heirs at law, based their argument against the validity of 419 the devise in *question mainly upon the ground that it was a devise to the literary fund, a corporation then incapable of taking, and upon a contingency too remote. But the court held that the devise was not to the literary fund, but to the executors in trust, and that the contingency upon which the testator's bounty was to take effect was not too remote. The devise to the executors, and the time for its effectual operation, were matters of construction; and the difficulties removed by the construction adopted by the court were not inherent in the cause, but suggested by the ability of counsel, upon an erroneous construction of the devise insisted on by them, but repudiated by the court. The difficulties therefore were not in the mind of the court, but in the mind of the counsel, and can throw no light upon the present question.

The question now before the court is simply and exclusively whether the contingency has occurred upon which the trust for the literary fund, created by the will and engrafted upon the devise to the executors, was to take effect. To determine this, we must of course look to the nature of the contingency; and that must depend altogether upon the intent of the testator. He had resolved to establish a charity, to be administered by the president and directors of the literary fund, through the agency of the school commissioners; and that resolution was fixed and final, so far as he and his representatives were concerned. But it required for its accomplishment the concurrence of another will, that of the legislature; and it required nothing more. It was wholly immaterial whether such concurrence was granted with or without solicitation, whether upon or without the application of the trustee or cestui que trust, whether at the suggestion of a member of the legislature or a stranger, whether as an act of grace and favour on the part of the government, or of public duty as the representative of a great public interest.

420 *There is nothing formal or technical in the devise in question. Important parts of it are not expressed in precise words, but to be inferred from the testator's general intent. Thus, that the devise is to the executors has been inferred from the direction that the estate is to be used by them in constituting it a part of the literary fund; which can only be done (in the appropriate mode of a surrender and conveyance of the property) by regarding the executors as clothed with the possession and title. So, that the devise is contingent upon the action of the legislature, we infer, because such action was contemplated by the testator, and indispensable to the success of his bounty. But we are not at liberty to infer a condition which is to defeat the whole purpose of the devise. The testator has not made his charity dependent upon the volition, or discretion, or fidelity of his executors. They had a plain and simple duty to perform, to wit, the tradition and conveyance of the property to the literary fund, so soon as that corporation should be authorized by the legislature to receive and appropriate it for the intended purpose. It was moreover the duty of the executors (not made so expressly, but by strong implication) to obtain, if they could, the concurrence of the legislature in the proposed endowment; a concurrence, not with the will of the executors, but with the will of the testator. But to obtain if practicable; imports nothing more than the use of the lawful and proper means: and of what significance are the means when the end has been accomplished?

The desired act of assembly has been passed, and why should we now enquire whether it was passed with or without the consent of the acting executor? I readily admit that if it appeared clearly from the will, that the testator intended the establishment and endowment of his proposed charity should depend upon the consent of his executors, then we ought to treat 421 such consent *as an indispensable condition: but to my mind the manifest intent was directly contrary: and so the case is nothing more than the ordinary one of a refusal on the part of the trustee to execute the trust. In the language of the master of the rolls in Malim v. Keighley, 2 Ves. jun. 335, "wherever any person gives property, and points out the object, the property, and the way in which it shall go, that does create a trust, unless he shews clearly that his desire expressed is to be controlled by the party, and that he shall have an option to defeat it." In that view of the subject, I consider the cause free from all difficulty. If we could conceive that the consent of the acting executor was necessary to the passage of the act of the legislature, that consent being a matter of duty and not of discretion, a court of equity would have compelled him to give it previously. And now that the act has been passed, equity will compel his assent, by requiring him to surrender and convey the property.

It was, as I conceive, in no wise necessary that the testator should have contemplated the consent of his executors to the passage of the law, in order to relieve the contingency from the imputation of being too remote. Whether an executory devise tends to establish a perpetuity or not, depends upon the testator's intention as to the time within which the contingency shall happen. It was never held that executory devises are to be governed by the rules of the common law as to common law conveyances: the only question is whether the contingency is to happen within a reasonable time or not, (Thellusson v. Woodford, 4 Ves. 327, 329,) and that is to be determined by the testator's intent, upon a fair and liberal interpretation of the whole will. Inglis v. The Trustees of the Sailor's Snug Harbour, 3 Pet. 117; Chapman v. Brown, 3 Burr. 1634. Now I think it clear that it was the testator's intention the legislature should act upon the subject in a reasonable time. If, when he *said "an act of assembly for said object supposed can be obtained," he had added the words "in a reasonable time," could any one doubt that the devise would have been defeated by an unreasonable delay in the passage of a law? And yet how can it be supposed that his meaning was otherwise? and "to attain the intent," shall not "implication supply verbal omissions?" (Lord Mansfield in 3 Burr. 1634.) Do not the nature of the endowment, the investment of his estate in the literary fund, and the application of its accruing profits, exclude the idea that it might be locked up indefinitely in the hands of his executors, the very persons who were directed to invest it, and whose duty it was to solicit and endeavour to obtain the passage of the law? It is evident that he contemplated the prompt action of the legislature; and if so, can it be said that he did not intend it should occur within a reasonable time? The acts to be performed by his executors were, it is true, official acts, but the performance of them was a personal duty, which could not, without malfeasance, be indefinitely delayed; which the testator must have expected them to perform forthwith, or as soon as practicable, and the performance of which necessarily involved the action of the legislature, or its refusal to act, within a reasonable time. What would be the precise limits of that reasonable time, it has never yet been, and never can be, necessary to enquire: it is enough that they could not transcend the period prescribed by the rules of executory limitations.

The views above stated are, it seems to me, in perfect accordance with the decree of this court, and the opinions of the judges, in the former cause between the same parties. All objections to the validity of the devise were then overruled: that founded on the supposed remoteness of the contingency was especially noticed and condemned, not because the contingency depended on the will of the executors, but on their

the cause of education, by establishing three seminaries of learning in the counties of Albemarle and Nelson; and to this object he devoted the greater part of his estate, real and personal, by the 16th clause of his will. But it appears he was apprehensive that this scheme of benevolence might fail, from the want of corporate powers for the preservation and administration of the fund thus created. In the event of such failure, he contemplated effectuating his general charitable design, the education of youth, by another plan, which would give him the agency of a then existing corporation, the president and directors of the literary fund. That plan was to constitute the estate devised a part of the literary fund, in such manner as to be used by the school commissioners for the counties of Albemarle and Nelson, in aid of the school fund allotted under the general law to those counties. But it seems he was aware that the laws constituting and regulating the literary fund, only contemplated its general resources, and would not be adequate to the administration of the specific charity he had in view. This obstacle, however, he believed could be removed by the power of the legislature, and he invoked its exercise in the following brief and comprehensive terms: "An act of assembly for said object supposed can be obtained."

The testator's apprehensions in regard to his primary scheme were realized. It did fail at the moment of his death, from the want of corporate powers to carry it into effect. The seminaries of learning which he sought to endow by the provisions of the 16th clause were not in existence, and could only be created by an act of incorporation. A devise to or for them was therefore inoperative and void,

418 upon the principles decided *by the supreme court of the United States in the case of The Baptist Association v. Hart's ex'ors, 4 Wheat. 1, and by this court in the case of Gallego's ex'ors v. The Attorney General, 3 Leigh 450. And the expedient had not occurred to the testator of providing that an act of incorporation should be obtained, and that when obtained the seminaries so incorporated, or other persons in trust for them, should be the devisees of his estate. That such a devise, at least in the latter form, by way of trust, would be good according to the law of executory devises, there is no reason to doubt. It would be a devise to or for a person (whether natural or artificial is immaterial) not in esse at the time of the testator's death, but to come into existence in a reasonable time, so as not to violate the rules of policy inhibiting perpetuities. A limitation of that kind, engrafted by way of condition on a common law conveyance, was held to be valid in Porter's case, 1 Rep. 24, and in the case of Inglis v. The Trustees of the Sailor's Snug Harbour, 3 Pet. 99, the supreme court of the United States sustained a devise to certain official persons in the state of New York (whom by their official titles the testator appointed his executors) and their successors, upon trust to erect, manage and govern an asylum or marine hospital to be called The Sailor's Snug Harbour, for the support of age, decrepit and worn out sailors, and that if it could not be legally done according to his intention by them without an act of the legislature, they should apply as soon as possible for an act to incorporate them for that purpose: and the contingency of procuring an act of incorporation was held not to be too remote, inasmuch as by the intent of the testator it was to happen within a reasonable time.

When the former cause between the present parties was before this court, it would seem that the counsel for the then plaintiffs, the testator's heirs at law, based their argument against the validity of 419 the devise in *question mainly upon the ground that it was a devise to the literary fund, a corporation then incapable of taking, and upon a contingency too remote. But the court held that the devise was not to the literary fund, but to the executors in trust, and that the contingency upon which the testator's bounty was to take effect was not too remote. The devise to the executors, and the time for its effectual operation, were matters of construction; and the difficulties removed by the construction adopted by the court were not inherent in the cause, but suggested by the ability of counsel, upon an erroneous construction of the devise insisted on by them, but repudiated by the court. The difficulties therefore were not in the mind of the court, but in the mind of the counsel, and can throw no light upon the present question.

The question now before the court is simply and exclusively whether the contingency has occurred upon which the trust for the literary fund, created by the will and engrafted upon the devise to the executors, was to take effect. To determine this, we must of course look to the nature of the contingency; and that must depend altogether upon the intent of the testator. He had resolved to establish a charity, to be administered by the president and directors of the literary fund, through the agency of the school commissioners; and that resolution was fixed and final, so far as he and his representatives were concerned. But it required for its accomplishment the concurrence of another will, that of the legislature; and it required nothing more. It was wholly immaterial whether such concurrence was granted with or without solicitation, whether upon or without the application of the trustee or cestui que trust, whether at the suggestion of a member of the legislature or a stranger, whether as an act of grace and favour on the part of the government, or of public duty as the representative of a great public interest.

420 *There is nothing formal or technical in the devise in question. Important parts of it are not expressed in precise words, but to be inferred from the testator's

general intent. Thus, that the devise is to the executors has been inferred from the direction that the estate is to be used by them in constituting it a part of the literary fund; which can only be done (in the appropriate mode of a surrender and conveyance of the property) by regarding the executors as clothed with the possession and title. So, that the devise is contingent upon the action of the legislature, we infer, because such action was contemplated by the testator, and indispensable to the success of his bounty. But we are not at liberty to infer a condition which is to defeat the whole purpose of the devise. The testator has not made his charity dependent upon the volition, or discretion, or fidelity of his executors. They had a plain and simple duty to perform, to wit, the tradition and conveyance of the property to the literary fund, so soon as that corporation should be authorized by the legislature to receive and appropriate it for the intended purpose. It was moreover the duty of the executors (not made so expressly, but by strong implication) to obtain, if they could, the concurrence of the legislature in the proposed endowment; a concurrence, not with the will of the executors, but with the will of the testator. But to obtain if practicable, imports nothing more than the use of the lawful and proper means: and of what significance are the means when the end has been accomplished?

The desired act of assembly has been passed, and why should we now enquire whether it was passed with or without the consent of the acting executor? I readily admit that if it appeared clearly from the will, that the testator intended the establishment and endowment of his proposed charity should depend upon the consent of 421 his executors, then we ought to treat such consent *as an indispensable condition: but to my mind the manifest intent was directly contrary: and so the case is nothing more than the ordinary one of a refusal on the part of the trustee to execute the trust. In the language of the master of the rolls in Malim v. Keighley, 2 Ves. jun. 335, "wherever any person gives property, and points out the object, the property, and the way in which it shall go, that does create a trust, unless he shews clearly that his desire expressed is to be controlled by the party, and that he shall have an option to defeat it." In that view of the subject, I consider the cause free from all difficulty. If we could conceive that the consent of the acting executor was necessary to the passage of the act of the legislature, that consent being a matter of duty and not of discretion, a court of equity would have compelled him to give it previously. And now that the act has been passed, equity will compel his assent, by requiring him to surrender and convey the property.

It was, as I conceive, in no wise necessary that the testator should have contemplated the consent of his executors to the passage of the law, in order to relieve the contingency from the imputation of being too remote. Whether an executory devise tends to establish a perpetuity or not, depends upon the testator's intention as to the time within which the contingency shall happen. It was never held that executory devises are to be governed by the rules of the common law as to common law conveyances: the only question is whether the contingency is to happen within a reasonable time or not, (Thellusson v. Woodford, 4 Ves. 327, 329,) and that is to be determined by the testator's intent, upon a fair and liberal interpretation of the whole will. Inglis v. The Trustees of the Sailor's Snug Harbour, 3 Pet. 117; Chapman v. Brown, 3 Burr. 1634. Now I think it clear that it was the testator's intention the legislature

422 should act upon the subject in a reasonable time. If, when he *said "an act of assembly for said object supposed can be obtained," he had added the words "in a reasonable time," could any one doubt that the devise would have been defeated by an unreasonable delay in the passage of a law? And yet how can it be supposed that his meaning was otherwise? and "to attain the intent," shall not "implication supply verbal omissions?" (Lord Mansfield in 3 Burr. 1634.) Do not the nature of the endowment, the investment of his estate in the literary fund, and the application of its accruing profits, exclude the idea that it might be locked up indefinitely in the hands of his executors, the very persons who were directed to invest it, and whose duty it was to solicit and endeavour to obtain the passage of the law? It is evident that he contemplated the prompt action of the legislature; and if so, can it be said that he did not intend it should occur within a reasonable time? The acts to be performed by his executors were, it is true, official acts, but the performance of them was a personal duty, which could not, without malfeasance, be indefinitely delayed; which the testator must have expected them to perform forthwith, or as soon as practicable, and the performance of which necessarily involved the action of the legislature, or its refusal to act, within a reasonable time. What would be the precise limits of that reasonable time, it has never yet been, and never can be, necessary to enquire: it is enough that they could not transcend the period prescribed by the rules of executory limitations.

The views above stated are, it seems to me, in perfect accordance with the decree of this court, and the opinions of the judges, in the former cause between the same parties. All objections to the validity of the devise were then overruled: that founded on the supposed remoteness of the contingency was especially noticed and condemned, not because the contingency depended on the will of the executors, but on their 423 duty; for there *is not the slightest intimation of any discretion on their part to defeat the devise. Judge Brooke's opinion evidently rests upon the procurement or passage of the law within a reasonable time, and not upon the consent of the executors to its passage. Judge Tucker thought the case very much the same as that of Inglis v. The Trustees of the Sailor's Snug Harbour, in which it will be seen that the executors were directed to apply to the legislature as soon as possible, and no one supposed for a moment that they had any discretion.

In a word, it would to my mind be very remarkable, if the testator had defeated his manifest and lawful purpose, by the lawful means which he adopted for its accomplishment: if he could be regarded as attempting a perpetuity, not in the legal sense of a corporate charity, but in the illegal sense of unreasonable delay in its creation: if his measures for the sure and swift execution of his scheme should have the effect of protracting it indefinitely; and if he had confided to his executors the discretion of thwarting his unequivocal, decided, and clearly expressed intention.

As to the objections made to the details of the statute for the administration of the charity, they are matters which go not to the abrogation but the modification of the law, and should be addressed to the legislature. The provisions of the act are, however, in my opinion, strictly in conformity with those of the devise, for reasons which will be assigned by judge Allen in presenting his views of the case; which reasons, to my apprehension, are entirely satisfactory.

I think the decree ought to be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to compel the prompt and complete execution of the trust.

ALLEN, J. The validity of the devise contained in the 17th clause of Martin Dawson's will was considered by this court in the case reported in 10 Leigh 147.

424 *The inferior court had declared that devise void. That decree was reversed, upon the ground that the devise was not to a corporation at that time incapable of taking and administering the estate in the mode prescribed by the will, but to the executors, in trust for the purpose of procuring the necessary act of assembly to constitute the estate a part of the literary fund. Holding the devise valid on this ground, the trust must be viewed as personal, confided to the persons named as executors, and not as an official trust. If an official trust had been intended, the contingency would have been too remote: the executors named, or their successors administering with the will annexed, would have been embraced, and there would have been no limit to the time within which the contingency might have happened. This the law forbids. To constitute a good executory devise, the contingency must happen within a reasonable time; and that has always been held to be a life or lives in being and 21 years afterwards. An act of the legislature has since been passed, on the application of the president and directors of the literary fund, empowering them to receive and hold the estate dedicated by the 17th clause of the will. This application was not concurred in by the executors. They had petitioned for an act to carry into effect the intention of the testator as expressed in the 16th clause of the will; which petition, the preamble of the act recites, was rejected because of the decision that the said clause was void. In enacting the law which was actually passed, the legislature declared that the same was not to affect the rights of the heirs of the testator, in the event it should be decided that an application or petition from the executors was necessary to give effect to the claim of the president and directors of the literary fund. That question is now presented for decision: and in considering it, the will must be looked into for the purpose of ascertaining the intent of the testator.

425 *By the first clause of the will, an intention is manifested to dispose of his whole estate. Then follow many special bequests in favour of his relations and others, among which is included a provision for Willim W. Dawson one of the executors. Having made these particular dispositions, the testator by the 16th clause gives and devises the residue of his estate, real and personal, to be used by his executors in erecting three seminaries of learning. The 17th clause is as follows: "Should my executors fail to carry into effect said 16th devise for seminaries of learning, (which I hope and trust they will not,) then the real and personal estate devised for said objects, to be used by my executors in constituting a part of the literary fund of the state of Virginia, and two thirds of the interest on it to be used by the school commissioners for the county of Albemarle, in the same way the school fund allotted for the said county is used. The other one third of the interest on it to be appropriated and used by the school commissioners for the county of Nelson in the same way. And from time to time, as the legislature may think advisable, the principal may be used for like objects for the benefit of the said counties, in same proportions as the interest is directed to be used. An act of assembly for said object, supposed can be obtained."

The general and leading intention to dedicate this estate to the purposes of education within the counties of Albemarle and Nelson is clearly manifested. As regarded his relations, he had made such provision for them before as he thought proper. His first and favourite scheme is developed in the 16th section. But he seems to have apprehended that difficulties might obstruct its execution. He looked to the possibility of its failure: and to provide for that contingency, and ensure an application of this estate to the leading intention of his will, he made the devise contained in the 17th clause. Is there anything which indicates an intention *to confide this matter to the discretion of his executors; to leave it to their judgment, whether this leading intention should or should not be carried into effect? He contemplated no benefit to them individually; for his relations he had provided; and he manifest a determination, in the first clause of the will, to dispose of the whole estate. No motive to be gathered from the will itself seems to have existed for permitting the disposition of the principal part of his estate to depend upon the discretion of his executors. To give to his will such a construction, would convert that which he intended to be a complete and final disposition of his estate, into a mere request to his executors so to dispose of it if their judgment corresponded with his; thus substituting the will of his executors in the place of his own. The terms of the devise itself shew no intention to place the administration or control of the fund in the hands of the executors. They were to use it in constituting a part of the literary fund of the state. When constituted a part of that fund, their power over it ceased forever. For its future preservation and application to the purposes of his will, he trusted to the legislature. Whilst it remained unimpaired, the interest was to be applied by the school commissioners in the same way the quota allotted by law to the two counties was used. With this application of the interest, the executors could not interfere. The testators knew that the duties of the school commissioners were prescribed by law, and that they were at all times, in respect to the administration of the school fund, subject to the control of the legislature. When therefore he directed that they should administer the interest of the fund created by his will in the same way the school fund was used, he clearly intended that it should be used by them in the mode prescribed by law, subject to such modifications as the legislature should from time to time adopt. The executors 427 could not interfere *with the school commissioners in the administration of the public school fund; and if not, neither could they exercise any supervision over this particular fund, for both were to be used in the same way. And so with respect to the principal: the testator, foreseen that in the progress of time it might be expedient to apply the principal to the purposes of his will, confides that in express terms to the discretion of the legislature; thus making a complete and final disposition of the whole estate. With that disposition the executors could not interfere.

But it is said, the testator also contemplated an application to the legislature by his executors, to enable the president and directors of the literary fund to take and hold the estate for the purposes of his will. That he so intended must be conceded, for that intention was necessary (according to my interpretation of the decision of this court) to give validity to the devise. But was that the leading, governing intention of the testator? To hold that it was, would be to bring us back to the question already discussed, and to say that the discretion of his executors was to be substituted in the place of his will. The testator no doubt had confidence in the good faith of his executors, and did not contemplate any failure on their part to perform the trust confided to them. He intended that they should apply for the act. An act was necessary to effectuate the end he had in view, and an application by his executors the means of obtaining it. But if they refuse to apply, and the end is attained in another mode, is the whole will to be defeated because this particular intent fails? The mode by which it was his intention to dedicate his property to the purposes named, is not departed from. The act, no matter by whose application obtained, is the mode pointed out by him; and when it is passed, his intention is carried into effect. In Inglis v. The Trustees of the Sailor's Snug

428 Harbour, 3 Peters 116, it is *said, that "for the purpose of carrying into effect the intention of the testator, any mode pointed out by him will be sanctioned, if consistent with the rules of law, although some may fail;" and (p. 117), that "where the court can see a general intent consistent with the rules of law, it is to be carried into effect though the particular intent shall fail." And see the authorities referred to in the last cited page. The respect due to a decision of that tribunal is in this instance somewhat impaired, as to the case itself, by the dissent of justice Story, with whom the chief justice concurred. But justice Story in his opinion does not deny the rule of law. Commenting on this part of the case, he observes, "It is said that in a will, a particular may be made to yield to a more general intent. Certainly it may: but then the difficulty in the application of this rule to the present case is, that the argument insists upon a construction, which I cannot but deem an overthrow of the general, to subserve an intent not indicated. Because a testator has expressed an intent to be carried into effect one way, which cannot consistently by law be so, and the court can see another way by which he might have carried it into effect if he had thought of it, it does not follow that the court can do that which the testator might have done, and newmodel the provisions of the will." And again, in the same passage, he remarks—"The general intention here appears to me to be, to create a perpetual trust, in certain trustees in succession, for charity. And I can perceive no particular intent as distinguishable from that general intent. The perpetuity, the succession, and trusteeship are in his view equally substantial ingredients."

In the case under consideration, the testator has not expressed an intent to be carried into effect one way, which cannot consistently by law be so. The mode designated to carry his intent into effect conflicts with no rule of law; and by passed, the general intent is executed, and not defeated. It is effected, not to subserve an intent which the testator never indicated, but substantially in the mode which he pointed out. He intended to create a perpetuity, but not in these trustees. No succession or supervision in them was contemplated. When the act should be obtained, and the executors should have constituted the estate a part of the literary fund, their powers were to terminate; and the preservation and administration of the fund, so as to effectuate the testator's leading intent, was entrusted to others. According to the argument of judge Story, this would be a case where the particular should yield to a more general intent.

It is supposed that the decision of this court in 10 Leigh 147, conflicts with this construction. The determination of the court is embodied in the decree. The only question before the court was as to the validity of the devise in the 17th clause. They held that the devise was not void. To that extent the decision, whether a correct construction of the will or not, (as to which I give no opinion,) furnishes the law of the case, and is binding on this court. The point now under consideration was not then before the court for adjudication. At that time the executors expressed their willingness to carry into effect the intention of their testator, if it could be done consistently with the rules of law. The idea of a refusal by them was not entertained, nor its effect upon the devise considered. In this condition of the case, and with reference to the question then presented (the validity of the devise), judge Tucker observed, that the law is clearly to be obtained by those to whom the trust is confided of constituting the estate a part of the literary fund. The opinions of a judge are always to be received in connexion with the point for decision. So treating this remark, it is perfectly correct, and yet does not bear upon the subject now under consideration.

To give to the devise a construction
430 *which would relieve it from the objection that the contingency might not happen within the reasonable time prescribed by law, and was therefore too remote, it was necessary to shew that the testator intended it to be performed within a reasonable time.

That he did so intend, the judge argued, was clear, for he intended his executors to apply for the law: so intending, the contingency must happen in their lifetime; and therefore the devise was valid. But though such an intent was necessary to give validity to the devise, it is nowhere said or intimated by the judge, that if the executors should refuse to give effect to that intent, their refusal should defeat a valid devise. That depended on distinct considerations; upon a view of the whole will, to ascertain the general, leading intent of the testator; the mode designated to effectuate it; and whether, though there should be a failure in one particular, that of an application by the executors for the necessary act, the general intent could not be still carried into effect, and substantially by the mode designated, notwithstanding the refusal of the executors to make such application.

It seems to me that, in the event which has happened, it was competent for the president and directors of the literary fund to apply for the act, and that upon the passage of a law empowering them to take, hold and administer the estate in conformity with the terms of the will, the contingency has happened which gives effect to the devise, and the estate vests in the president and directors of the literary fund. The estate is to constitute a part of the literary fund: a perpetuity in the corporate body, if the legislature should think it advisable, is contemplated; and neither the heirs nor the executors have any beneficial interest. The legal title vested in the executors must be transferred to the corporation, charged with the execution of the trust; for this is essential to such an 431 administration of the *fund as the testator clearly intended. The property cannot return to the heirs; for where lands are given to a corporation for charitable uses which the testator contemplates may last forever, the heir cannot have the lands back. 2 Story's Equity 420; High. on Mortmain 336, 353.

It is said that the legislature has not so acted as to carry into effect the intentions of the testator; and several objections are made to the details of the act.

The 2d section charges the fund with all costs of suit, fees and expenses heretofore incurred or hereafter to be incurred by the president and directors of the literary fund, in sustaining said devise or managing the fund. The testator could not have supposed that these expenses were to be paid out of the public fund. By legal intendment, all expenses incurred in relation to this fund are properly chargeable on it. A decision of the court as to the validity of the devises contained in the 16th and 17th clauses of the will necessarily preceded the application for or the passage of the act. The costs incurred in the prosecution of the suit to determine this question grew out of the will itself, and are chargeable on the fund created by it.

The 3d section directs the payment of the interest to the school commissioners of the counties of Albemarle and Nelson, in the proportions designated by the testator, to be used by the school commissioners for the same objects and purposes, and under the same regulations, that the school fund for those counties from the public treasury may be used. At the date of the will, the quota allotted to each county was applied to the education of poor children; but when the act passed, the surplus income of the literary fund had been appropriated, and the school commissioners were empowered to apply their proportions of this surplus for the benefit of colleges or academies within their respective counties. It is said that the testator looked to the mode in which the fund was then used, and intended to devote *his estate to the exclusive education of the poor: whereas under this law the school commissioners may, either directly or indirectly, appropriate it to colleges or academies. According to my construction of this clause of the will, though the testator adopts the phrase "is used," he is not to be understood as speaking of the time at which he prepared his will. The fund was to be paid to the school commissioners, to be used by them as they used the fund paid by the state. As they used the money received from the state according to the regulations prescribed by law; such use as they were authorized to make of the public fund would be a proper use of this fund: the testator confiding in the good faith of the legislature to use it according to his expressed intentions. But however this may be, the law does not justify the application of the interest to any other purpose than that to which the money allotted to the school commissioners was applied at the date of the will. The act of assembly passed March 22, 1836, (Acts of 1835-6, ch. 4, p. 7,) gives authority to the school commissioners of the respective counties to apply the quota of the surplus then distributed, to colleges and academies. Their discretion is limited to that surplus. But the interest from this fund is to be administered in the same way the general school fund is used.

The 4th section provides for the preservation of the fund, and directs that any unexpended balance for one year shall be converted into principal, so as to enlarge the fund. To this provision there would seem to be no valid objection. Surely, when the testator entrusted the whole administration of the fund to the agents selected, he must have intended to confer upon them the authority to preserve it from waste, if any portion was not required for the use of a particular year. It is argued, that if the fund is not required for any particular year, it should be transferred to the heir or next of kin. But if I am right in sup-433 posing that upon the happening *of the contingency the whole estate vests in the literary fund in perpetuity, the heirs and next of kin have no interest in the subject.

The 5th section provides, in the words of the will, that the principal may, if the legislature think it advisable, be appropriated to the uses of the school commissioners, or for like purposes. It is contended that under this provision and almost unlimited latitude is allowed to the legislature, and that in virtue of it they might apply this fund to any object they deemed analogous to the one to which the will had dedicated it. The answer to this is, that the law as passed directs the application in strict accordance with the intentions of the testator, and the power reserved is precisely that which the will conferred. We are not called upon to determine the extent of this authority. If a power over this estate is vested in the legislature as extensive as that which is exercised by the english chancery court under the statute of 43d Elizabeth of charitable uses, that would not render the act void. The power of the legislature to pass a general law similar to the 43d Elizabeth has never been questioned. No more can it be doubted, that whatever power is conferred by the words of the will in regard to this estate, may be exercised by the legislature, if by a special act they have sanctioned and legalized the devise.

Upon the whole, it seems to me that upon the passage of the act the contingency has happened which enables the president and directors of the literary fund to take, hold and administer the fund, and that the act is in strict conformity with the terms, provisions and conditions of the will; and consequently that the court below erred in dismissing the bill upon the demurrer of the heirs at law and the answer of the executor.

BROOKE, J. I concur in the view taken by judge Baldwin, and also in the view 434 taken by judge Allen, of *the act authorizing the literary fund to take the devise under Martin Dawson's will: and I shall add nothing but a few remarks in reply to what has been said in respect to my opinion in the case of The Literary Fund v. Dawson and others, 10 Leigh 147. When that case was before the court, the act of assembly now before us had not passed; and it is not to be inferred, from my using in that case the expression—"If then the executors in a reasonable time can procure such a law" &c. that in my opinion it depended entirely on the executors to procure the law, and the will otherwise could not be executed. The executors in their answers had expressed a willingness to apply for the law. I had no idea then that the testator intended they should have the whole of their lives to make the application. I thought a reasonable time should be allowed them, and that in the event they did not procure an act, the literary fund might procure it, and execute the trust first confided to the executors by the testator. I did not concur with the president in thinking that the contingency of its passing was to be within a life or lives in being: to my mind the obvious intention of the testator was, that if the act were found necessary, it should be procured in a reasonable time.—I could elaborate this opinion; but I shall not.

CABELL, P., expressed his concurrence in the opinion delivered by judge Allen.

The decree of the court of appeals declared the decree of the circuit court to be erroneous in dismissing the bill of the appellants, instead of overruling the demurrer thereto and giving the relief sought by said bill: Therefore the said decree was reversed with costs, and the cause remanded to the circuit court, for further proceedings to be had therein pursuant to the foregoing opinion and decree.

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Wills—Devise for Testator's Daughter and Her Children*—Construction.—A testator devises to a married daughter A. R. and her heirs, W. S. R. included, two tracts of land, and declaring that the daughter's husband is not capable of conducting his own affairs, and is therefore entirely excluded from managing any part of his (testator's) estate, directs that his executor shall manage the land "in the following manner, that is to say, that A. R. and her children shall have the rents or profit, except the place I now rent to W. R. and J. D. for three years, but after that time the entire profit of both tracts shall be to the said A. R. and her children, and shall not be sold by them or any of them until her youngest child comes to the age of 21 years, and not then without the consent of my daughter A. R. if she is then living." At the date of the will, A. R. has eight children, all of whom except two are living with her. The annual value of the land devised is about 175 dollars. HELD by the court of appeals, (dissentiente STANARD, J.) A. R. is entitled to receive the whole rents and profits of the lands devised, during her life, and her children can maintain no suit to recover any portion of the same. Accord. Wallace & ux. v. Dold's ex'ors & al., 3 Leigh 258.

James Stinson senior, late of Shenandoah county, died in the year 1830, having duly made and published his last will and testament, bearing date the 10th of January 1825, by the sixth clause whereof he devised as follows:

"Sixthly, I give and bequeath to my daughter Anna Roy, late Stinson, and her heirs, Wiley S. Roy included, two tracts of land, viz. the one is the tract that was con-

*Conveyance for Woman and Children—Mention of Children—Motive for Gift.—A grant or gift to a woman and her children, or to a trustee for the benefit of herself and children, passes to the mother; the mention of the word "children" in the deed or will merely indicates the motive for the gift or conveyance, without investing them with any interest therein. veyed to me by William Roy by deed bearing date the 30th day of December 1817, lying on the north side of the South river; the other tract lying on the opposite or east side of said river, a small distance below said land, and is the land whereon William Roy now lives, and is included in the same deed of the 100 acres above 436 *mentioned; which land I bequeath to them in the following manner, to wit: William Roy, my son in law, is not capable of conducting his own affairs, therefore he himself is entirely excluded from managing any part of my estate. I therefore wish, and it is my will, for my hereinafter named executor to manage the land in this clause in the following manner; that is to say, that Anna Roy and her children shall have the rents or profit, except the place I now rent to Wiley Roy and Joseph Day for three years, but after that time the entire profit of both tracts shall be to the said Anna Roy and her children, and shall not be sold by them or any of them until her youngest child comes to the age of twenty-one years, and not then without the consent of my daughter Anna Roy, if she is then living."

In the fifth clause of his will, the testator had given a tract of land to his grandson Wiley S. Roy. The seventh clause contained the following bequests of slaves: "My daughter Anna Roy is to have Lucy, but on the same terms of the land mentioned in the sixth clause of this my will, to her and her heirs. And I give and bequeath to my granddaughter Polly Day, late Roy, a small negro girl named Harriet, to her and her heirs forever." By other clauses, the testator devised certain lands to his two sons John and James, respectively, and their heirs.

James Stinson junior, a son of the testator, was named in the will sole executor thereof, and he qualified as such in November 1830.

At the date of the will, Mrs. Roy the daughter of the testator had eight children, all of whom were living with her, except Wiley S. and Mary (called in the 7th clause of the will Polly) who was the wife of James Day. The youngest of the children was then scarcely two years old.

In May 1833, James Day and Mary his wife exhibited their bill in the circuit 437 superior court of Shenandoah *county, against James Stinson the executor and trustee named in the will, Anna Roy, her husband William Roy, and her other children, of whom several were still infants, and five continued to reside with her. The bill set forth the will of the testator, and insisted that, according to the just construction thereof, the rents and profits of the two tracts of land devised for the benefit of Anna Roy and her children, belonged to the said Anna and all her children in equal shares, and so the plaintiffs were entitled to one ninth part of the same. It was alleged that one of the tracts of land was in the possession of Anna Roy, and the other in that of Wiley S. Roy, to whom the same had been rented by the defendant Stinson; and that Stinson had been applied to by the plaintiffs for some proportion of the rents and profits, but had refused to let them have any part. The prayer of the bill was, that the court would direct an account of the said rents and profits since the death of the testator, and decree one ninth part thereof to be paid to the plaintiffs by Stinson the executor and trustee; or that the plaintiffs might have such other relief as they were entitled to on the true construction of the will.

Stinson, by his answer, submitted the construction of the will to the court. He denied that he had rented any part of the land to Wiley S. Roy; stated that no part of it was in his own possession; and insisted that he could not, if he would, recover the possession, not having the legal title.

The infant defendants answered by their guardian ad litem, submitting to the court the construction of the will and the protection of their interests. The other adult defendants failed to answer, and as to them the bill was taken pro confesso.

The cause coming on to be heard the 10th of April 1834, the circuit court held, that according to the true construction of the will, Anna Roy and her children 438 *took as joint purchasers the lands devised in the sixth clause, and that the plaintiff Mary Day was entitled to one ninth part of the rents and profits thereof since the death of the testator; and accordingly directed a commissioner to ascertain the amount of such rents and profits, and report the same to the court.

The commissioner reported an account by which the annual rent of the two tracts was estimated at 175 dollars, and interest was charged upon the rent of each year. The aggregate of principal and interest from the death of the testator to the 1st of November 1833 was 576 dollars, to one ninth of which, or 64 dollars, with interest on 58 dollars part thereof from the said 1st of November 1833, the plaintiffs were entitled according to the terms of the interlocutory decree.

On the 10th of September 1834 the cause was finally heard; when the circuit court, overruling an exception taken by the defendant Stinson to the commissioner's report, decreed that he pay to the plaintiffs the sum of money, with interest, thereby appearing to be due them, and eight ninths of the costs of suit, which he was to retain out of the rents that Mrs. Roy and her other children were entitled to receive.

Stinson applied by petition to this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

C. and G. N. Johnson, for the appellant, admitted that Mrs. Roy did not take a fee simple interest in the lands devised, the word heirs in the beginning of the clause being qualified and explained by other terms employed; but they insisted that the construction adopted by the circuit court, whereby the daughter of the testator and her youngest child (scarcely two years old at the date of the will) were held equally interested in the rents and profits, was erroneous. The testator's daughter, they said, was the chief object of his bounty.

The creation of a trust in the executor 439 was solely intended *to exclude the marital rights of her husband, not to give a joint and equal interest to her children and herself. The practical administration of the fund was to be left to the discretion of the mother during her life; and in the exercise of that discretion, she might apply the proceeds to the benefit of herself and her children in such manner and proportions as their respective wants, which would certainly be unequal, might require. After her death, if she died before the youngest child attained the age of 21 years, the same discretion was to be exercised by the trustee, for the common benefit of the children. That such was the scheme intended by the testator, was confirmed by the provision restraining the children from alienating. That restraint could only have been imposed, because the power of alienation would be inconsistent with the discretionary power over the rents and profits, designed to be vested in those who were to administer the fund; namely, the mother and the trustee. The case of Wallace & ux. v. Dold's ex'ors & al., 3 Leigh 258, they said, was a conclusive authority against the claim set up by the bill.

The attorney general, for the appellees, argued, that the direction for the executor to manage the land and apply the rents or profits to the benefit of Mrs. Roy and her children, shewed that the testator designed the rents or profits to pass through the hands of the executor to the beneficiaries; and there was no rule for apportioning the fund, but equality of benefit. The restraint of alienation until the youngest child attained full age, implied that a present interest was conferred on the children, and might be alienated by them but for such restraint. In Wallace & ux. v. Dold's ex'ors & al. the child had not separated from the family of the mother. The suit here is brought by a child who has married and left the family; and unless it be sustained, she will be excluded from all interest in a fund which was certainly intended not less for her benefit than 440 that of *the children who continued to reside with their mother. The authorities referred to by President Tucker, who dissented from the other judges in Wallace & ux. v. Dold's ex'ors & al. shew, that the construction of wills similar to this has been, that the children take equally with the parent.

BALDWIN, J. This is an awkward and obscure devise, but it has a key to it, which I think will unlock the testator's meaning. That key is to be found in the condition of this daughter, and the provision which a father would be naturally disposed to make for a child in her circumstances. She was the wife of an improvident husband, and the mother of a large, and, it may have been, increasing family of children; some of them of tender years; and of two who had attained maturity, one was a married daughter, and the other a son who had set out in life and was managing for himself. The testator, in making a final distribution of his property amongst his children, would of course be desirous of placing the share intended for this unfortunate daughter, beyond the control of the thriftless husband, and the grasp of his creditors; and to secure the benefits of the property to her and those who were the nearest objects of her solicitude, and who by that reason chiefly had attracted his own affectionate regard. The anxious father's wish would therefore be to give the daughter the control, discretion and authority, which should pertain to the only efficient head of the family; so restricted merely as to prevent her dominion over the subject from being injuriously perverted. Such a purpose would require a scheme giving to her a home and the perception of the little income of her humble estate, for the common maintenance of herself and family, with the chance of appropriating any surplus that industry and frugality might yield, towards the advancement of such of her offspring as had left, or might leave, 441 the household *shelter; a scheme that would authorize her, for those objects, to continue her ownership and enjoyment within the limit of her life, or to surrender either or both, at her discretion, to and for the benefit of those entitled to the succession; a scheme that would thus retard or accelerate the admission of her heirs respectively into their inheritance, according to the wants and interests of the family.

With this view of the testator's probable motives, arising out of the triple relation of the prominent devisee of daughter, wife and mother, and in connexion with the scantiness of the provision contemplated, we shall find that the devise is reasonable and judicious in the whole, with a perfect unison and harmony in all its parts: whereas a different consideration of the subject must result inevitably in a harsh and grating discord. Let us look for a moment into the particulars of the clause in question.

In the first place, the testator shews that this daughter is the primary object of his contemplated bounty, by giving the property to her and her heirs, with the designation, it is true, of one of those heirs, (who, it would seem, was a favourite grandson,) lest it might be supposed that he was excluded from the inheritance, by a separate devise of a tract of land to him in a preceding part of the will. He then proceeds to exclude all marital rights and control of the husband, by declaring that he shall have nothing to do with the management of the property, because incapable of conducting his own affairs. He next interposes his *executor as trustee, but without investing him with the title, inasmuch as he was merely to be the protector of the separate estate, without actual possession of the property, or purnancy of the profits. Then follows a declaration that the profit is to be to the daughter and her children, evidencing that she is to have the income and her heirs a present interest in the subject, but qualified immediately 442 *afterwards by a provision that it shall not be sold by them or any of them (meaning the heirs or children) until the youngest child comes to the age of 21 years, and not then without the consent of their mother, if still living. This provision manifests that the mother was to take the profits for the common benefit of the family, without diminution by subtractions from the principal, so long as the whole income might be requisite for the support of the younger children, or afterwards during her life, if she should deem the whole necessary for her own maintenance. We can account rationally in no other way for the acceleration first of the interest of the heirs, and then its restriction, at the discretion of their mother. Why should the adult and married children be prevented from alienating during the minority of the others, and subsequently at the will of the mother during her life, but to secure her maintenance and that of the household? And why too should they not be permitted to alienate, if it should be found to advance their interests, without prejudicing the common interests of the family; and who so proper to be the judge of this as the mother and mistress of the domestic establishment?

On the other hand, why should we imply, for it is not expressed in the will, an immediate devise of the little estate, real and personal (it embracing a slave by a subsequent clause) to the mother and her children, adults and infants, married and unmarried, born and unborn, as joint tenants or tenants in common, with the distribution amongst them individually and equally of what was a bare modicum of income for common sustenance? Look at the consequences, and see how it defeats the whole paternal scheme for shelter and food and raiment, and domestic happiness. What becomes of the maternal control and authority; of a discretion adapted to the wants and inclinations of the children; of a frugal but comfortable household management and thrift; of the domestic hearth itself? And how is the trustee to 443 *conduct the complex machine, without personal attention to its minutest details; or to save himself from responsibility without taking actual possession of the subject, and doling out the peculium of each individual, including the pittance of some 20 dollars per annum to the mother of the family? In the very nature of things, a device so absurd, impracticable and mischievous could never have entered a father's heart.

A construction fraught with such evils, defeating the main object which the testator had in view, and mocking the wretchedness which he sought to relieve, can gain no countenance except from a merely technical view of the question, derived from the rigidity of common law conveyances, and inapplicable to the last wills and testaments of ignorant testators, whose intention, the great desideratum, is to be attained by moulding with a plastic hand their rude and imperfect language into a conformity with their natural and common sense thought. The intention, fairly and candidly sought and sufficiently ascertained, overrules every thing else, and becomes the law of the will, unless in contravention of the law of the land. "If," said lord Mansfield in Chapman v. Brown, 3 Burr. 1634, "words are supplied by construction, it must always be in support of the manifest intent. The blunder of expression is here favourable to the real meaning, and therefore cannot be supplied by construction, the constant object of which is to attain the intent. For this purpose, words of limitation shall operate as words of purchase; implications shall supply verbal omissions; the letter shall give way; every inaccuracy of grammar, every impropriety of terms shall be corrected by the general meaning, if that be manifest."

This view of the case is, I think, strongly sustained by the decision of the court, and the reasoning of judge Carr, adopted by the majority of the judges, in the case of Wallace & wife v. Dold's ex'ors & al., 3 444 Leigh 258. *In that case there was a bequest of slaves and money to trustees, with a direction that the profits of the slaves and the interest of the money should be applied to the support and maintenance of a married daughter of the testator, and her child; and that on the death of his daughter, the slaves should be given to her child or children, if she should have more than one: and it was held that the testator's daughter was entitled to the whole profits during her life, and the daughter's child had no right to demand a share of them for her support and maintenance. There were other circumstances relied on, but the opinion of the court was based, in a great measure, upon the probable motives and design of the testator, the wants of the daughter, and the nature and purpose of the bequest. It was a much stronger case than this; and though judge Tucker dissented from the rest of the court, some of his remarks in reference to provisions for the maintenance of families, seem to indicate that his conclusion would most probably have been different in a case like this.

I think the decree ought to be reversed, and the bill dismissed with costs.

ALLEN, J. In the construction of this will, the situation of the parties must be looked to for the purpose of ascertaining the probable intent of the testator. He had three children, for whom it was his intention to provide, and who are the principal objects of his bounty. To his two sons he gives portions simply and directly. But his daughter was peculiarly situated. From the face of the will it appears that she was married to an improvident husband. He of managing his own affairs, and therefore he excludes him from managing any part of his estate. This daughter had eight children, two of whom had left the paternal roof; and for these, the testator makes a special provision. The remaining 445 children *lived with the mother, and some of them were of tender years. In this state of the family, it seems to me, the daughter was the principal object of the testator's bounty. Having provided for such of her children as had left her, his intention was to secure to her a comfortable provision for life; to place her in a condition in which she should be certain to receive the profits of this small estate, the whole of which was not more than sufficient for her maintenance in the decline of life. The first clause gives the property to her and her heirs, the grandson included; the testator apprehending perhaps, that if he were not specially named as one of the heirs, a doubt might arise whether, as he had previously given him a tract of land, he would not be excluded. These words would have given the daughter the fee. Subsequent qualifications of the devise prove that did not use the word in a technical meaning, and that he intended by it the children. They are important, however, as indicating an intention that all the children of his daughter, whether then living or not, were to take; that it was not the intention to exclude afterborn children. Having by this clause indicated the general intent to provide for his daughter and all her heirs, he proceeds to qualify the generality of the devise, by securing it from the control of the husband. For this purpose he interposes a trustee to manage the estate, and directs that his daughter and her children shall have the profits, but that the land should not be sold by them or any of them until the youngest child arrived at age, and not then without the consent of the daughter, if she was then living.

The provision preventing a sale is relied on as shewing an intent to confer a present interest in the profits.

It is clear from that clause, that the testator supposed he had invested them with some interest; and therefore the daughter did not take a fee. But it does not prove that he intended to give a present in- 446 terest in *the profits. If that was his intention, the prohibition from selling would have been idle; for of what consequence could it be to the others, that one should sell, if each was entitled to his aliquot proportion? That would neither be enlarged nor diminished by such a sale. It seems to me, he intended to keep the property together until the youngest child arrived at age, at all events, and until the death of his daughter, if she outlived that event. Whilst she lived, the provision was for her benefit: if she died before the youngest child arrived at age, the property was to be managed by the trustee for the support and benefit of the family: if she survived that event, the property was still to remain unsold, unless by her consent.

Until the youngest child arrived at age, the testator contemplated a comfortable provision for his daughter, and relied on her maternal tenderness to provide for the children, according to their wants and at her discretion. After they attained full age, he intended that she should still control the property during her life: and that is what he meant by prohibiting a sale without her consent. But if she died before the youngest arrived at age, as the wants of the younger members of the family might and certainly would exceed those of the children who were able to take care of themselves, the estate was to be kept together and managed for the children by the trustee. The property would thus be disposed of in such a way as in any event to secure a provision, first, for the daughter; secondly, through her, and at her discretion, for the children; and thirdly, for the younger children through the trustee, if they should be deprived of their mother before they attained full age.

I think, therefore, that the children took no present interest in the profits during the lifetime of their mother. If they took any such interest, I know of no other mode of securing it to them, than by holding that each 447 took equally and had the absolute right to his portion. The *daughter, it seems to me, was entitled to the whole for life, with a remainder to all the children after her death, vesting in those living at the death of the testator, and in any afterborn children as they successively came into being; and this construction is in conformity with the decision of this court in Wallace & ux. v. Dold's ex'ors & al.

I think, therefore, that the decree should be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

STANARD, J. Had I been one of the court that decided the case of Wallace & wife v. Dold's ex'ors & al. I should have concurred in the opinion of president Tucker. The principles of that opinion I still approve, and I think the cases cited by that judge fully sustained the main position of his opinion, that, on the proper construction of the will, the child took a present interest, not liable to be divested at the discretion or will of the mother. In the case in judgment, I think the argument of that opinion, and the cases referred to in it, conclude with equal if not greater cogency in support of a construction of the will, whereby the children take a present interest in the profits, which, however small the property, is not destructible at the will or discretion of the mother, and for which, if withheld, the injured child is entitled to a remedy in equity.

CABELL, P., approving the decision in Wallace & wife v. Dold's ex'ors & al. and being of opinion that it ruled the present case, held that the decree ought to be reversed and the bill dismissed.

Decree reversed and bill dismissed.

Vendor and Vendee—Deficiency in Quantity of Land Sold—Compensation.*—A deed of bargain and sale conveys a tract of land described as "containing by survey 785 acres, and bounded as follows, to wit, beginning" &c. (here certain metes and bounds were set out) "this part containing 785 acres, and another part attached to the same tract containing 20 acres, and making up the full amount of 785 acres, being bounded as follows," &c.—the price stated in the deed being 11775 dollars, which is the product of 785 acres at 15 dollars per acre, and there being no evidence but the deed itself of the terms of the contract between the vendor and vendee. It turns out that the tract contains less than 785 acres. HELD, the vendee is entitled to compensation for the deficiency.

Same—Sale by Acre—Right of Surveying.—Where there is a sale of land by the acre, a right of surveying exists whether expressly reserved or not, and if no time is limited for making the election to survey, it may be done at any time before the whole business is closed between the parties. Accord. Nelson v. Carrington & others, 4 Munf. 322, and Carter v. Campbell, Gilm. 170.

Sale by the Acre—Contracts of Hazard.—See foot-note to Triplett v. Allen, 26 Gratt. 721.

The principal case is cited in Boschen v. Jurgens, 92 Va. 759, 24 S. E. Rep. 390. The authorities upon this subject will be found collected in foot-note to Blessing v. Beatty, 1 Rob. 287.

Sale in Gross or by the Acre—Price Multiple of Number of Acres.—In Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 545, the court said: "The case of Crawford v. McDaniel, 1 Rob. 448, was decided by the same court, and the facts were substantially the same as in the case of Blessing v. Beatty (1 Rob. 287), except that the price of the land was an exact multiple of the number of acres and the court allowed the vendee an abatement for the purchase money on the face of the contract, there being no proof in the case except the deficiency in the land. The decision was clearly right, as on the face of the contract and this proof the vendor would be regarded as guilty of a legal fraud; but the court following the views of JUDGE BALDWIN, decided it on the ground of a mutual mistake. JUDGE SHERRARD concurs in this decision basing his opinion on the fact, that the price was a multiple of the number of acres stated in the contract, and therefore it was to be regarded as a sale by the acre. This I submit is in direct conflict with the case of Bierne v. Erskine, 5 Leigh 59, where just such a contract was held to be prima facie a sale in gross but as ambiguous and admitting therefore in aid of its interpretation proof of the conduct of the parties in carrying it into execution; and because of this proof only was the contract in that case interpreted to be a contract by the acre. But in the case of Crawford v. McDaniel, 2 Rob. 448, it was unimportant, whether it was a contract by the acre or not, inasmuch as there was a deficiency, and the vendor was, as I conceive, responsible therefor because of his presumed fraud in the absence of evidence. And I cannot regard the unsound reasons assigned for the decisions as sufficient to overthrow the large number of Virginia decisions sustained by authorities else-

Same—Purchase Money—Judgment for—Injunction to—Dissolution—Damages—Extent of Relief.—The vendee of land enjoins a judgment recovered against him for a balance of the purchase money, alleging a defect in the title to the land, which he fails to prove, whereupon the injunction is dissolved and the bill dismissed. Afterwards he brings another suit, in which he establishes his right to compensation for a deficiency in the quantity of the land, to an amount equal to the unpaid balance of the purchase money. HELD, he is entitled to relief as well against the damages accrued on the dissolution of the first injunction, as against the judgment at law.

Assignment—Assignees of Purchase Money—Rights of.—A bond for purchase money of land, executed by the vendee to one of the vendors, being assigned by the obligee to another of the vendors and a third person, the vendee brings a suit in equity against the vendors and assignees, and obtains relief against the payment of the bond; but held that in the condition of the cause there is nothing to justify a decree over in favour of the assignees.

Same—Same—Same.—The vendee of land having paid a part of the purchase money to the assignee of his bond for the same, it turns out that the quantity of the land is deficient, and that the money already paid to the assignee is more than the vendee was bound to pay. HELD, he has no equity to recover back the excess from the assignee.

449 Vendor and Vendee—Suit by Surviving Vendee for Compensation—Parties.—After judgment recovered by vendor against two joint vendees of land for a balance of the purchase money, one of the vendees dies, and the other brings a suit in equity against the vendor, alleging and proving a deficiency in the quantity of the land to a value exceeding the unpaid balance of the purchase money, and claiming that the judgment be enjoined and the overpaid money refunded. HELD, it is improper to decree in the cause without having the representatives of the deceased vendee before the court: dissentiente STANARD, J.

Appeal by Sophia Crawford and Alden B. Spooner from a final decree of the circuit superior court of law and chancery for the town of Lynchburg, pronounced on the 18th of January 1832, in a suit in chancery, in which John M'Daniel was plaintiff, and the said Sophia Crawford and Alden B. Spooner with others were defendants: by which decree a perpetual injunction was awarded against all further proceedings on a where, which are irreconcilable with the reasons assigned in these two decisions, but which are in perfect accord with the decisions themselves."

Sale of Land—Deficiency in Quantity—Rule of Abatement.—The principal case is cited in Depue v. Sergeant, 21 W. Va. 345, for the proposition that, the general rule in the case of an abatement on account of deficiency in the quantity of land sold, is to allow for deficiency the average price of the whole land.

See foot-note to Blessing v. Beatty, 1 Rob. 287.

Judgments—Injunction by Person Not Party—Liability.—If a person, not a party to a judgment, enjoins it, and the injunction is dissolved, he is liable to pay the ten per cent. damages prescribed by the statute. Claytor v. Anthony, 15 Gratt. 518, 523, citing and reconciling the principal case.

judgment obtained by Crawford and Spooner, as assignees of William Vannerson, against M'Daniel, and they were directed to pay him the sum of 292 dollars 50 cents, with interest thereon from the 17th of November 1820 till paid, and costs.

The material facts of the case were as follows:

In October 1816, the said John M'Daniel and a certain Richard Jones jointly purchased of John Patton and Sarah his wife, William Vannerson and Henrietta his wife, and A. B. Spooner and Elizabeth his wife, a parcel of land in the county of Amherst, for the sum of 11775 dollars, and received a deed therefor, bearing date the 17th of October 1816, in which the land is described as "containing by survey 785 acres, and bounded as follows, to wit, beginning" &c. (here certain metes and bounds were set out) "this part containing 765 acres, and another part attached to the same tract containing 20 acres, and making up the full amount of 785 acres, being bounded as follows;" (here the metes and bounds were given; and then the deed proceeded—) "to have and to hold the said tract and 450 *parcel of land containing 785 acres described and bounded as aforesaid, with the hereditaments &c. unto the said John M'Daniel and Richard Jones, their heirs and assigns forever."

M'Daniel and Jones paid all the purchase money of the land except 600 dollars, part of a bond for 1804 dollars 40 cents, payable the 17th of November 1820, which they had executed to William Vannerson, by whom it was assigned to Sophia Crawford and A. B. Spooner. This balance they refused to pay, alleging that the title to part of the land was defective; whereupon the assignees brought a suit against them on the bond in the superior court of law for Amherst county, recovered a judgment, and took out execution, under which M'Daniel gave a forthcoming bond with surety. By a suit in the superior court of chancery for the Lynchburg district, M'Daniel and Jones enjoined the judgment, upon the ground of the alleged defect in the vendors' title to part of the land: but at the final hearing on the 10th of May 1828, the court dissolved the injunction and dismissed the bill. Crawford and Spooner then moved for and obtained judgment in the superior court of Amherst on the forthcoming bond executed by M'Daniel, which judgment included 431 dollars damages in lieu of interest for the time the injunction had been pending; and proceeded to sue out execution thereon.

Whereupon, in October 1828, M'Daniel (Jones being now dead) filed a new bill in the superior court of chancery of Lynchburg, alleging, that at the time the first suit was brought, and during its progress, neither he nor Jones knew of any other equity against the payment of the purchase money, than the supposed defect of title on which they relied in that suit; but that since Jones's death he had discovered by a survey made for the purpose of a partition between himself and Jones's representatives, that the tract, instead of 785

451 acres, *contained only 734, so that it was deficient in quantity 51 acres.
This survey he alleged to have been made by John Pryor, the deputy surveyor of Amherst county. The purchase of the land, he insisted, was by the acre, at the price of 15 dollars per acre; and for the deficiency in the quantity, he claimed that the judgment against him on the forthcoming bond should be enjoined, and that the money which had been overpaid should be refunded. The defendants to this bill were Sophia Crawford and A. B. Spooner, as assignees of Vannerson, and the aforesaid vendors and their wives; that is, John Patton and wife, William Vannerson and wife, and A. B. Spooner and wife. Jones's representatives were not parties, either plaintiffs or defendants.

The injunction prayed by the bill was awarded.

Answers were put in by the defendants Sophia Crawford, Spooner and wife, and Vannerson and wife, denying the sale by the acre, and the alleged deficiency, and insisting that the sale was in gross. Process was served on the defendants Patton and wife, but they never answered.

The court directed another survey of the land, which was made by the same John Pryor, deputy surveyor of Amherst, who had before made a survey for Jones. According to this last survey, the whole tract contained but 725½ acres, being 59½ acres less than the quantity called for by the deed.

The only deposition filed in the cause was that of a witness for the defendants, which was excepted to by the plaintiff and disregarded by the court.

At the final hearing, the circuit superior court for the town of Lynchburg (to which the cause had been regularly transferred) held that the sale was by the acre; that the deficiency was 59½ acres, which, at 15 dollars per acre, entitled the plaintiff to an abatement from the purchase money equal to 892 dollars 50 cents; that the plaintiff was therefore entitled to a perpetual 452 injunction *to the judgment at law, and, deducting 600 dollars, the balance of principal money remaining due on the assigned bond, from the 892 dollars 50 cents, was entitled to recover back 292 dollars 50 cents, with interest from the date when the assigned bond fell due, viz. the 17th of November 1820; and thereupon rendered the decree above mentioned.

In their petition, the appellants insisted that the decree was erroneous for the following reasons:

1. Because Jones's representatives not being parties to the suit, the questions made by the bill could not properly be adjudged by the court.

2. Because after the long acquiescence in the first survey, which, after all, was probably as near the truth as either of the two subsequent surveys; and after one bill of injunction entertained, heard and dismissed, the court ought not to have entertained this bill.

3. If any relief at all should have been granted, that relief ought to have been against the vendors of the land, not against the assignees of one of the bonds executed to one of the vendors. If the court ought to have enjoined the balance due on the bond, it should have made the vendors of the land pay the whole amount enjoined. And as to the surplus over and above that balance, there was no pretence for decreeing that against the assignees. It was neither alleged nor proved that they had received it; and if it had been so alleged and proved, still there would have been no equity for the plaintiff to recover it back from them.

4. Because one half the surplus, if due from the defendants at all, was due to Jones's representatives and not to M'Daniel.

In the argument of the cause in this court, by C. and G. N. Johnson for the appellants, and Leigh for the appellee, besides the points above stated, another 453 question *was discussed; namely, whether the second injunction could properly be extended to the damages accru-ing upon the dissolution of the first?

ALLEN, J. There is no difficulty on the main point in controversy between these parties. The right of the vendees to compensation for the deficiency in the quantity of land sold is clear. The evidence of the contract is contained in the deed. The land is described as containing by survey 785 acres. Two adjoining tracts are conveyed. After describing the first tract by metes and bounds, the deed contains the following clause: "this part containing 765 acres; and another part attached to the same tract, containing 20 acres, and making up the full amount of 785 acres:" shewing very clearly that no hazard was contemplated. Each party laboured under a mistake; each supposed he was dealing for a specific quantity. The consideration to be paid shews that the price was 15 dollars per acre. This I do not consider as material, except as furnishing evidence of the character of the agreement, and that the parties dealt for the land under the impression that it contained a certain quantity; that it was this specific quantity the vendors contracted to sell, and the vendees to purchase. In the case of *Blessing's adm'r v.
Beatty*,* all the decisions of this court were reviewed by judge Baldwin. The principle deduced from them was, that equity entertains jurisdiction and gives relief upon the ground of mistake: that the question is not affected, whether the sale was at so much per acre, or a sale of a tract supposed by both parties to contain a certain number of acres, for an aggregate sum or gross price: that in either case, if there was a mistake as to the quantity, equity will relieve, and give compensation for the excess or deficiency, though no

454 fraud or misrepresentation *appear.

In the opinion then delivered I fully concurred.

Nor is there any thing in the conduct of the parties, or the time of filing the bill, which affects the claim to relief. A previous injunction had been obtained, because of some alleged defect of title. In this the purchasers failed. The mistake as to quantity was not discovered until afterwards; and thereupon this bill was filed. The cases of Nelson v. Carrington & others, 4 Munf. 332, and Carter v. Campbell, Gilmer 170, shew that where there is a sale by the acre, a right of surveying exists, whether expressly reserved or not, and that if no time is limited for making the election to survey, it may be done at any time before the whole business is closed between the parties.
